Robert Henry, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to Robert Watt, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to his heirs and assignees whomsoever; while the fetters were laid only on Henry, and the heirs-male of his body. There it was clear that Watt, though not subject to the fetters of the entail, might have pleaded them against Henry; because such was clearly the intention of the entailor. But I cannot think that, although under the terms of that destination this could be done, the same principle applies to this. I think it would require some clear expression of the entailor's intention, that a party is to be so favoured as to be able to plead fetters to which he himself is not liable. Such a case as that just mentioned is really an exception from the general rule; according to which it may be fairly held, that as the fetters are imposed in order to preserve the estate, they come to an end when that object is no longer attainable. The analogy of the case where the heirs whatsoever and assignees of the grantor succeeding, is clearly in favour of the general proposition. There it is held that such heirs cannot plead the fetters against the immediately preceding heir. When the estate devolves upon them, it is said to have been held in fee-simple by the last substitute, because they—the heirs whatsoever—are not persons in whom the entail is to subsist, and in whose favour the entailor intended the fetters should operate. Now, in the present case, I cannot think the heirs-portioners stand in a different situation. It is said that they are favoured persons, because they are called as heirs of entail, and followed in the destination by various other substitutions. That would be conclusive if they took in that character—if they took as heirs of entail; i. e., as parties through whom the estate would go, under the fetters, to the next heirs in the destination, according to the terms of the deed. But they take in a totally different character: they take in consequence of the legal inefficacy of the entail, for the purpose of the entailor, and under a character clearly not favoured, or even contemplated by the entailor, viz., as heirs-portioners entirely free from the fetters. If they had taken as fettered heirs—as the channel of transmitting the estate in the succeeding line of descent,—the only character in which they are called,—there could have been no doubt that they were not bound by the deeds of their predecessor. But they do not take under that character; and I therefore doubt whether they can be held out as being favoured parties entitled to plead the fetters. They stand in the same situation as heirs whatsoever and assignees, in the general case. The circumstance of there being substitutes of entail called after them, so far from being favourable to them, is against them. It shows that the entail was not intended to come to an end in their persons; and that event was a contingency not contemplated by the entailor. It is undeniable, that by the terms of the entail, the fetters are imposed on these ladies as the heirs whatsoever of Jean Farquhar, as expressly as on the other substitutes;—just as, in the ordinary case, the fetters bear to be imposed on the heirs-general called in the last clause of the destination. But in the present case, as in the latter, these parties plead, and have established, that the fetters cannot affect them; because, by the operation of law, the entail has come to an end in their person; and that being fixed, I do not see why, in the one case more than in the other, parties who, on that ground, have got rid of the fetters, should be entitled to urge them against the debts or deeds of their predecessor.

Lord President.—After having heard Lord Fullerton, I cannot say that I do not feel difficulty in this case; but I am, nevertheless, still inclined to concur with the majority of the Court. I have hardly any thing to add to what Lord Mackenzie said. There is a manifest distinction between this case and that of the heir immediately before the destination to the entailor's heirs and assignees. Here the clause under which the heirs-portioners succeed, is followed by several special branches. And if there had been a single daughter instead of two, she would have made up her title as heir of entail. It was impossible to predict that this would not be the case. One of the daughters might have died. It has been found that the entail is not effectual against the heirs-portioners. Still they took under the destination of the entail; and the question is, whether they are liable for the debts of the last heir? For the reasons stated by Lord Mackenzie, I think they are not.

The Court adhered.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H.R.)

No. 118.—ANDREW WAND and CURATORS, Pursuers and Respondents, v. CHARLES STEWART and JAMES GIBB, Defenders and Advocators.

Landlord and Tenant—Sequestration—Pro indiviso Proprietors—Circumstances in which sequestration of the whole crop and stocking on certain lands, at the instance of a proprietor, pro indiviso, of two-thirds, with the concurrence of a party holding right by decree of mails and duties to the rent of the other third, held not incompetent.

Alexander M'Call let to Charles Stewart, for nineteen years from Martinmas 1818, at a yearly rent of £66, all and whole the fourth part or quarter of the lands of Westertown of Pitgobar. During the currency of the lease the property of the lands was transferred from M'Call to Andrew Wand (a minor) to the extent of two-thirds, while, by decree of mails and duties, the right to the rents of the other third was acquired by Mrs Agnes Sawers or Howden. The original tenant having died, was succeeded in the lease by his son, Charles Stewart, against whom Wand, with the consent of his curators, presented a petition to the Sheriff of Perthshire, in which, on the narrative that the rent of the lands let amounted to £66, under an annual deduction of £16 for the want of fences (which deduction for 1836 and 1837 Mrs Agnes Sawers or Howden had, with her husband's consent, agreed should be retained by the tenant out of her third of the rent), and under deduction also of 10s. annually, from 1829 to 1836, for ground resumed for plantation, leaving rent to the amount of £40 past due for crop 1836, and to the amount of £43. 10s. about to become due for crop 1837, he, with consent of the said Agnes Sawers, and under deduction of such public burdens as the tenant should prove to have paid by producing vouchers, craved the Sheriff to decern against him

“for the sum of £40 aforesaid, being for the rent of crop 1836, which fell due as aforesaid; and also for the sum of £43. 10s. Sterling, being for the rent of crop 1837, to become due as aforesaid, with the interest that may be due on these sums at payment, and full expenses; and in the meantime, in security of the said sum of rent due for crop 1836, and of the said sum of rent to become due for crop 1837, to grant warrant for inventorying and sequestrating the whole crop, stocking, bestial, implements of husbandry, household furniture, goods, gear, and other effects on said possession, for the rents they are respectively liable for; and, on an inventory being reported, to grant warrant for selling as much of the sequestered effects as will satisfy and pay the sum already due and incurred, together with the expense of sequestration and roup, and all other procedure to follow hereon.”

Among other preliminary defences, Stewart, founding on the case of Ritchie, 17th December 1830, pleaded specially, that “the application is incompetent, as the conclusion for decree for payment of rent cannot be entertained in a summary form, and the other conclusions are merely subsidiary, and made dependent upon the first one for decree.”

The Sheriff-substitute, by interlocutor 11th September 1837, repelled “the objection to the form of the action,” adding in a note:

“The practice in this Court of concluding for ordinary decrees for arrears, and for deficiency after application of the hypothecated effects, is not usual in other inferior courts, and is very much opposed to the train of recent decisions in the Supreme Court; nevertheless, it has the advantage of saving a multiplicity of actions.”

The Sheriff, on appeal, having affirmed this interlocutor, Stewart pleaded on the merits, that there was “a pluris petitio to a considerable amount,” more especially as the petitioners, by their own confession, had right only to two-thirds of the rent, and were not entitled, under an alleged agreement to which he was no party, to throw the burden of the deduction to which he was entitled, on a party having right to only one-third of the rents: Ersk. B. II. t. 6, § 56. Paxton v. Hunter, Mor. 16,121. Wingate, 17th February 1809, F. C. Brown, 23d February 1826. Stewart had previously consigned the rent of 1836, under reservation of his claims for abatement, and obtained a recal of the sequestration—the petitioners not opposing it; and he now lodged a bond of caution by James Gibb for the current rent (1837), as the amount might be ascertained. In respect of this consignment and caution, the petitioners lodged a minute departing “from the demand made in the petition for a personal decerniture” against the defender.

Thereafter the Sheriff-substitute, before closing the record, appointed parties “to lodge minutes on the state of the action in point of form,” and issued the following note:

“The action was one of sequestration, and for decree for rents. The sequestration has been recalled, and the conclusion for payment has been passed from, and nothing, therefore, remains for decision but the expenses. The bond is not one conditional to pay what might be fixed in this process, but one absolutely to pay the fixed rent of a certain year. The other year's rent is nowise secured. In these circumstances, there appears no termini habiles for a decision. The parties are permitted the opportunity of being heard before closing the record, that it may be amended, if necessary. A supplementary ordinary action for payment of the rents might be the best mode of extricating the case, to which the cautioner might be made a party, but the terms of the bond appear to have precluded any discussion as to the rent of the year 1837.”

The petitioners and Mrs Howden adopted the suggestion of the note, and, after repeating the statements contained in the original petition, and narrating the procedure which had taken place under it, stated, that they had “deemed it necessary to bring the present supplementary action against the said Charles Stewart, and also against the said James Gibb as his cautioner.” They accordingly concluded against Stewart for payment to Wand of £6. 3. 4. as balance of rent due for crop 1836,—against Stewart, and Gibb as his cautioner, for payment also to Wand of £43. 10s., under certain deductions, as rent of crop 1837,—and farther, against Stewart for payment to Mrs Howden of £3. 19. 2., as the balance of her third of the rent of 1836, and of £6 as her balance of the rent of 1837, under certain deductions.

In defence to this action Stewart and Gibb pleaded—1. This action, being brought as supplementary of a previous one, which, in so far as regards its merits, has been sopited or abandoned, and brought to an end, it is an incompetent and irregular proceeding, and will fall at once to be dismissed as incompetent, with costs. 2. This action is, in various important and substantive particulars, totally dissimilar to the previous one; and upon this ground also it is incompetent, and will fall to be dismissed, with expenses. 3. Even if the action could be taken up and regarded as a separate one, it is incompetent and irregular, in so far as the instance of the pursuers, Mrs Howden and her husband, are concerned, seeing they already hold a decree of the Supreme Court for what is here concluded for in their name. 4. In so far as the action is directed against the defender, Mr Gibb, upon his bond of caution, the action is incompetent and irregular, seeing the bond was judicial, and merely an accessory of the previous process, and any decree that might be pronounced in that process could not be competently made the ground of a separate action; and the conclusions of the previous action having been passed from and abandoned, the bond has fallen. 5. The pursuer, Mr Wand, cannot competently maintain any new action for recovery of the rents sought to be recovered under the previous process, until the previous action have been dismissed with full expenses, and until he have paid the whole expenses of that previous process. 6. Quoad the rent of crop and year 1836, the pursuer, Mr Wand, has been more than paid his just proportion of that rent, and he had no ground whatever for making it the subject either of a supplementary or a separate suit. 7. In reference to the whole subject-matter of the present suit, the action is groundless, because unnecessary and uncalled for; seeing that, whilst the defender, Mr Stewart, was always ready to pay the balance of rent for crop and year 1836, due to Mrs Howden and her husband, payment never was demanded at their instance, and that payment of the moiety of the rent for crop and year 1837, due at Candlemas last, was offered to be paid on the pursuers' granting proper receipts for their respective proportions, and that long before this action was raised. Lastly, In the shape and situation in which matters are now placed, and stand between the parties, the defender, Mr Stewart, is entitled to retain the rent in his hands, especially that proportion of it in which the pursuer, Mr Wand, is in the right, until his claim for the expenses of this and the previous process be determined, and his claim for abatement on account of ground taken off and planted be adjusted, and that in security of these claims.

The Sheriff-substitute pronounced the following interlocutor:

"25th July 1838.—Having advised this process, Repels the objections urged against the same being conjoined with the original action of sequestration, and conjoins the actions accordingly: Allows parties to make such additions to their revised papers, and to meet the additions of each other, so that the record may be thereon closed in these conjoined actions, reserving always the effect of the defenders' objections, as bearing on the title to sue, and otherwise, on the merits."

"HUGH BARCLAY."

"Note.—There is no disputing but what the case has got much involved. But there does not appear any well-founded objection against the mode adopted by the pursuers. In all the cases founded on by the defenders, it will be observed that the original action was inept, and of course incapable of being supplemented. Here there is no question as to the competency of the sequestration, whatever objection lay against the personal conclusion. By recal of the sequestration, the action by no means fell. It was only the act or execution of the sequestration that was recalled on caution. The action itself remained unaffected. As well might it be argued that recal of arrestments used on the dependence, occasions the action on which the precept issued to perish. The cautioner stood (or at least was meant to stand) in room of the subjects placed under sequestration. Had the pursuers chosen to argue the point, the Substitute thinks now that he would have been brought to see the competency of prosecuting in the action, to the effect of ascertaining the rents, and thereby warranting execution on the bond (if judicial) to the extent of the sums found due under the sequestration. But as no decree could have been given against the tenant himself, there is no advantage in bringing this new suit; and, besides, the cautioner has now an opportunity of seeing that no greater burden is laid on him than what he can, under his bond, be justly subjected in. Several of the preliminary objections appear directed against the former action rather than the present, and so may be too late. But the objections to the title are reserved,—28th November 1826, Cargill; 29th January 1829, Seott; 25th February 1829, M'Dougall; A. Murray v. Wallace, in this Court; Act. Moncreiff—Ak. Gardiner and Spottiswood."

This interlocutor was affirmed, on appeal, by the Sheriff, who added the following note:

"It is no doubt true, that, when a summons is radically inept, its conclusions cannot be aided by a supplementary one; and this, for the plain reason, that there is no competent process in Court to which it can be made supplementary. But this is not the case here. The sequestration was unquestionably a competent process; and, although the respondent, by lodging a bond of caution, gave rise to some embarrassment as to the power of the Court to extricate the rights of parties in that process, the Sheriff is of opinion that the process was not put an end to by the proceedings that took place in it. It was just a case in which a supplementary action was warranted and advisable. The other points of the case also have been properly disposed of. There has, surely, been much unnecessary litigation where the sum substantially in dispute between the parties is so very trifling."

After a variety of procedure in the conjoined actions the Sheriff-substitute pronounced the following interlocutor:

"18th March 1840.—Having advised this process, Finds that the defender does not now insist in these actions for any further allowance, in respect of ground taken for planting, than the sum credited by the pursuers, which sum appears farther to have been agreed on and allowed in previous settlements between the parties: Finds, in reference specially to the defence founded on the irregularity of the sequestration, now mainly pled for the defender, that the contract of lease was made between the defender and one party proprietor, and the rent made payable was not the subject of division: Finds that subsequently the rent suffered a division in the persons of the creditors: Finds, in reference to the annual deduction awarded to the tenant, that it was immaterial to him from what party he obtained relief of the same, provided he got such relief: Finds that the defender was informed extrajudicially, and in front of the action, that he was to obtain the benefit of his awarded deduction in the manner agreed on between the creditors: Finds that he has shown no interest to object to such arrangement—no damage that he can thereby sustain—and no third party has appeared to challenge the same: Finds nothing in the correspondence of parties and their agents to render the institution of these actions improper and unnecessary, or to prevent the pursuers recovering their expenses occasioned thereon by reason of the pleas and defences repelled: On the merits, appoints the cause to be enrolled, that parties may state what order they crave in reference to the rents consigned, or what decree the pursuers farther crave under their summons: Finds the pursuers entitled to their expenses, but subject to modification, in respect of the mode in which the actions have been conducted, which has resulted in a mass of litigation on a matter of small importance: Appoints an account thereof to be lodged and taxed, and decerns."

Again, on the 1st April 1840, he pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Having resumed consideration of the process, with the reclaiming petition of the defender, reserves entire all claim competent to the defender in reference to the ground taken for planting; sustains the sequestration, as, under the circumstances, not incompetent; refuses the prayer of said petition; adheres to the judgment reclaimed against, and decerns.

"Note.—The rent was payable in one sum, and to one party. Subsequently a change took place in the proprietorship. One party got right under an absolute title to two-thirds of the rent, and another party got a right in security, or rather as an heritable creditor, to the remaining third. The tenant remained equally bound for the whole. A deduction was awarded him from the gross rent. This deduction the heritable creditor agreed to take wholly on himself, so as to give the absolute proprietor his right to the full two-thirds of the rent. In a question between the creditors of these parties, or even between the creditors of the tenant and the landlord, there might be some room for a question of competition of diligence and right of preference. The Sheriff-substitute, however, cannot perceive where is the title or the interest of the tenant to thrust himself into the matter, and to insist that the deduction shall, like the rent, be shared in equal proportions."

This interlocutor was affirmed by the Sheriff, who added in a note:

"There has been in this case a very wanton abuse of litigation. The defenders had no legitimate interest to interfere in the matter as they have done; and, as they were not only the originators of the discussion, but also the leading movers in it after it commenced, they have been properly found liable in expenses."

Ultimately the Sheriff-substitute pronounced the following interlocutor:

"25th September 1840.—Approves of the state of accounts as amended under directions of the Court: Allows the pursuers to uplift from the sum consigned the sum of £47. 12. 9., with the interest which has arisen thereon: Allows the defender to uplift the residue: Finds the expenses of the pursuers, as taxed, amount to £60. 9. 11½., which modifies to £50; and for that sum, and the expense of extract, decerns against the defender."

The defenders advocated; and a note of additional pleas in law having been lodged by the pursuers, these, with the record of the Inferior-court, were held to be the record.

The pursuers' additional pleas are as follows:—1. The petition for sequestration and sale was well founded, in respect that the advocator, Stewart, was owing and liable for the rents therein set forth; and that, in such circumstances, a landlord is legally entitled to have his tenant's effects sequestered and eventually sold, in security and payment of the rent. 2. The ordinary action also was well founded, in respect that the advocator, Stewart, in virtue of his lease, and his cautioner in virtue of his bond of caution, were respectively owing the sums claimed from them. 3. The advocator was not entitled to other or larger deductions than were allowed to him in these actions, in respect, (1.) That the £16 which was claimable by Stewart under the decret-arbitral was deducted from another part of the rent which was payable by him, but not included in either of these actions: (2.) That the claim for the small piece of planted ground was illiquid, but, notwithstanding, deduction was given for a sum which not only was the full value, but was the value agreed on by the parties; and, (3.) That deduction was claimable by Stewart for public burdens, only on his producing vouchers, and deduction thereof was always offered and given to him, on his complying with that condition. 4. The advocator, Stewart, having, in the process of sequestration, consigned part of the rent in dispute, and found caution for the remainder, it was competent in that process to have pronounced decree for the sums consigned in the bond; although, ob majorem cautelam, and to save the discussion of the advocators' objection to the competency, the summons, which was instituted for rents, included those for which these sums were owing.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"14th December 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the process, repels the reasons of advocacy, and remits to the Sheriff simpliciter, and decerns: Finds the advocators liable in expenses; allows an account thereof to be given in, and remits the same to the auditor to tax and to report.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary is clear that the justice of the case is entirely with the respondents; and he agrees with the Sheriffs, depute and substitute, that the advocator has been straining points of form very groundlessly, and apparently for no object except litigation.

"The Lord Ordinary must say, however, that he is not to be understood as approving of the practice of the Sheriff-court of Perthshire, mentioned in the Sheriff's note of the 11th of September 1837. If the case had turned on an adherence to that practice, the preceding interlocutor would not have been pronounced."

The advocators reclaimed. At advising,

Lord President.—I am decidedly of opinion that there has been here a great deal of unnecessary litigation; and I am also free to say, that the practice of the Sheriff-court of Perth, of introducing a personal conclusion for payment of rent in the summary petition for sequestration, could not have been sanctioned. That question, if raised tempestivè and insisted in, would have been fatal to the petition. It is said that the practice is most expedient; but however expedient it may be thought to be, it has received no countenance from the recent Act of Sederunt. The defender, however, instead of insisting on this preliminary objection, has pleaded the merits, and it is by these that the case must now be decided. Now, in the first place, I cannot think there is any foundation for the plea, that the two proprietors had no right to make the arrangement by which the deduction to be given to the tenant was thrown entirely on one of them. The petition was not presented in the name of Wand alone, but with the consent and concurrence of Mrs Howden; i. e., it was presented by the proprietors of two-thirds, with the concurrence of the party in right of the rents of the other third. Wand, from the nature of the holding, was not entitled to sequestration in his own name, but the deficiency of title was cured by the concurrence of the other party. Then I am satisfied that there was nothing irregular in the arrangement as to the deduction, and that the tenant had no interest to object to it. But then it is objected, that the original petition and supplementary action were conjoined after there had been a complete recal of the sequestration. The recal was merely to the effect of liberating the thing sequestered; and the interlocutor of the Sheriff accordingly, after recalling the sequestration, "requires the parties, within seven days, to state, in terms of the Act of Sederunt, whether they hold their pleadings as containing their full and final statements of fact." It is clear from this interlocutor that the Sheriff understood that the recal had done nothing more than remove the nexus which the sequestration had laid on. The process did not go out of Court. The defenders are obliged to admit that it remained in Court to the effect, at least, of obtaining a decision on the expenses; but I think it remained to the effect of determining, on the merits, the whole sums that were due. On this point I don't see any difficulty. The Sheriff then suggests a supplementary action, but afterwards alters his mind, and thinks the original action would have been sufficient. The second opinion appears to me the more correct one. The pursuers might have gone on without entering into a new and expensive litigation. Their having done so, though at the suggestion of the Sheriff, may affect the question of expenses; but as to the merits, I cannot see any objection to the competency of the supplementary action and its conjunction with the original petition. The length of the process is truly monstrous, and the Sheriff complains—as he well might—of the flood of litigation. The justice of the case, however, is clearly with the pursuers, who only obtained decree for the sums fairly due under the lease. The only question is, whether the pursuers ought not to be made answerable for parts of the litigation as having been unnecessary? On this ground the expenses have been modified; and, on the whole, I am inclined to adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Lord Gillies.—I am not able to adopt the view of the case now explained by your Lordship, though, as opposed both to your Lordship and the Sheriff, I must give my opinion with great diffidence. At the very outset of the process an objection was taken to the regularity of the petition in concluding for payment of rent, but the Sheriff pronounced an interlocutor repelling this objection and the other preliminary defences. Perhaps it was competent for the defender to have advocated at this stage; but for not having done so, is he to be subjected to the penalty of not being entitled to obtain redress afterwards? This seems harsh, and I cannot assent to it. But this is not the only point as to which I have doubts. It appears that the lands under lease belonged to two pro indiviso proprietors—one having right to two-thirds, and the other to one-third. A process is brought by one of them, with the concurrence of the other. It is necessary then to attend to the nature of this process. What is the prayer? It is for sequestration in security of rent for crop 1836 and 1837; and the thing sought to be sequestrated manifestly included the whole goods and gear of the tenant, subject to the right of hypothec. Now, I would here stop in limine. What right had Wand thus to ask sequestration of the whole? The objection was fatal: he was not proprietor of the whole. What right had Howden to ask for sequestration? She had no feudal right, and could not, by her concurrence, give a right to Wand which was not in herself. I cannot get over this preliminary difficulty. There was here a sequestration of property, of which the party sequestrating was not proprietor. Is this agreeable to the law of Scotland? It is a new doctrine to me, that sequestration is competent to any one but the proprietor. Then, what follows on this irregular sequestration? I don't go over the whole procedure, but it appears that sequestration was awarded, and afterwards, on the 15th November 1837, was recalled. Then a bond of caution for the rents is lodged. And what takes place? The pursuers gave in a minute, stating, that they depart from the personal conclusion against the tenant; and then the Sheriff says that nothing now "remains for decision but the expenses." It is true he afterwards says that "a supplementary ordinary action for payment of the rents might be the best mode of extricating the case." I cannot explain the meaning of this. To me it appears absolutely unintelligible. The petition mentioned the rents only of 1836 and 1837. No other years were litigated or referred to. When, therefore, the sequestration had been recalled, and the conclusion passed from, the Sheriff was certainly right in saying there were "no termini habiles for a decision"—no ground for further litigation or dispute. The expenses remained to be decided; but quoad the merits they were passed from. On these grounds, I think the supplementary action was unnecessary. Your Lordship also thinks so, and I don't see how we can give decree in favour of the pursuer for unnecessary litigation. This, however, only affects the question of expenses. On the merits, I am unable to get over the objection to the competency of the sequestration.

Lord Mackenzie.—There has been a monstrous amount of litigation for nothing. In this we must all agree, whether the practice of the Sheriff-court of Perth be right or wrong. As to the merits, I am inclined to concur in opinion with your Lordship. It is said the petition was objectionable, and, notwithstanding of the practice, I think it was objectionable; but the objection applied only to the personal conclusion. In so far as it prayed for sequestration, the petition was not incompetent. Admitting the irregularity of the personal conclusion, there was nothing to prevent the Sheriff, without dismissing the petition altogether, from limiting it to an ordinary sequestration. When the Sheriff says that "the conclusion for payment had been passed from," his meaning must have been that the personal decerniture had been passed from. To give his words their literal meaning would be, to hold that the petitioners had abandoned their claim to the money altogether, and of course, were never to obtain payment of it by any form of application. This could never be the meaning; and if the words used bear this meaning, it must obviously be from mistake. But then, if the mistake was of any consequence, the defenders, who objected to further procedure, might have advocated. They did not do so; and it is said that, notwithstanding, the objection may still be pleaded. Perhaps it may be true that advocacy is not necessary in all cases, when a point is wished to be kept open. But here a supplementary action was brought, to which the defenders pleaded, and the litigation went on. If by this supplementary action the original flaw was mended, it would be too much for the defenders to say, that an advocacy having at length been brought, all the previous procedure must be overturned, and the original objections to the form of the action discussed over again. On this point I can't differ from the opinion expressed by your Lordship. Then, as to the objection that the petition prayed for the sequestration of the whole effects on the lands, while the petitioner was proprietor only of a part, I don't think it well founded. There had been no division of the property. It was held pro indiviso as a joint interest,—the lands and moveables forming only one estate. Each pro indiviso proprietor had thus a right to sequestrate the whole moveables, though only to the extent of the rent due to himself. Now the objection here is, that certain deductions were due to the tenant from the whole rent, and that one proprietor prayed for sequestration of the whole rent due to him, without reference to the deduction, on the ground that he had obtained the concurrence of the other proprietor, to throw the whole burden of the deduction on that proprietor's share. I can't see anything to prevent the two proprietors from making this arrangement. If they chose to lay their heads together, and the one who had the worse remedy says, "I will extinguish the claims for deduction out of the share of rent due to me, and the rest will be divided between us according to our respective rights," what title or interest had the tenant to object to such an arrangement? That is my view, and I therefore cannot see that the tenant's objection ought to be sustained. But then, it is said that the action was brought to an end in consequence of the sequestration having been recalled, and the conclusion for payment having been passed from. Now, I must confess that this statement by the Sheriff is altogether beyond my comprehension. If the action was at an end, it is plain that not one farthing of the consigned money could ever be obtained. It was consigned in that process, and if got up at all, must have been by an order in that process. If any right remained to issue such an order, the action was not ended. The same thing may be said as to the bond of caution. It was not for an absolute sum, but for a sum to be afterwards ascertained. Of course it was competent to dispute the amount of the sum, but how could this be done in an action that was ended? I don't think it was possible to put an end to the action, or prevent the pursuers from going on as they did. Having gone on, they got a judgment which I think correct, and I therefore can't see that we would be warranted in overturning the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Fullerton.—The case is so perplexed and complicated that it is not easy to come to any satisfactory decision upon it. I am inclined to adopt the view of Lord Gillies, and I do not regret that the Court will thus be divided, as it will give us a further opportunity of considering the points of law involved in the case. The action was brought in the form of a summary petition, praying, 1st, for a personal decerniture, and 2d, for sequestration. The tenant consigns in process the amount of rent due, and in consequence, applies for the recal of the sequestration. The Sheriff accordingly pronounces an interlocutor recalling it. Here he did not say the action was at an end, for the other conclusions of the petition were sustained as competent. Of course the action goes on, but afterwards a bond of caution is lodged, and the petitioners, in consequence, give in a minute, in which they "depart from the demand made in the petition for a personal decerniture against the said defender." Now, after this, I don't know what remained to be discussed. I think the Sheriff was right in saying that nothing remained for decision but the expenses, though I also think he was unfortunate in suggesting a supplementary ordinary action. To this action there is an objection to which I am unable to see an answer. If all was out of Court but the expenses, what could be the use of a supplementary action, when there was nothing to supplement? But then it is said, that because the litigation went on, the defenders are not now entitled to plead this objection in the advocacy. I am not prepared to adopt this view. Though the fact that the defenders allowed the litigation to go on, may be a good ground for affecting the expenses, I don't think it has subjected them to the penalty of not being permitted now to plead the objection. Then, as to the other point, which I regard as of importance in principle, viz., whether, in the case of two proprietors, the whole of the deductions claimable by the tenant from the cumulo rent could, by arrangement without the tenant's concurrence, be thrown upon one of them? and whether the other could sequestrate for the whole rent? It appears to me a difficult question. It was found by arbitration, that the true rent was just the nominal rent of £66, subject to a deduction of £16—in other words, £50. Now, when there is a divided right of property—one holding two-thirds and the other one-third, each was entitled only to draw the proportion of rent efferring to his share, minus the deduction. Now, the amount due to each being thus fixed, was Mr Wand, by agreement with the other proprietor, entitled to sequestrate for his whole share without deduction? I have great doubts of this. What was the effect of the arrangement? It was just to operate as an assignation by Mrs Howden of part of her rent in favour of Wand. This is the true view of the matter. But I don't see any thing like an assignation. I see only a private arrangement; and besides, even if there had been an assignation, the assignee must have taken it under the qualifications of the cedent. If the cedent could not sequestrate for the whole without deduction, neither could the assignee. On the whole, the case is attended with so many difficulties, I am glad that our difference of opinion will give us an opportunity of reconsidering it.

The Court being equally divided, the case was allowed to lie over; and being again advised,

Lord Gillies.—I don't mean to give any other opinion, but to explain. This property is held pro indiviso, to the extent of two-thirds by one proprietor, and of one-third by another. In these circumstances, this action is brought by only one of them. It is said to have been brought with the consent of the other, but it is a consent of a particular description, and at most, amounts to nothing more than a non repugnantia. The only pursuer is Wand, and he concludes—for what? For sequestration of the whole crop, &c., on the lands, including both his own two-thirds, and the other one-third. To me this seems altogether inept. What is the process of sequestration? It is merely the legal mode of rendering the landlord's hypothec effectual; and, of course, is competent only to the landlord, who has the hypothec. In short, the hypothec is the measure of the sequestration. Here, however, the proprietor of two-thirds sequestrates for the whole. It is said there was a difficulty of sequestrating otherwise, as the lands were held pro indiviso. I can't see this difficulty. What was there to prevent the proprietor of two-thirds from sequestrating to the extent of two-thirds? Attend to the consequences of his being allowed to sequestrate for more. If the Sheriff had granted warrant of sale, could he have sold more than was covered by his own hypothec? I think there have been great faults on both sides; and that neither party is entitled to the whole expenses; but I cannot see the competency of this sequestration.

Lord President.—I admit that great weight is due to the observations of Lord Gillies. Where there are two proprietors, one having right, say to one-half, and the other to the other half, it is clear that one is not entitled to sequestrate for the whole. But then, I take a different view from his Lordship as to the nature and extent of the concurrence, which I think amounted to much more than a limited consent, or mere non repugnantia. I am aware that a party having only a decree of mails and duties, is not like a proprietor; but he has a substantial interest sufficient to make his consent and concurrence available. I am clear, with Lord Gillies, that neither party is entitled to the whole expenses. They must, at all events, be very greatly modified. Indeed the question is, whether any expenses ought to be given at all.

Lord Mackenzie.—This is a most absurd case altogether. It has given rise to a most expensive litigation, involving nice points of law, some of which never occurred to me till this moment. A new crux juris has been suggested by counsel. It is pleaded, that where property is held jointly, none of the proprietors can sequestrate for his own share without the consent of the others. I am rather inclined to adopt a different view, and think that a joint proprietor is entitled to sequestrate for his own share, though perhaps the proper course would be for all the proprietors to sequestrate for their joint hypothec. In the present case, though there is a difficulty in admitting that the one proprietor could sequestrate for the whole, I am still inclined to think the answer sufficient, that the objection was removed by the concurrence of the other; and that as the sum was due, the tenant had no interest entitling him to object to the arrangement of his landlord.

Lord Fullerton.—I believe there never was a more senseless litigation. No interest of importance was involved. The original dispute appears to have arisen in consequence of the tenant insisting that his receipts should contain a general reservation of his claims. Then, in consequence of this dispute, comes a process of sequestration. That process is objected to as incompetent—first, as craving a personal decerniture against the tenant; and, secondly, as craving sequestration for a greater amount than the share of the party sequestrating. I am inclined to admit that the consent of the party having right to one-third, was sufficient to authorise the proprietor of two-thirds to crave sequestration of the whole. Still this did not remove the other objection, that as the true rent was only £50, the proprietor of two-thirds was not entitled to sequestrate for two-thirds of £60. The point, however, was of little practical importance. The sequestration was for crop 1836 and crop 1837. The rent of 1836 was consigned, and a bond of caution granted for the rent of 1837. Then the defender obtains a recal of the sequestration, and the pursuer passes from the personal decerniture. The question then was, how to get at the rent of 1837. There was no doubt a bond of caution, but it was blundered, as it contained no reference to the sequestration. To remedy the blunder a supplementary action is brought. I have changed my opinion, that the whole process of sequestration had been brought to an end. I think it still remained to certain effects, and that, when the ordinary action was brought—not by Wand himself, with Mrs Howden's concurrence, but also by Mrs Howden herself for her own interest—it was perfectly good, as, on Howden's part, there was not only concurrence, but instance. This action, whether or not properly called supplementary, goes on, and the pursuers are allowed to uplift the money. The only question now is, if the Sheriff's interlocutor ought to be supported? On the merits I think it ought, but I have great difficulty as to the expenses. There was great irregularity in the original proceedings. The sequestration appears to have been applied for without any reasonable purpose, and, at last, the very point which gave rise to it was decided in favour of the advocates. I cannot think the modification allowed by the Sheriff is sufficient.

The Court adhered, except as to the expenses, which they found due to neither party.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 119.—JOHN CHAPLIN and MANDATORY, Pursuers, v. WILLIAM ALLAN, Defender.

Process—Proof—Parole—Bond of Presentation—Held incompetent to prove by parole, or remit to trial by jury, an alleged promise by a party to present a debtor on a certain day or pay the debt.

A bill for £275, dated 18th July 1839, accepted to Robert Hume of Berners Street, London, by Richard Lechmere of Steeple Aston, Oxford, was protested for non-payment. Immediately thereafter, Mr Hume, on behalf of himself and John Chaplin of Great Marlborough Street, to whom he had indorsed the bill, transmitted it, with the protest, to Mr Thomas Baillie, S.S.C., with instructions to sue Lechmere, the acceptor, for payment forthwith,—informing him that he was to be one of the knights in the tournament at Eglinton Castle on the following week, and that there was no time to be lost; that he had two fine horses with him—the one a grey, the other a bay; but that if he had not the cash, a bill of one or two months might be taken. Mr Baillie, after registering the instrument of protest, went to Eglinton Castle, and on making inquiry for Mr Lechmere, was informed that his two horses were then in Lord Eglinton's stables, but that Mr Lechmere himself had apartments at the Eglinton Arms inn, Irvine. Mr Baillie, on going to the inn, did not find Mr Lechmere, and left the following letter for him:

"I beg to acquaint you that your bill to Mr Robert Hume, Berners Street, London, for £275, now past due on the 21st instant, has been transmitted to me (at my house, 4, Baxter's Place, Edinburgh), for the purpose of obtaining payment. Being here, and unwilling to adopt any unpleasant measures without previously seeing you, I called to-day at Eglinton Castle for that purpose, but was unable to obtain any proper information, which renders necessary, in the meantime, the precautionary steps now adopting. I have no desire, however, to adopt any ultimate proceedings if they can be avoided, and therefore I have now addressed you to say, that if you wish to see me, I will be found at the Eglinton Arms at six o'clock this afternoon, or half-past nine to-morrow morning; and when we meet I hope we will be able to arrange the business without incurring any further trouble or expense."

In the afternoon of the same day, Mr Baillie saw Mr Lechmere, who told him it would not be in his power to pay the bill for eight days, but that he expected remittances by the 6th September, when he would be in Edinburgh and punctually settle the bill. Mr Baillie explained, that his instructions did not allow him to grant any indulgence in point of time, without a guarantee from some responsible person, and that without this he would be under the necessity of arresting Mr Lechmere's two horses, and also the armour, dresses and accoutrements. Mr Lechmere stated, that the only gentleman then in Irvine with whom he was acquainted was Mr Allan, president of the Royal Scottish Academy of Painting, and that he thought Mr Allan would have no objection to stand good for his appearance in Edinburgh. On coming to this understanding, the parties went to Mr Allan's apartments, which were in an adjoining house, but not finding him, an appointment was made to meet at the inn next morning at half-past nine o'clock. Mr Baillie's statement was, that on going to the inn according to appointment, he found Mr Allan and Mr Lechmere waiting for him. Mr Lechmere introduced Mr Baillie to Mr Allan, and stated that he had shown Mr Allan Mr Baillie's letter to him, and had explained how he was situated, and that Mr Allan had kindly acceded to his request to guarantee his appearance at Edinburgh. Mr Baillie further stated, that Mr Allan assented to Mr Lechmere's statement, and that Mr Baillie thereupon said, that for the sake of accuracy, and preventing any mistake, it would be proper for Mr Allan to give a written memorandum of the understanding come to, but when Mr Baillie was about to read the draught which he had prepared for that purpose, Mr Allan drew himself up, saying, that writing was quite unnecessary; that he trusted his word was as good as his bond. Mr Baillie then said, it would be sufficient for him that Mr Allan distinctly understood the precise terms of the guarantee, which was, that Mr Lechmere would attend at Mr Baillie's chambers that day week, namely, Friday the 6th day of September next, at twelve o'clock noon, to settle the debt mentioned in Mr Baillie's letter to him the preceding day. Mr Allan upon this stated, that all mistakes would be sufficiently prevented by Mr Baillie giving him a note of his address in Edinburgh, and the time agreed upon for Mr Lechmere's attendance. Mr Baillie accordingly took a card from his card-case, and having written in pencil under his printed name on the card, "4, Baxter's Place, Edinburgh, Friday, 6th September, 12 o'clock," handed the card to Mr Allan, who, after reading it, put it in his pocket. On the day fixed for Mr Lechmere's attendance, Mr Allan made his appearance punctually at twelve o'clock; but one o'clock having arrived without the appearance of Lechmere, Mr Baillie drew up a short minute of the facts, and having read it over to Mr Allan, and two witnesses who were present, was handing it to the witnesses to sign, when Mr Allan snatched the paper and tore it in pieces, and, taking up his hat, left the house.

Mr Chaplin, the indorsee on the bill, and Mr Baillie as his mandatory, brought the present action, in which, after narrating the above statement, and stating that in consequence of relying on Mr Allan's verbal promise to produce Mr Lechmere, Mr Baillie had been induced to stop proceedings when the schedules of arrestment were in the hands of the messenger to be executed,—he concluded against Mr Allan for payment of the amount of the bill with interest, on the pursuer granting him, for his relief, an assignation to the bill, and the diligence which had been used upon it.

In defence, Mr Allan denied that he ever undertook any conditional obligation to pay Lechmere's debt if he failed to present himself at Mr Baillie's office on the day mentioned; that it was not explained to him; and that he had no idea that Mr Baillie had refrained from doing diligence against Lechmere's effects in consequence of what passed on the occasion referred to. He therefore pleaded—1. An obligation of the description alleged to have been undertaken by the defender, could in law be constituted only by a perfect writing, or by an informal writing fortified by rei interventus; and no writing being libelled on, there is no competent or relevant ground of action. 2. The pursuer's averments can in any event be admitted to probation by the writ or oath of the defender only. 3. The defender having neither made any promise, nor undertaken any obligation of the nature and description libelled on, and the pursuer's averments being unfounded in point of fact, there is no claim competent against the defender.

Lord Moncreiff, before whom the cause came to depend, in appointing the cause to be enrolled with a view to close the record, issued the following note:

"The Lord Ordinary, attending to the suggestion of counsel when avizandum was made, has considered this record very particularly. The only observation he has to make on the form of it is, that the defender has not met the demand in article 10 of the condescendence, for production of the card referred to in that and the 8th article, though in the 4th article of his own statement he admits that he received it.

"It would not be proper that, in the present state of the cause, the Lord Ordinary should intimate any opinion on the merits of it, even in point of relevancy. It is a very singular case; and if there be any truth in the pursuer's averment, it is too plain that both he, and especially his agent, Mr Baillie, have been very unjustly treated, and some part of the case certainly admits of proof, by the messenger's execution of the charge and other documents. But the case of the defender may be difficult. He evidently means to maintain that it is not competent to prove the averment as to his personal undertaking, however articulately set forth, by parole evidence. It is an important question, on which the Lord Ordinary can at present give no opinion. He will only observe, that there are exceptions to the general rule, that cautionary obligations cannot be proved by parole. This case may not fall under any of these exceptions. But the reasoning and ground of decision in the case of Campbell v. M'Lachlan, 4th June 1752, as reported by Kilkerran and Elchies, may deserve consideration, as also the observation of the late Lord Meadowbank in the case of Bell, 13th November 1812. The cases of Watt, 10th December 1828 and Hunter, February 1824, which went to a jury trial and was decided on a special verdict, may also be considered, and the case of M'Ewan, 13th July 1816, on the other side, may be attended to.

"The Lord Ordinary must own, that though it may be so found, it will only be on very clear conviction of the state of the law that he can withhold this case from a fair investigation of the facts of it, however it may be in the end decided."

On the removal of Lord Moncreiff to the Inner-House, the cause came to depend before Lord Ivory, who, after ordering mutual cases, and advising them, made avizandum with the cause to the Court. His Lordship at the same time explained his views in the following note:

"The Lord Ordinary, after giving much anxious attention to this case, has been induced to take it to report—1. Because of the great importance of the question; and 2. Because, feeling strongly that the case is wholly with the pursuer in an equitable point of view, and concurring therefore as he does in all the disinclination originally expressed by Lord Moncreiff, to withhold this case from a fair investigation of the facts of it before a jury, he is afraid that, were he himself to decide, his present leaning, as regards the law of the question, might compel him to exclude parole evidence as incompetent, and so, however unwillingly, to pronounce in favour of the defender. He cannot help thinking, with Lord Moncreiff, that 'if there be any truth in the pursuer's averment, it is too plain that both he, and especially his agent, Mr Baillie, have been very unjustly treated;' and altogether he holds the case to be one eminently deserving the consideration of the Court.

"If the Lord Ordinary had felt at liberty to deal with 'the card,' referred to in article 8 of the pursuer's condescendence, and admitted (minute, No. 20 of process), to have been received by the defender, and received, too, specially with a view to fix the time and place at which he and Mr Lechmere were to wait upon the pursuer's agent, as a sufficient written memorandum of the entire agreement alleged to have taken place between the parties, he should certainly have been disposed (notwithstanding the imperfect note of Bill's case in the report of Dunmore Coal Company, 1st February 1811, to hold that there was enough of rei interventus averred by the pursuer to exclude locus penitentia on the defender's part. For, as the Lord Ordinary understands Bill's case, there was nothing there beyond 'the mere allegation of intention' to use arrestment, without any overt act of the creditors to show that such intent had been in the actual course of execution. Whereas here there was already parata executio. The diligence was in the messenger's hands, and the messenger on the spot. And the very thing that the parties had in view, and which was the express subject of the alleged agreement between them, was the abstaining from further execution of the arrestment, not merely as a threatened, but as an already inchoated diligence.

"The Lord Ordinary's ground of hesitation lies deeper. For, 1st, If writing was essential as a basis of evidence to make out the defender's obligation, he scarcely thinks that the card in question (unsatisfactory as the defender's account of it otherwise unquestionably is) can be received as sufficiently embodying the essentialia of such an obligation, even after making every allowance for it as an informal writing: And, 2d, The case comes thus to be narrowed to the simple question, whether writing was necessary at all? Now, in so far as the writing founded on was essentially defective, its defects could not competently be supplied by parole evidence—M'Lean, 1st July 1834. And, in the total absence of writing (or what comes to be the same thing, where, from defects in essentialibus, the writing cannot be regarded), the Lord Ordinary—in face of the express authority of Tassie, 24th July 1764 (Monboddoo, 5 Br. Supp., 899), and the less direct, though still important inferential bearing of Dunmore Coal Company (supra)—M'Neill, 7th June 1814 (Baron Hume, 103), and other cases—would not feel himself warranted to decide that a cautionary obligation like that in the present question (which was to all intents equivalent both in its character and objects to a bond of presentation) falls within any of those exceptions that have from time to time been made from the general rule, that 'cautionary obligations, correctly speaking, can be proved only by writing duly executed, according to the requisites of the Statutes, or recognised as a privileged writ.'—(Bell's Principles, § 248, and see also § 249, where the various exceptions from the above rule appear to be correctly enumerated.)"

At advising,

Lord Gillies.—This is a very singular case. It appears that Mr Lechmere was indebted to Mr Hume, in London, in a sum of £275. Hume sends down the bill to an agent in Scotland, and informs him of circumstances which would enable him to secure, by arrestment, what would be equivalent to payment. Steps were accordingly taken by Mr Baillie, the agent, who acted in the matter with great propriety and becoming delicacy. He finds the information which he received true, and that Lechmere, the debtor, has horses and accoutrements of a value greater than the debt. In these circumstances he writes to Mr Lechmere the letter quoted in the appendix, and then which nothing could be more proper; not having seen him, he proceeds to make out a schedule of arrestment, and execution of charge, with the view of carrying his instructions into effect. In these circumstances, Lechmere brings forward the defender, Mr Allan, who undertakes that Lechmere shall appear in Edinburgh, in Mr Baillie's office, on a day named, viz., 6th September. The day came, and Allan came, but not Lechmere. In these circumstances the present action is brought against Allan; and the defence is, that no such promise had been made at all, or if there was, it amounted only to a verbal obligation, whereas, in order to be effectual, it must have been constituted by writing. I cannot receive this defence. When a party, by a sort of promise, makes another believe that he has come under a proper obligation, and so induces that other to abstain from using means by which he would have secured payment, he makes himself liable;—he makes the promise for the purpose of inducing the other to delay; and, in fact, does induce him. Here is both an obligation and a rei interventus. On this point, the two cases mentioned by Mr Bell in his Illustrations are instructive, and also the opinion of the late Lord Meadowbank, as quoted in the papers. His Lordship's observation appears to apply exactly to the present case. The promise may be proved or not, but it is evident that Allan acted so as to prevent Baillie from proceeding with his parata executio. The question here is, has Mr Allan acted so as to make himself liable for the debt? As to the form of the action, some doubts have been stated; but if it be true that he prevented execution from proceeding, and if it be true, that but for his having so prevented it, the debt would have been recovered, then I think there is a good claim against him in equity and at common law. I don't, however, deny that the case is attended with considerable difficulty.

Lord Mackenzie.—The case is no doubt one of difficulty. The case has been before two Lords Ordinary, Moncreiff and Ivory, and their Lordships are inclined to take opposite views. I am afraid we must also have a difference of opinion here, for I am unable to concur in the opinion which has been delivered by Lord Gillies. The view in which the case presents itself to me is this:—There was room here for a bond of presentation being given. Now the common way in which that is done is by a formal deed, of which the ordinary style is well known. Accordingly, the agent here proposes that such a bond should be granted, but the other party objects, and the agent, not from want of knowledge, but induced by strong gentlemanly feeling,—stronger it would seem from the event than there was any occasion for,—instead of the regular bond of presentation, accepts of an oral bond, accompanied, it is said, with a card, which however proves nothing, for it bore no date. Then the arrestment was given up, and when the day of presentation came, the debtor failed to appear. I hope some contingency occurred to prevent him; but be that as it may, he did not appear, and Mr Allan is now sued on his oral bond of presentation. The defence is, that the obligation was cautionary, and not being in writing could not be enforced. It is said, however, that there was a rei interventus. I cannot say that there was such an interventus as could support an oral obligation of this kind. No doubt rei interventus may support an improvable writing; but I am not sure that witnesses, by attesting that a party had, by an oral obligation, as in the present instance, effected a delay of execution, could make that obligation effectual. It would be dangerous to go that length, for it would be impossible to know where to stop. In fact, all cautionary obligations, though unaccompanied by writing, might be rendered effectual in the same way. I rather incline, therefore, to the view of Lord Ivory, that the present action cannot be sustained, though I am sorry to do so; for there can be no doubt that Mr Baillie has been very ill used.

Lord Fullerton.—The case is attended with considerable difficulty, but on looking at the form of the action, I am inclined to concur in the opinion just delivered. The action is founded on an obligation said to be constituted by an oral bond of presentation, and to which it is sought to give the effect of a bond of presentation in common form. Whatever effect the obligation might have in another view, I don't think that there is here enough to go before a jury. A bond of presentation is a document of a very peculiar kind. It not only contains an obligation that the debtor shall appear on a certain day, but expressly stipulates, that if he does not, the granter of the bond shall pay or perform his obligation. I don't see it distinctly averred in the record, that there was an obligation by Allan to pay, if Lechmere did not appear. The point does not seem to have been brought under his notice. The question then is, if, under the present summons, the pursuer is entitled to a proof, on the allegation of a bond of presentation constituted without writing, and unaccompanied with an obligation to pay if the debtor failed to appear. I think this would be extremely hazardous, and I know of no authority for it. I give no opinion on the other view, that the obligation, such as it was, induced Mr Baillie to act upon it, and that there was thus a rei interventus. I think it very likely that great loss and damage has been sustained by having been so induced; and whether this may afford good ground for an action of damages, I don't know. That point is not properly here; for the only question is, whether an oral bond of presentation is fit to go before a jury, with the additional proviso that it does not appear the granter of the bond undertook to pay, if the debtor failed to appear. I agree with Lord Mackenzie, that it is not fit to go before a jury; but as to the other question of damages, I give no opinion.

Lord President.—I feel all the difficulty of this case, and its importance as involving a nice point of law; and I confess I would not have been unwilling to take a little more time to consider it. From the time when I saw that the point turned on the validity of an oral bond of presentation, I had great doubts of the competency of the action; and though I have felt the force of the observations of Lord Gillies, I must confess that my doubts are not removed. The state of the case is just this:—A party with parata executio, in consequence of a transaction by which another party undertakes to present the debtor on a certain day, desists from following out his diligence, thinking himself safe with the verbal obligation which he had received. He is now seeking to give full effect to this obligation, as if it were equivalent to a regular bond of presentation. The question then is, can there be a valid bond of presentation which is not written? or can we allow a proof at large, by means of which this oral bond is to be made as effectual as if it had been constituted by writing? This would be hazardous indeed. The observations of Lord Mackenzie appear to be of great force. We must beware of breaking in upon the rules of law as to the necessity of writing. It is easy to foresee the abuses which would arise from admitting oral proof of cautionary obligations. We are here tied down, as Lord Fullerton has observed, by the particular form of the action. I don't anticipate the result of an action of damages regularly brought; but as the action now stands, I am not able, with all respect for the opinion of Lord Gillies, to get over the difficulties which seem to me to make it impossible to sustain it.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Find it is not competent to prove the alleged promise by parole evidence, or to remit the case to trial by jury; assolzie the defenders from the conclusions of the libel, but find no expenses due, and decern."

SECOND DIVISION.—(J.W.)

No. 120.—ALEXANDER AINSLIE, Pursuer, v. The TRUSTEES for the CREDITORS of the CITY OF EDINBURGH, and OTHERS, Defenders.

Superior and Vassal—Burgh—Retention—Relief.—In a feu-charter granted by the magistrates of a royal burgh, the subjects were to be held free of all public burdens. The affairs of the burgh having been put under trust in terms of a Statute, by which the magistrates were authorised and required to compound for all and every debt due, and obligation contracted by them, by granting bonds of annuity at the rate of £3 Sterling for every hundred pounds of such debts—Held, 1. That the vassal was entitled to retain all feu-duties and casualties, whether payable on account of the property in question, or on account of any other property held in feu of the magistrates, until he shall be relieved of all the taxes within the obligation of exemption, which he may have been compelled to pay since the constitution of the statutory trust: 2. That for the whole sums on account of taxes or other burdens as aforesaid, which the vassal may have paid before the constitution of the trust, the magistrates are bound to deliver an annuity-bond corresponding to the amount, in terms of the Statute: 3. That the vassal is not bound to accept of annuity-bonds, at the rate and in the terms of the Statute, for the sums paid, as above expressed, since the constitution of the trust; but that, as to such sums, the magistrates, as superiors, are bound in full exemption and relief to the vassal, both for what he has paid and for what may be exigible from him in all time coming.

Continuation of case, 19th November 1839, Vol. XII. p. 179.

This cause having gone back to the Lord Ordinary, under a remit from the Lords of the Second Division to hear parties on the extent of the claim of retention pleaded by the pursuer, the interlocutor now under review was pronounced by his Lordship:

"20th May 1840.—The Lord Ordinary having resumed consideration of the record and proceedings in this cause, with the interlocutor, and remit by the Court, and having further heard parties' procurators in terms thereof, and made avizandum, Finds of new, that the pursuer is entitled to retain all feu-duties and casualties, whether payable on account of the property in question, or on account of any other property held in feu of the Magistrates of Edinburgh, which became payable to the original defenders, the statutory trustees, or which are now payable, or may become payable to the Magistrates of Edinburgh, as now reinstated in their own rights, or vested in the rights, and subject to the obligations of the statutory trustees, until he shall be relieved of all the taxes found, by the Lord Ordinary's former interlocutor of the 28th November 1837, to be within the obligation of exemption and relief libelled on, which he personally, or any tenants to whom he may be bound in relief thereof by the warrantice of their leases, may have been compelled to pay since the constitution of the statutory trust, or may hereafter be required or compelled to pay: And in respect of the findings in the said interlocutor, and of the interlocutor of the Second Division of the Court of the 19th November 1839, and of the finding above expressed, Finds and declares that the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town-council of the city of Edinburgh, as representing the said city and the community thereof, are bound to exempt or relieve the pursuer and his successors in the subjects libelled from all town's burdens, burgh and county cess, stents, taxations, and all other public burdens of whatever kind, now imposed, or hereafter to be imposed upon the subjects libelled, or upon the proprietors and occupiers thereof qua such, subject to the qualification as to tenants above expressed, and in particular, from the special impositions libelled, with the exception of the improvement tax, without prejudice to any question arising from the peculiar nature of any new tax which may be hereafter imposed: And further, Finds and declares that the pursuer is legally entitled to retain the whole feu-duties or other casualties exigible from him on account of the subjects libelled, as well as all other feu-duties or casualties exigible from him for any other subjects held by him of the city of Edinburgh, and that in payment and security not only of the whole taxes and burdens already paid by him, excepting as aforesaid, but of all taxes and burdens which may be hereafter paid by him on account of the said subjects: And further, Finds and declares that the said Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town-council, and all others coming in the room and place of the city trustees, appointed by the Statute libelled, are bound to rank the pursuer, as creditor of the said city, for the whole sums paid by the pursuer before the constitution of the trust in the persons of the said city trustees (on account of taxes or other burdens as aforesaid), and of the interest of the said sums from the respective dates of payment thereof; and also, in so far as such ranking may be necessary to give him full relief for the sums paid, as above expressed, since the constitution of the trust, and that they are further bound to deliver to the pursuer an annuity-bond corresponding to the amount of the said sums, and interest at the rate and in the terms specified in the Statute of 1st and 2d Victoria, cap. 55: Decerns and declares accordingly: Finds additional expenses due, and remits the account, when lodged, to the auditor to be taxed.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary again heard the parties very fully on the question remitted by the Court. It does not very clearly appear, from the terms of the remit, what was the particular point regarding the extent of the right of retention on which the Court thought that there should be farther hearing. But the case was argued by the defenders, to the full effect of maintaining that the pursuer has no right of retention at all of the available feu-duties of other property, in relief either of the taxes already paid, or of those which may become exigible. The Lord Ordinary cannot accede to a proposition which would be the same thing in effect as to declare, that by the execution of the statutory trust, and the subsequent reinstatement of the Magistrates, the rights of the pursuer, by his charter, have been substantially extinguished, or changed into a very limited and undefinable claim of ranking.

"It is impossible that the situation of the pursuer can have been rendered worse, or that the present defenders can have required any stronger right against him by the force of the Statute 1st and 2d Victoria, c. 55. The defenders founded very particularly on some of the clauses of that Act, particularly the 61st, as vesting a real right, equivalent to infeftment, in favour of the creditors. But every idea of any change being thereby effected to the prejudice of the pursuer, is excluded by the express terms of the 80th section of that Statute, bearing, 'that nothing herein contained shall affect any action or suit now existing or depending in any Court, relative to any estate, writ, property, or effects, heritable or moveable, real or personal, mentioned in this Act, or in the schedules hereunto annexed, either belonging to, or claimed by any other person or party; but such actions and suits shall be, and the same are hereby fully saved and reserved to all persons and parties, to the effect of establishing such rights and interests as if this Act had not been passed.' As this action was not only in Court, but actually heard and decided by the Lord Ordinary before the last Statute was passed, it is impossible that the rights of the pursuer can be in any manner impaired by the particular provisions of that Act. It is possible, certainly, that the state of the question as to the extent of the right of retention, may be in some measure simplified by the fact, that the statutory trust is now at an end, the Statute being repealed by the 40th section of the new Act, and that the Magistrates are now reinstated in all their rights, subject only to the provisions in favour of the general creditors.

"The Lord Ordinary will not enter into the subtleties of the argument, which he has now fully considered for the second time. The last discussion was somewhat clearer than the former, being freed from the other points in the case. But although he is sensible that difficulties may be raised by abstract reasonings, he is still of opinion that the pursuer's right of retention was, upon very simple principles, good against the trustees, and must still be good against the Magistrates.

"The Magistrates were, and are superiors of the subject in question, and also of the other subjects for which feu-duties are payable. The obligation in the feu-charter has been found binding, and the nature of it has been defined. It gives a negative security by relief, not depending upon any act of the Magistrates. Apart, therefore, from any question about the trust, the right to retain the feu-duties of other property is clear, upon the most ordinary principles of the law of retention, and does not at all depend on any question of real right. What would be the situation of a proper singular successor in any of these other feus, it is not necessary to inquire. But the obligation and the claim of relief are, by their nature, continuous; the claim of relief emerging upon the payment of taxes in each successive year, while the feu-duties are also payable to the superior for each year. In this situation, the whole property of the Magistrates was transferred into the management of the statutory trustees. They were not put in the situation of a trustee in a sequestration; and they neither got nor could have acquired any feudal title in any particular subject. They could sell the property, and then the Magistrates were required to execute dispositions. But though the distribution among creditors claiming was to be by the rules of sequestration, the trustees were in a very different situation from a trustee holding as singular successor or adjudger. Quoad third parties having rights in feudal subjects, or connected with them, the trustees came into the place of the Magistrates. Taking the whole property together, they stood for the time superiors in their place. Among the feudal subjects they took this particular property to which the obligation of relief is attached, and both they and the present defenders have admitted, that in so taking it they became subject to the personal obligation for relief of taxes. Now, so far as a debt may have been contracted under that obligation before the constitution of the trust, the pursuer has only been found entitled to a ranking. But after the trust was constituted, when, on the one hand, an obligation of relief emerged against the trustees, and on the other, an obligation for feu-duties emerged in their favour as superiors against the pursuer, how can it be that he should not be entitled to satisfy the one obligation by retaining the feu-duties due under the other? The defenders put cases of singular successors or adjudgers obtaining a title in one property for which feu-duties are due, and then say that the vassal could not retain those feu-duties for satisfaction of a personal claim of relief arising upon another subject. This is all very intelligible where the adjudger or singular successor gets a special title in the one subject, and is not liable to the personal obligation in the other. But how that can apply to the case of a party who, while he holds the active right in the one, only taken as a part of a universitas, is liable to the personal obligation in the other, it is not easy to understand. To make any thing of the case, there must have been a special title taken in the other subjects, and this feu must have been entirely rejected, in so far as such a thing might have been competent. But here it is admitted that the personal obligation of relief was binding on the trustees, and is now binding on the defenders. And how, then, can it be held that the pursuer shall be obliged to pay the feu-duties on the one hand, without getting implement of the obligation of relief on the other, both emerging between the same parties in the same years? The Lord Ordinary cannot see any legal ground for the plea.

"The statutory condition of the defenders, though it enables them to raise a puzzle in the question, does not really improve their argument. The first Statute stands repealed. The second was passed pending this litigation. A certain part of the estate is made subject to a security for the creditors, and is made adjudgeable for the annuities. This could not hurt the pursuer. But the Magistrates are still the proprietors of all, subject to the securities. The creditors are not here at all,—neither has any part of the estate been adjudged. The Magistrates pay the annuities from the general produce of their estate and funds, and then they appropriate all the rest of the produce to themselves. And what they now maintain is, that the important obligation of relief in the pursuer's charter shall be substantially extinguished in all time coming, or reduced to a mere claim of ranking, as a consequence of the proceedings under the trust now at an end, while yet he shall continue liable in all future years for full payment of the feu-duties of all the other subjects. The Lord Ordinary cannot think that there is either law or equity to warrant such a conclusion."

Both parties reclaimed; and on the 4th December 1840, the Court, before answer, appointed cases to be prepared and boxed on the points arising out of the interlocutor.

Pleaded by the pursuer—1. That he is entitled to retain the whole feu-duties and other casualties exigible from him by the Magistrates, on account of all the subjects held by the pursuer from the town, in payment and security of taxes and burdens already paid, or which may yet be levied from the pursuer on account of the said subjects. 2. That the pursuer is entitled to be ranked upon the city funds, and to receive an annuity-bond for the whole sums due to him on account of taxes and burdens paid for the period anterior to the trust. 3. As the Magistrates have taken up the whole superiorities of the subjects held by the pursuer from the town, they must now implement the obligation of relief contained in the charter to the Prince's Street subjects, by satisfying that claim of relief in full, in so far as concerns taxes or burdens paid by, or exigible on account of said subjects, since the constitution of the original trust—the pursuer not being bound to submit to a ranking, or to take an annuity-bond for that part of his claim.

Pleaded by the defenders—1. That the pursuer, before applying his right of retention at all, must submit to have his whole debt diminished twenty-five per cent., by acceptance of an annuity-bond, being only entitled to pay or secure himself through his right of retention, so far as that security may afford the means of satisfying his diminished claim; and, 2. That he must farther accept of an annuity-bond for any balance which may remain due to him of his reduced debt, unpaid through his right of retention, and that without reference to whether the balance arises on account of years prior or subsequent to the constitution of the original trust.

At advising,

Lord Justice-Clerk.—There are two matters involved in this case, which must be kept quite distinct—the right of retention and the right of relief. The interlocutor, dated 28th November 1837, gave complete relief to Mr Ainslie of all taxes, whether exigible before or since the constitution of the trust; and to this interlocutor the Court adhered, 19th November 1839, excepting as to the point of retention. The argument seems to have gone beyond the remit. The first interlocutor fixed that the Magistrates must give full and complete relief to Mr Ainslie, and therefore excludes any question as to the sums for which annuity-bonds must be granted. These must be framed so as to meet the claim for full relief. The interlocutor of 1837 did not give a right of retention for taxes paid before the constitution of the trust; and the second interlocutor does not go beyond this, and there is no complaint; but the first gave complete relief of all taxes, whether paid before or after the constitution of the trust. This interlocutor is now final; and it appears to me that any argument upon that head is beyond the remit to the Lord Ordinary. This is a question between a superior and vassal; and creditors taking up a right of superiority must implement all the obligations contained in the feu-contract.

Lord Medwyn.—I was not prepared for this view of the first interlocutor. I never thought the pursuer was to rank so as to get full payment of what was due prior to the constitution of the trust. For any taxes which he had paid before the trust, he must have ranked as an ordinary creditor, and got an annuity-bond. Free relief is a term of doubtful meaning in bankruptcy. When a creditor gets 5s. or 10s. of composition, it is said he gets full relief. The argument maintained by the defenders is, that the pursuer must claim as a contingent creditor; but they undertook to relieve the vassal of all taxes: clearly this was not one of the debts to be ranked in terms of the Statutes. The debts appointed to be compounded were sums of money borrowed; but this is an obligation attaching to the Magistrates as superiors; and if they had sold their right of superiority, it must have been under this burden. If the feu-duty payable had been equal to the taxes the vassal had a right to be relieved of, can it be doubted that he was entitled to retain it on the bankruptcy of the superior? Although the obligation was contracted prior to, and was existing at the time of the bankruptcy, it was an inherent condition of the contract, and was annual and continuous. There is no warrant to commute any other than ordinary debts. The Magistrates are again reinvested in both properties, and there can be no doubt of the vassal's right to retain the feu-duties.

Lord Moncreiff.—If it were not for what seemed to be understood at the last advising, I would have been much impressed with what your Lordship said as to again entering upon the question of relief. Nothing was remitted but the point of retention; but if the whole cause is to be gone over again, I remain of the same opinion as before. A claim for taxes which had been paid by the vassal emerged both before and after the constitution of the trust; and for the first of these, the interlocutor finds he is only entitled to a ranking: it could not mean more, or why say ranking at all? But, for taxes emerging during the subsistence of the trust, the vassal is entitled to full payment. The trustees having taken up the feus as superiors, must give complete relief for taxes emerging during the subsistence of the trust.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

“Recal the said interlocutor, and of new find that the pursuer is entitled to retain all feu-duties and casualties, whether payable on account of the property in question, or on account of any other property held in feu of the Magistrates of Edinburgh, which became payable to the original defenders, the statutory trustees, or which are now payable, or may become payable, to the Magistrates of Edinburgh as now reinstated in their own rights, or vested in the rights, and subject to the obligations of the said statutory trustees, until he shall be relieved of all the taxes found, by the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of the 28th of November 1837, to be within the obligation of exemption and relief libelled on, which he personally, or any tenants to whom he may be bound in relief thereof by the warrandices of their leases, may have been compelled to pay since the constitution of the statutory trust, or may hereafter be required or compelled to pay: And in respect of the findings in the said interlocutor, and of the interlocutor of this Division of the Court of the 19th of November 1839, and of the finding above expressed, find and declare that the Lord Provost, Magistrates and Town-council of the city of Edinburgh, as representing the said city and community thereof, are bound in all time coming to exempt and relieve the pursuer, and his successors in the subjects libelled, from all town's burdens, burgh and county cess, stents, taxation, and all other public burdens of whatever kind, now imposed, or hereafter to be imposed upon the subjects libelled, or upon the proprietors and occupiers qua such, subject to the qualification as to tenants above expressed; and, in particular, from the special impositions libelled, with the exception of the improvement tax; without prejudice to any question arising from the peculiar nature of any new tax which may be hereafter imposed: Find and declare that the pursuer is legally entitled to retain the whole feu-duties or other casualties exigible from him, or on account of the subjects libelled, as well as all other feu-duties or casualties exigible from him for any other subjects held by him of the city of Edinburgh, and that in payment and security not only of the whole taxes and burdens already paid by him, excepting as aforesaid, but of all taxes and burdens which may be hereafter paid by him on account of the said subjects: And further, find and declare that the said Lord Provost, Magistrates and Town-council, and all others coming in the place and room of the city trustees appointed by the Statute libelled, are bound to rank the pursuer, as creditor of the said city, for the whole sums due and payable before the constitution of the trust in the persons of the said city trustees (on account of taxes or other burdens as aforesaid), which the pursuer may have paid, and of the interest of the said sums from the respective dates of payment thereof; and that they are further bound to deliver to the pursuer an annuity-bond corresponding to the amount of the said sums and interest, at the rate and in the terms specified in the Statute 1 and 2 Victoria, cap. 55: Find that the pursuer is not bound to accept of annuity-bonds at the rate and in the terms specified in the fore-said Statute, for the sums paid, as above expressed, since the constitution of the trust, or for the interest thereon: Find that, as to such sums, the principles of ranking as a creditor are not applicable, and that the said defenders, as superiors, are bound, as above expressed, in full exemption and relief to the pursuer, and his successors in the subjects libelled on, of all burdens and impositions above specified, which have been exacted from him since the constitution of the trust, or may be exigible in all time coming: Decern and declare accordingly: Of new find additional expenses due, and remit to the auditor to tax the account, and report in common form.”

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

No. 121.—ELIZABETH M'KINLAY, Petitioner and Respondent, v. STEWART MITCHELL, Respondent and Advocate.

Catholic Creditor—Heritable Security—Assignment—Payment.—A creditor made a loan to a widow, on an assignment by her of her liferent interest in an heritable subject vested in family trustees. He then made another advance to the trustees themselves on an heritable bond, with a power of sale, over the same subject, to which the widow was a direct party as the holder of the liferent. The creditor having proposed to sell, the widow tendered payment of the second advance by her son-in-law, one of the beneficiaries under the trust, and insisted on an assignment to the bond—Held that the creditor was not bound to grant the assignment to the prejudice of his first security.

By a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 1st February 1816, the late Walter M'Kinlay disposed of his whole heritable and moveable estate in favour of the respondent, and the other persons therein named as trustees, with power to them “to borrow money upon the heritable subjects for answering the purpose of the trust,”—“to sell and dispose thereof by public roup or private sale, as they should think most advantageous,—to receive the prices, and grant conveyances;”—to “uplift the rents, mailles, and duties of said heritable subjects, and to out-put and input tenants, and let houses.”

But subject to the free liferent use and right of the petitioner, his wife.

The truster died in 1818, and the trustees accepted of the trust, and were infest in the subjects. The petitioner was also duly infest in her liferent right, and in 1828 executed a disposition and assignment in favour of the respondent, proceeding on the narrative, that she having built a tenement of land on the steading conveyed by the deed of settlement,

“did, in order to complete the erection of said buildings or otherwise, borrow from the respondent the sum of £500; that he had no security for repayment of the said sum of £500 so lent to her, and that as it was a duty and obligation incumbent on her to secure him accordingly, she made and constituted the respondent, his heirs, assignees, and successors whomsoever, her lawful and irrevocable cessioners and assignees, not only in and to the whole rents and duties of the said subjects to which the petitioner was provided in liferent, as aforesaid, during her life, with all action and execution competent to her for the same, but also in and to the said disposition and deed of settlement, and the sasine thereon, in so far as were expressed in her favour, with all that had followed, or was competent to follow thereupon.”

But it was thereby provided that the respondent should apply the proceeds of the rents, 1*st*, in payment of the interest of the principal sum; 2*d*, in payment of an annuity of £40 yearly to the petitioner; and, 3*d*, in extinction, pro tanto, of the principal sum borrowed. In 1829, a policy of insurance was also effected on the petitioner's life in favour of the respondent. And in 1831, a decree having been obtained in the High Court of Admiralty against the trustees, for payment of the sum of £150, with expenses of process, they borrowed from the respondent the sum of £320, to be applied in payment of the sum decerned for, and of the expenses incurred in the management of the trust. In security they granted a bond and disposition of the trust-subjects, with the special advice and consent of the petitioner, for all right of liferent, or other right or title which she had in or to the said subjects. The bond contained assignments to the writs, rents, mails and duties, from and after Whitsunday 1831, power of entering into possession of the property and uplifting the rents, powers of sale, and various other clauses. The respondent was infert in the subjects on the bond, conform to instrument of sasine in his favour, dated and recorded in the Register of Sasines kept for the burgh of Glasgow the 14th June 1831. No interest having been paid on the bond for several years, the respondent, after the necessary intimation, requisition and protest, proceeded to advertise the subjects for sale. Thereupon the petitioner procured her son-in-law, one of the fiars in the subjects, to offer payment, on receiving a valid assignation to the bond and disposition in security. The respondent offered a discharge of the bond, but refused to grant an assignation, on the ground that he was a catholic creditor, and could not be compelled to assign a right to his own prejudice. He also made offer,

"on receiving payment of all his claims, principal, interest, and expenses, under his disposition and assignation to Mrs M'Kinlay's liferent, and the bond and disposition in security for £320, to grant assignation to these, with his whole claims, grounds of debt and securities (excepting and excluding always the personal obligation in the last-mentioned bond.) On receiving payment of the whole sums, principal, interest, and expenses contained in, or incurred in relation to the bond and disposition in security for £320, to grant an assignation thereto, but always on the express condition that there shall be inserted therein valid and sufficient clauses, to the effect that until Mr Mitchell's claims under the disposition and assignation to Mrs M'Kinlay's liferent be satisfied and paid, or until Mrs M'Kinlay's liferent interest shall determine by her death, the assignee shall not be entitled either to sell the subjects (except under the burden of Mrs M'Kinlay's liferent as a real and preferable burden), or to raise any action of poinding of the ground, or mails and duties against the tenants, or any other process to defeat Mrs M'Kinlay's liferent vested in Mr Mitchell as a real and preferable burden, until his claims be extinguished."

The petitioner refused compliance with either of these offers, and presented a petition, craving the Sheriff of Lanarkshire

"to decern and ordain the said Stewart Mitchell to grant to the said Samuel Wilson, and at his expense, or to any third party whom the petitioner may name, but always at the expense of such third party, a valid and effectual assignation to the said bond and disposition in security, to the extent of the sums paid to the said Stewart Mitchell, to the effect of enabling the assignee to recover the contents of the assignation, as accords,—such assignation being only granted by the said Stewart Mitchell free of any personal obligation against him, and upon payment to him of the principal sum, and whole consequents, contained in the said bond and disposition in security;" "and, in the meantime, to interdict, prohibit, and discharge the said Stewart Mitchell, and all others acting under his authority, from selling or disposing of the subjects and others in question," &c.

Interim interdict having been granted as craved, the petition resolved into a summary action; and a record having been made up and closed, the Sheriff-substitute pronounced the following interlocutor:

"15th January 1841.—Having advised the closed record, Finds that the pursuer has a sufficient title and interest to insist in this action; but finds that, in the whole circumstances of the case, and for the reasons stated in the subjoined note, the defender, Mitchell, is not bound to grant to the proposed assignee, Samuel Wilson, or to any other assignee, an assignation to the bond and disposition in security, referred to in process, and held by the said defender; therefore, sustains the defences, assoilzies the defender, and recalls the interim interdict formerly granted: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses; allows an account thereof to be lodged, and when lodged, remits the same to the auditor to tax and to report; and decerns."

(Signed) "HENRY GLASSFORD BELL."

"Note.—It is true that, in the ordinary case, where payment is tendered to a creditor by one who is not the proper debtor, the creditor is bound to accept of that payment in preference to doing diligence against either the person or estate of his debtor, and is also bound to grant an assignation to the party paying, of any separate security he may hold for his debt. But there is an express exception to this general rule, when the creditor, by assigning, would weaken the preference of any other debt vested in himself affecting the subject sought to be assigned,—it being in all such cases held that no creditor can be compelled to assign a right to his own prejudice. The question therefore here is, whether the assignation sought for would prejudice the defender? He holds an assignation in security to the liferent of the same subject, impignored to him by the bond and disposition. The pursuer argues, that the pledge for the sum in the assignation to the liferent, and the pledge for the sum in the bond, are two different things, and so far she is correct,—the one pledge being the ipsum corpus, and the other merely its fruits. But it by no means follows, that, were the pursuer to assign away his bond, his own assignation to the liferent would not be affected. In the first place, the trust-estate, to which he stands in the relation of trustee, would remain burdened with a debt, instead of being cleared of debt, according to the will of the truster, and a personal responsibility might thus be incurred by the trustee. In the next place, the assignee might bring the estate to sale at any time, and, provided the purchase-money covered the amount in his bond, he would have little or no interest to put such a value upon it, as would compel the purchaser to keep the rental as high as possible; whilst the defender, on the other hand, has a direct interest that nothing be done to dilapidate the rental, or incur a risk of its being lowered. These considerations clearly bring the present within the category of those cases referred to by Erskine, B. III. t. 5, § 11. It may be added, that there appears to be also a speciality in favour of the defender, in respect that the only obligation incumbent upon him by the terms of the bond is, on redemption being made, not to assign, but 'to execute all writings necessary for disencumbering the said subjects of this security.' Were the defender to assign, this obligation would become imprestable on him. Neither can the defender be accused of acting capiously, seeing that he has a right to protect his own interests, and has made various alternative proposals to the pursuer, all of which appear reasonable."

On an appeal to the Sheriff, he pronounced the following interlocutor:

"15th February 1841.—Having considered the interlocutor appealed from, and reviewed the whole process, for the reasons stated in the following note, alters the interlocutor complained of; decerns in terms of the prayer of the original petition, under this limitation, that the whole rights vested in the defender under his £500 bond are reserved entire, as therein constituted, and that the assignee in whose favour the respondent is ordained to denude is the pursuer's son-in-law, Wilson, mentioned in the pleadings; declares the interdict perpetual; finds the pursuer entitled to expenses; appoints an account thereof to be given in, and remits the same to the auditor to tax and to report; and decerns." (Signed) "A. ALISON."

"Note.—It is not without some hesitation that the Sheriff has altered the interlocutor in this case, as, although he differs in opinion from the Sheriff-substitute, yet he fully appreciates the distinct interlocutor by him. In fact, he concurs in all the legal positions laid down in that interlocutor, and it is in their application to the special circumstances of this particular case, that he alone sees grounds for altering it. The view he takes of the case is this: By the settlement of the deceased, the respondent was, inter alios, constituted a trustee for behoof of the pursuer, as liferentrix, and the parties mentioned in the trust-deed as fiars. This character of trustee he still bears, and it forms an important feature in the present case. The trust-deed, however, conferred a power upon the trustees to borrow money, which the testator foresaw, as the result has proved, might be necessary for the amelioration or preservation of the property, and therefore, any sum borrowed by the trustees in the exercise of a sound discretion under that power, must be held to be within the powers conferred by the trust. £500 was borrowed by the pursuer from the respondent, one of the trustees, and as she had only a life interest in the property, the mode of securing the respondent, as lender, was necessarily very expensive. The premium upon the policy of insurance effected on the pursuer's life was £30. 2. 11. a-year, interest at 5 per cent. was charged, amounting to £25, a commission of 5 per cent. was charged for factor fee, and interest at 5 per cent. was charged on all disbursements, making the total interest or expense against the pursuer for this loan of £500, little less than £60 a-year. The Sheriff does not say there was any thing wrong in these charges, only they prove that the respondent amply secured his own interest in the transaction, as the bond and disposition contained a power to intromit with the rents until these several charges were defrayed. Thereafter it became necessary for the trustees, as representing the deceased, to borrow a sum of £320 to meet a demand which was made upon the trust-estate, and the respondent, still the trustee on the estate, again lent this sum of £320, upon receiving a bond and disposition in security, containing a power to sell, from the trustees, with consent of the pursuer as liferentrix. The respondent, it appears, was taking, or threatening to adopt measures to sell the property under these powers, which had greatly risen in value, in consequence of the general rise in the value of property at the Broomielaw, where it is situated, and the present application is presented, at the instance of the widow, to interdict that proceeding, and to have the respondent ordained, upon receiving payment of the £320 last borrowed, to grant an assignment to the security which he holds therefor, and also its powers, in favour of the petitioner's son-in-law, who tendered the full sum in the bond, and who, in right of his wife, one of the fiars in the property, has a reversionary interest in the trust-estate after expiry of the pursuer's liferent interest. The respondent says he is willing to grant a discharge of the £320 bond, but he will not grant an assignment, because, he says, it would prejudice his security under his prior disposition; and the question now is, can he be compelled to grant such an assignment? Now, the legal position is, no doubt, well founded, that a catholic creditor cannot be compelled to grant an assignment instead of a discharge, where that assignment is calculated to injure any other rights vested in his person; that is to say, the law will not compel a catholic creditor to part with a right which makes a prior right worse. But, can any such injury arise from an assignment being granted to the £320 bond as the pursuer requires? The Sheriff cannot see that it will. The security which the respondent enjoys under the £500 bond, and relative insurance, will just remain where it was, as if the subsequent £320 bond had never been granted. The respondent says, that the party to whom the assignment of the £320 bond is granted may sell the property, and that he, the creditor, has no security that it will be brought to the most advantageous sale, and, therefore, that his security for ultimate payment of the £500 may be lessened. If there is any truth in this statement, it arises from the respondent, a trustee on the estate, consenting to undue powers being conferred upon himself as a creditor on the property, and he has no right to complain of what he himself was instrumental in producing. But it is impossible to see how the respondent's security is lessened in this way, when it is recollected that the pursuer of this action is the widow, who is vested, under the settlement of the deceased, with the liferent of the property, and is infert therein, and that the party who tenders the money, and proposes to become assignee, is her son-in-law, and now, in right of his marriage, one of the fiars. It is impossible to conceive how these parties, interested as liferenter and fiar in the residue of the estate, will sacrifice the property at an under-value. But, even if they should be disposed to do so, the respondent has himself to blame for it; because it was he, contrary to his duty in that respect as trustee, who burdened the property in his own favour with rights of a more extensive nature than he, as trustee, should have consented to. The respondent's original character as trustee attaches to him throughout the whole transaction, and he cannot shake himself loose of it, and law will not permit him to scruple at divesting himself as creditor of a right, which, according to his own showing, he, as trustee, should never have consented to burden the property with. What he is now striving to do is, not to preserve his rights under the £500 bond, but to secure to himself additional advantages, which, contrary to his duty as trustee, he had acquired under the £320 bond."

The respondent advocated the cause, and the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"2d July 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties, and considered the process, advocates the cause: Recals the interlocutor of the Sheriff of 15th February 1841: Sustains the defences against the original petition: Assigns the defender, and decerns: Finds the advocate entitled to expenses both in this and in the Inferior Court; appoints an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits to the auditor to tax the same and to report.

"Note.—The case of the respondent rests almost entirely on a misapplication of the judgment of the Court in Sligo against Menzies, 18th July 1840. It was there found that a creditor who had a real security, and a cautioner for a first loan, and who, without consulting his cautioner, had afterwards made a second advance on the security of the same subject, could not deal with the last security in such a way as to violate his implied contract with the cautioner, by rendering any assignment that he might get useless. Erskine's doctrine.—"that in equity no creditor can be compelled to assign a right to his own prejudice," was not disowned by the Court; for all that was determined was, that a creditor could not protect his own interest by destroying that of another party; and least of all, when that party was a cautioner who had only interfered on a reliance that his privileges would be given effect to.

"The present is a quite different case. The creditor here made a loan to a widow on an assignment by her of her liferent interest in an heritable subject. He then made another advance on an heritable bond, with a power of sale over the same subject, which bond was not merely consented to by the widow, but she was a direct party to it as the holder of the liferent. In this situation the creditor proposes to sell under his bond. But she objects, and tenders payment by her son-in-law, the fiar. The creditor is ready to take the money, and to grant a discharge, but she insists on his assignment.

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that she has no right to insist on this, because it is injurious to the creditor's interest under the first loan to this very person. His security for this first loan consists solely on his holding her authority to uplift the rents under her liferent right. But if he assigns, the assignee may sell or deal with the property in such a manner as to render the rents less valuable. It is said that this is improbable, because it must be the interest of the liferenter and of the fiar to keep them up. But after getting the assignment, they may transfer to a stranger; and moreover, the creditor's right under the assigned liferent, being purely personal, might be superseded altogether by the real right of any party to whom, under the assignment demanded from him, the property might be conveyed. What would the assignment of the liferenter be worth against an action of mails and duties? The creditor, besides, is one of three private trustees over this property, and the widow has dealt with him in this character. Can she then insist on an assignment, the effect of which is, that, instead of clearing the subject, which is the duty of trustees, it would be kept encumbered?

"In short, this is nearly the reverse of Sligo's case. It is the case of a debtor, in two obligations to one creditor, trying to make the power of defeating the first of them a condition of his fulfilling the last; and the true design is disclosed by the important fact, that the creditor's offer to assign, as required, provided only his prior right was made safe, was rejected, or was at least not accepted of by the party insisting for an assignation in addition to the discharge.

"All that is said about the hardship of the terms on which the loans were made, and about the incorrect conduct of the trustees as such, is irrelevant."

The petitioner reclaimed. At advising,

The Lord Justice-Clerk observed,—this application looks very like a declarator, and not a petition for interdict. It is admitted that the creditor is properly selling, but you say he must grant an assignation of his bond and disposition in security. The Sheriff also decerns in terms of the prayer of the petition; and although no objection is stated on this ground, it is right that the Court should notice it.

Buchanan.—It is a summary application presented on the exigency of the occasion; the main question is as to the interdict; and we only ask the Sheriff to cognosce the grounds on which it is asked.

Lord Medwyn.—The real question is as to granting the assignation.

Lord Moncreiff.—Could you set forth such grounds in a summons before the Sheriff?

Rutherford, for the advocate, consented to waive the objection.

On the merits,

Lord Medwyn.—There can be no doubt that a creditor is not bound to assign a right to his own injury. The creditor here has a right in security both to the liferent and to the fee of the subjects, and he cannot be compelled to assign his right in the fee, without protection for his first security. The son-in-law, though far, might assign to a third party, and so injure or defeat the right of liferent. A fair offer is made, and not accepted; while an action of maille and duties, or a pinding of the ground, involves a competition. The general reservation in the interlocutor of the Sheriff is of no consequence without a specific clause. I agree with the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Moncreiff.—I am of the same opinion; and unless there were some object in view, in order to prevail over the liferent security, there could be no objection to the offer made by the creditor. Mitchell is a friend of the family, and waits before he sells; the debtor offers payment, on condition that he shall grant an assignation to his bond and disposition in security, which is to be used against his liferent right, and made troublesome to him. The case of Sligo is totally different.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I have looked somewhat narrowly into the Inferior Court record, and think that Mr Mitchell has been hardly used. As a friend, he advances £500 on adequate security, and upon a speculation he gets a security on a life policy, and then, when there comes a large claim against the estate, he pays it, lest some one else should make the advance, and injure his security. There is no objection to his power of sale; but it is said that he is bound to grant an assignation. It is a mistake, however, to suppose that the primary obligation on a creditor is to assign on payment. The primary object of the security is, that he is to be paid; and it is only held in equity, that he is not to sell if any one come forward and offer payment. He is entitled to payment absolutely, and without assignation; and it is not necessary that there should be a certainty, but only a reasonable prospect of risk to entitle him to refuse to assign.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court adhered, with additional expenses.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 123.—MRS ELIZABETH M'EWEN or MUNNOCH, Pursuer, v. DANIEL M'EWEN, Defender.

Aliment—Pupil—Where a pupil, seven years of age, had a free income of about £490, arising from the interest of money left him by his father, who had lived in a comparatively humble station, the sum of £150 yearly was awarded to his mother as his aliment during pupillarity.

Alexander Munnoch, merchant in Stirling, died in April 1835, leaving a widow, Mrs Elizabeth M'Ewen or Munnoch, and their only child, Alexander Munnoch, a mere infant. He left property to a very considerable amount; but in terms of an antenuptial contract of marriage, the widow was entitled only to the liferent of £2000 at four per cent., and the legal interest of her tocher of £300—making her whole annual income £92. At first, Archibald Munnoch, the pupil's uncle, was served his tutor-at-law, and in 1836, on the application of the widow, was decerned by the Court to pay her at the rate of £60 per annum as aliment for the pupil till he should be seven years of age. In 1837, the tutor-at-law was allowed to resign the office, and the Court, on his suggestion, appointed Daniel M'Ewen as factor loco tutoris. The pupil having attained the age of seven years, the period for which the previous aliment was decerned, Mrs Munnoch raised the present summons, in which, on the statement that the present fortune of the pupil might be fairly estimated at between £14,000 and £15,000, yielding an annual return of nearly £490, and might be expected to amount at his majority to at least £20,000; and that, considering the age of the pupil, the additional outlay in his clothing, education, and otherwise, and the present and apparent future extent of his fortune, the aliment of £60 was altogether inadequate, she concluded that Mr M'Ewen, the factor loco tutoris, should be decerned to make payment to her of £150 yearly in name of aliment to the pupil, besides the expense of medical attendance if necessary.

M'Ewen lodged defences, in which he admitted the accuracy of the pursuer's statements, and his unwillingness to object to the sum proposed, provided it did not seem to the Court excessive.

At advising,

Lord President.—It is impossible to object to the conduct of the factor in lodging defences. It is clear, however, that we cannot lay out of view the improvement which has taken place in the pupil's circumstances since the former aliment was granted, and the additional expenses which his clothing and education will now require. I don't think the sum asked is extravagant. We will fix it for a limited period, and when it expires it will be in our power again to modify it according to circumstances.

Lord Gillies.—I am of the same opinion. It is true the father appears to have been in a humble station: that, however, is not permanent in this country. Rank is hereditary, but the want of it is not hereditary. The pupil should be treated like a young man who, at his majority, will probably have a fortune of £20,000.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. The funds are substantial, and seem to justify the aliment concluded for, though I should certainly be unwilling to grant such an aliment as would prevent future accumulation. To do so would be in effect to lower, or at least prevent the improvement of the pupil's station.

Lord Fullerton concurred.

The Court decerned for £150 of aliment during pupilarity, with expenses to both parties out of the estate.

On the following day, the pursuer's counsel stated that the aliment formerly granted, and that now prayed for, were exclusive of medical attendance, and moved that the interlocutor should be framed accordingly. The Court did not see the propriety of the alteration, but left it open to the pursuer, in the case of any extraordinary illness, to bring it under their notice.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

No. 124.—GEORGE ANDERSON and OTHERS (Anderson's Trustees), Pursuers, v. CLAUD RUSSELL and OTHERS (Campbell's Trustees), Defenders,—Et à contra.

Superior and Vassal—Obligation—Feu-Contract—Implement—

By certain articles of roup two lots of ground were feued in 1813, and in 1825 a formal contract of feu was entered into by the superior and vassal, varying essentially from the articles of roup. The contract provided, that "when the stances shall be built upon, the buildings shall be in a line pointed out by A B, and be constructed conform to a plan approved by an architect to be appointed by the superior: Further, that the vassal shall be at one half of the expense of making the common sewers opposite to the stances, and also of one half of making the streets, lighting and cleaning the same, &c.; and in so far as the said drain, &c. are already finished, the vassal becomes bound to pay the expense thereof." The stances remained unoccupied, and in 1840, the trustees of the vassal raised an action to have the superior ordained to furnish an elevation plan, to make streets, &c., the vassal being willing to pay one half of the expense of making the same opposite the two stances feued; and in the event of the superior failing so to do, to have the feu-right declared at an end; and in any event, to have repayment of the feu-duties already paid, or at least relief from the payment thereof in future.—Held that the demands made upon the superior could not be maintained either as conditions of the feu-contract or as independent rights: 2. That the feu-contract could not be controlled by the articles of roup.

These counter actions relate to the interpretation to be put on a contract of feu, entered into between the late John Campbell, W.S., and the late John Anderson, ironfounder, Leith Walk. The one is an action at the instance of Mr Anderson's trustees, claiming implement of certain stipulations under which, it is alleged, the superior came to the vassal by the feu-contract, and demanding a judgment from the Court, that, in the event of these stipulations not being fulfilled, the feu-contract has become null and void. The other is an action at the instance of Mr Campbell's trustees, with concurrence of certain heritable creditors who obtained deeds of security over the subjects from Mr Campbell, concluding generally for payment of the feu-duties, and implement of the other obligations undertaken in the feu-contract by the vassal. It was not disputed that decree should be pronounced in the latter action, unless Mr Anderson's trustees should succeed in the counter action at their own instance.

On the 12th June 1811, there were exposed to sale by public roup, "all and whole the areas on the north and south sides of Prince Regent Street, which belongs to John Campbell, W.S., and is part of a park situated at the back of the Citadel of Leith." Previously to the roup, there had been prepared by Mr Gillespie Graham, architect, a sketch of the ground, showing its position, and the direction of the streets and some other particulars. This plan was the only one exhibited or referred to at the time of the roup. The defenders maintain that it is a ground plan sufficient for the purpose of building; while the pursuers aver that it is useless as a working plan.

The second clause in the articles of roup provides, "that each purchaser shall be obliged, within five years from Whitsunday last, to build a house upon his purchase;—and the houses, in as far as the same respects Prince Regent Street, shall run in the line pointed out by the said plan, and shall be built conform to an elevation plan to be approved of by James Gillespie, architect in Edinburgh, or some other architect to be appointed by the said John Campbell, but shall not exceed three storeys in height above the level of the street."

The third clause provides,

"that each purchaser shall be obliged to pay a part, in proportion to the extent of front of his purchase, of the expense of paving and causewaying the whole street, and also the meuse-lane after mentioned, and keeping the same in repair, and also of making and repairing the common sewers; and each purchaser shall have relief of one-half of the said expenses from the feuar on the opposite side of Prince Regent Street, when the same shall be feued."

The sixth clause is as follows:

"The purchasers shall be obliged not to erect, or cause to be erected, on their respective purchases, any thing that can be deemed a nuisance; and they shall also be obliged to pay a part, in proportion to the extent of front of their purchases, of the expense of lighting and cleaning the said street, which it is hereby stipulated shall be formed agreeably to a section corresponding as nearly as may be convenient to the level of Great Junction Street, which intersects Prince Regent Street, at the sight of the said James Gillespie, and John Paterson, engineer for the Leith Docks; as also to pay their proportion of the expense of bringing in water, and of any other general plan of police which may be adopted by the majority of the feuars of the said street, or which may be enforced by law; and also to concur in any general regulations to be made by a majority of the said feuars, as said is."

At the time of the roup, the late Mr Anderson appeared and purchased a building lot at the end of Prince Regent Street, "with a return of forty feet alongst Great Junction Street." He also purchased the area of Great Junction Street adjoining to the preceding lot; and it was declared that this purchase was made "under all the conditions and stipulations in the foregoing articles which relate to Prince Regent Street, but which are hereby expressly agreed to be binding also with regard to this street."

For a number of years after 1811, Mr Campbell was unable to give his feuars entry to the purchases, owing to disputes between him and the magistrates of Leith as to the level of certain streets, and the want of plans, streets, common sewers, &c. These disputes were at last settled, and a feu-contract was executed between Mr Campbell and Mr Anderson on 29th and 30th November 1825, and 3d January 1826, making the first term's feu-duty payable at Whitsunday 1820 instead of 1813 (the period specified in the articles of roup), and containing the following declaration:

"That when the foresaid two stances shall be built upon, the front of the houses shall run in the line of the said streets, as shall be pointed out by Mr James Gillespie, architect; and the fronts of them, if at any time they shall be rebuilt, shall run in the same line, and the said houses, with every thing else connected therewith, together with the levels of the street, the front pavement, the back ground, the causeway, and the common sewers, in so far as they are not constructed or built, shall be built and constructed conform to a plan and elevation to be approved of by an architect to be appointed by the said John Campbell or his foressaids. And further, the said John Anderson binds and obliges himself, and his foressaids, to be at the one-half of the expense of making and keeping in repair the common sewers opposite to the said subjects, and also of one-half of paving and causewaying the said streets, making iron railings, lighting and cleaning the said streets, and in so far as the said drain, &c., are already finished and built, be becomes bound to pay the expense laid out thereon by the said John Campbell to the said Claud Russell, his trustee foressaid."

Long before the date of the feu-contract the feuing speculation had entirely failed. Mr Anderson, however, continued to pay the feu-duty down to the period of his death in 1834. An action was thereafter raised against his trustees for payment of the feu-duties from Martinmas 1833 to Martinmas 1836, amounting to £108. 2s. Sterling. In this action the Lord Ordinary decerned in terms of the libel, and the Court adhered, reserving to all parties their respective claims and rights under the articles of roup and relative feu-contract as accords—(vide ante, Vol. XII. p. 220, 5th December 1839).

Notwithstanding the judgment pronounced against them, Mr Anderson's trustees, whilst paying the feu-duties for which decree was obtained, refused to pay those which subsequently fell due. It became, therefore, necessary to raise the present action against them, in which a running decree for the feu-duties is sought, and a judgment for implement, generally, of the feu-contract is claimed.

Anderson's trustees raised the other of these two processes; and their conclusions against the defenders are the following:

"Therefore, the said defenders ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decrees of the Lords of our Council and Session, to furnish and exhibit to the pursuers a good and sufficient feuing and building plan, and a good and sufficient elevation plan, not merely in regard to the said two stances feued by the said John Campbell to the said John Anderson, but also embracing, and which should be binding on the defenders and their vassals, and all others, in regard to all the remaining areas in Prince Regent Street and Great Junction Street; and they ought and should be further decerned and ordained to make and complete, in a good and substantial manner, according to proper levels and sections, and of the stipulated width, the said road or street called Prince Regent Street, so far as not already formed or completed, and also the said road or street called Great Junction Street, and to get the same opened, levelled, formed, causewayed, and paved in a proper manner, the pursuers being ready to pay one-half of the expense of making and keeping in repair the common sewers opposite the two stances feued to the said John Anderson as aforesaid, so far as not already made and paid for, and also one-half of paving and causewaying the said streets, and making iron railings opposite to the said two stances. And, in the event of the defenders failing to implement said obligations between and the 1st day of January next, or whatever other day our said Lords shall be pleased to fix and limit for such purposes, it ought and should be found and declared, that the said feu-right, and all obligations incumbent on the said deceased John Anderson under the said articles, conditions, and minutes of roup and feu-contract, or otherwise, in regard to said subjects, have ceased and determined, and become totally void, and that they are, and shall be of no effect in future."

The summons further concludes for repetition of the feu-duties, or otherwise, to have it found and declared that the superior has no claim for feu-duties till these obligations are performed by him; and that the pursuers are entitled to damages.

The processes having been conjoined and a record made up,

The pursuers pleaded—1. By the articles of roup and feu-contract in favour of the late Mr Anderson, the defenders, as representing the original superior, are bound to point out the line of Prince Regent Street and Great Junction Street, and they are also bound to furnish a plan and elevation showing the design of the houses to be built in these streets, and every thing connected therewith, together with the levels of the street, the front pavement, the back ground, the causeway, the common sewer, and whatever is necessary for a complete working ground and elevation plan. 2. The superior, according to the proper construction of the articles of roup, and of the feu-contract, is bound to make the common sewers, foot pavements and streets, to introduce water, and generally to do whatever is necessary for rendering the pursuers' buildings accessible and habitable, according to the intention and views of parties when they entered into the feu-contract,—the vassals being only bound to pay their proportion of the expense. 3. The defenders are at all events bound, especially as almost the whole building ground in question remains their property, and is unfeued, to contribute, along with the feuars, to the expense of the works referred to in the last plea, in proportion to the extent of ground not feued. 4. The defenders having refused, after a formal requisition served upon them, to furnish the pursuers with ground and elevation plans, and having by that refusal rendered it impossible for the pursuers to erect any buildings, have now no longer any claim under the feu-contract, and are liable in repetition of the feu-duties and other outlay libelled, or in damages; and at any rate, can have no claim for future feu-duties till such time as proper plans are furnished by them. 5. As the defenders have also refused, after formal requisition by the pursuers, to be at the expense of, or to contribute towards making the roads, sewers, and other common works above mentioned; and as any houses which might be built while the ground is in its present state must be inaccessible and uninhabitable, the pursuers are not bound to build in terms of the requisitions upon them by the defenders' agent, but, on the contrary, are entitled to have it declared that the feu-contract is, on that ground, at an end, or alternatively, to have decree for implement of these obligations upon the superior, and for repetition of the feu-duties and outlay already paid, as well as relief from the feu-duties becoming due in future, till such time as the superior has made the roads, and performed his other obligations.

The defenders pleaded—1. The judgment pronounced in the previous process between the parties forms res judicata, at all events to the extent of the matter set forth in that judgment. 2. Independently of that judgment, there are no good grounds on which the pursuers can maintain any of the demands made in their summons, whether these are set forth as conditions of the feu-contract remaining in validity, or as independent rights in their own part. 3. More particularly, in regard to plans, all has been done on the superior's part which is requisite. It remains for the vassal, if he shall think fit, to exhibit a plan to be approved of by the superior. 4. Farther, there is no obligation on the superior to pave and causeway the streets, or to make drains, or do any of the other things demanded in the summons. The obligations, in these respects, are all laid on the feuars, with a mere mutual relief inter se. 5. Generally, there is no good ground for annulling the feu-contract, or suspending its operation, the defenders having fulfilled, or being ready to fulfil, all that is incumbent on them as in room of the superior. 6. The pursuers are bound to make payment of the feu-duties in arrear, and to fulfil the other obligations of the feu-contract; and to this end, effect ought to be given to the conclusions of the counter action at the instance of the defenders.

The Lord Ordinary appointed mutual cases, and made avizandum to the Court, accompanying his interlocutor with the following note:

"The present action is raised upon articles of roup and a feu-contract, which were very recently under consideration of the Second Division of the Court, in an action between the same parties, brought by the trustee for the superior's creditors against Mr Anderson's heirs, for payment of the feu-duties of two lots of ground near Leith Docks, feued by the deceased John Anderson (predecessor of the pursuers) from Mr John Campbell, senior, W.S., in 1813. The Lord Ordinary (Moncreiff) and the Court gave decree for these feu-duties, chiefly on the ground that they were constituted by liquid obligation binding on the feuars, and that the latter could not set off illiquid claims for breach of the (alleged) counter obligations of the superior, which were held to be illiquid, by way of exception, against feu-duties then long past due. At the same time, the Lord Ordinary reserved the claims of the feuars, so far as his Lordship thought them prima facie competent, to be constituted in a separate action; and the Court afterwards, in still more ample terms, made a similar reservation, when they decreed against the feuars' heirs.—See reports, 5th December 1839.

"The claims thus reserved are brought forward in the present action, and as the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that, to a certain extent, they are founded in law and in material justice, while his views may possibly interfere with those expressed by the Court, though from the form of the action, not embodied in the previous judgment, he thinks it most suitable to report the present question to their Lordships, upon the full exposition of the argument of both parties contained in the revised cases.

"The chief claims of the pursuers, stated to arise as counter obligations against the superior under the articles of roup and contract of feu libelled on, are—1st, That the defenders, as representing the superior, shall furnish the pursuers with proper and correct ground and elevation plans of the street in which the areas feued are situated, and which the pursuers are bound to erect on the grounds libelled on. And, 2d, That the defenders shall form and complete the street along which the areas feued by the pursuers' predecessor were represented to lie, as well as the other street called Great Junction Street, as a necessary road of ingress to, and egress therefrom, and that they shall construct a proper common sewer, and bring in water, in terms of the obligations said to be implied on the superior, from the nature of the contract, and particularly from the sixth clause of the articles of roup,—the pursuers, as feuars, paying the proportion of the expense of these operations, laid upon their predecessor by the same articles. The questions thus raised may not, at first sight, appear of difficult extrication, but some of the points are of considerable importance in the law of superior and feuar in the neighbourhood of large towns.

"I. With regard to the pursuers' demand for additional plans which they call upon the superior to furnish, it is thought that that demand, at least to the extent made by the pursuers in their summons, is scarcely now an open question. It was fully considered by the Lord Ordinary and the Court, when the petitory action for feu-duties was before the Court in 1840; a clear opinion was then expressed, that it was the duty of the vassals themselves, under a sound construction of the articles of roup, to present for the approbation of the superior's architect, an elevation plan of the houses they intended to erect on the lots feued; and with deference, even if the Lord Ordinary were entitled to give an opinion on that question, he could not depart from the views expressed on this point in the interlocutor and note of Lord Moncreiff, under the state of the facts, assumed, when the case was formerly before the Court. To these it is sufficient to refer.

"It seems clear, both upon the articles of roup and contract of feu, that the feuars were entitled and bound to provide, at least, their own elevation plans, and present them to the superior's architect for approbation. This was probably intended to give some latitude to the feuars. They were taken bound to build houses not exceeding three storeys in height, but apparently, if placed within proper lines, the houses might be of such lower height, and after such fashion as were required for the business and views of each feuar. The opinion of the Court on this point seems to have coincided with that of Lord Moncreiff. Accordingly, the pursuers' demand for an elevation plan seems quite out of the question.

"But the pursuers urge a special plea with regard to the ground plan, which may deserve consideration. They state that by the second clause of the articles of roup, their predecessor was bound to build houses on his lot, which, 'in as far as the same respects Prince Regent Street, shall run in the line pointed out by the said plan.' Now the pursuers state on record (revised condescendence, art. 11), that the superiors 'have never provided any working ground plan of the stances for building, showing their area, angles, &c. &c., and in illustration of that averment, they add more specially in their revised case (p. 17), 'their readiness to go to proof upon their statement, that the engraved plans (in process) are perfectly useless as working ground plans.' To the eye of any individual unacquainted with scientific land surveying, the ample plan, No. 36 of process, appears to be quite sufficient to delineate the site of each lot. At the same time, if the ground is not at present in a situation to enable any architect for the feuar to prepare an elevation plan applicable to his lots, the Lord Ordinary is not prepared to say that the superior must not either furnish such ground plan, or so form and construct the street upon which the lots are situated, as to enable any architect forthwith to prepare an elevation plan for the feuar. In that view, the first claim of the pursuers seems in some measure to be connected with the second, which presents the most important question for the consideration of the Court.

"II. The pursuers' next claim therefore is, that the superiors are bound to form and complete the street called Prince Regent Street, in which the lots feued by Mr Anderson are situated. The pursuers' plea resolves into this, that their predecessor feued these lots as areas situated upon a street; that the seller came under an implied, if not an express obligation that a street should be made, and the necessary accommodations of water, common sewers, &c., therewith connected, afforded to the feuars, on their paying a proportion of the expense thereof, corresponding with the breadth of their feu, and that the superior must fulfil that obligation; or otherwise, that the feuar is entitled to be liberated from the contract, and to claim damages from the superior. The Lord Ordinary must own that he does not see any satisfactory answer to that claim on the part of the feuar in the present case.

"He is humbly of opinion that the articles of roup and contract of feu must, like other instruments of agreement between man and man, be construed secundum subjectam materiam. They relate, in so far as the feuar was concerned, to very small and valuable areas of ground, in close contiguity with a great town. They were represented as lying along a street, and the prices offered were those of high priced urban subjects. A feu-duty of 9s. 6d. per foot for areas of ground such as those here delineated amount to some hundred pounds per annum for each acre. Hence, before resorting to the written contract, the presumption ab ante is very strong, that a proprietor feuing and letting out such ground as part of a street, shall at least furnish the street along which it is represented that the houses to be built will be situated.

"But the implication arising from the written contract, as constituted by the articles of roup and contract of feu is, in the Lord Ordinary's mind, decisive of the present question. By clause 3d of the articles of roup, it was provided that 'each purchaser shall be obliged to pay a part, in proportion to the extent of front of his purchase, of the expense of paving and causewaying the whole street, and also the meuse lane after mentioned, and keeping the same in repair, and also of making and repairing the common sewers; and each purchaser shall have relief of one-half of the said expenses from the feuar on the opposite side of Prince Regent Street, when the same shall be feued.' It is apprehended that no plain man reading the preceding article, could suppose that only a part of the street was to be formed, when it was expressly provided that the whole street should be paved and causewayed.

"In like manner, the completion of the street was parenthetically held out in the 6th article, which enacted that the feuars 'shall also be obliged to pay a part, in proportion to the extent of their purchases, of the expense of lighting and cleaning the said street, which, it is hereby stipulated, shall be formed agreeably to a section corresponding as nearly as may be convenient to the level of Great Junction Street, which intersects Prince Regent Street, at the sight of the said James Gillespie, and John Paterson, engineer for Leith Docks, as also to pay their proportion of the expense of bringing in water.' Here it was provided that the street 'shall be formed,' and each party asks, by whom? and of course answers the question in his own favour, by alleging that the burden was not laid on him. But while the street must be completed by some party, it will be carefully marked that no more in any case is to be advanced by any feuar than a proportion of the expense of the street corresponding to the front of each feu. The contract, too, contemplates the very event which has occurred, of the whole street not being feued. The feuar on one side, is to advance the expence of paving the whole breadth opposite to his own lot; his relief from a part of that limited advance being secured when the opposite lot comes to be feued; but more is not required of him, whatever other portions of the street may be unfeued. How then can a Judge called to enforce these articles, find, first, that the whole street shall be formed, paved, and causewayed, and next, that one or two feuars shall advance the whole expense thereof, when the contract expressly provides that the feuars shall only advance a part of the expense, in proportion to the extent of their own area? Farther, when it was provided that a street shall be formed, and when each feuar's expense thereof was limited and defined, on whom was the remaining expense to be laid? It could fall on none else but on the other party to the contract—the superior,—who expected to reap a great advantage from these feus, and did obtain a most lucrative offer from the feuars who acquired any of the lots exposed under these contracts. In fact, if the superior was not to undertake this burden, the whole transaction must fall to the ground, as the articles would be inextricable, and inapplicable to the situation of parties if no street was ever made,—the formation of which was precedent and essential to the possession of the feuars, so as to bring their areas within the description, and to adapt them to the uses contemplated by the articles of roup.

"It is humbly thought, also, that there are other peculiarities in the present case, well entitled to weight in a court of justice. When the 6th clause, so often referred to, provides that the street shall be formed, without saying by whom, it must instantly occur, that if there be any vagueness and ambiguity in the clause, the exposer, from whom the articles flowed, should, in all conscience and law, be answerable for it. If it be a just and salutary rule of law in general, that obligations in dubio are to be interpreted contra proferentem, the maxim seems peculiarly entitled to effect in the case of a party inviting purchasers to a sale of his property exposed by public roup; and still more clearly ought it to be enforced when the articles have been promulgated by a proprietor who was an experienced practitioner of the law like Mr Campbell, and who, moreover, stipulated (articles of roup, art. 1,) that the whole rights, titles, and securities to be prepared in favour of the purchaser and his successors, 'are all to be expedite and executed, or taken by the said John Campbell and his foresaids, or their ordinary man of business for the time.' As it appears from the writs produced that the deceased Mr Anderson, the feuar, acted on this clause, and reposed exuberant trust in the superior, by employing no other man of business than Mr Campbell when he bid for these feus, his representatives are entitled, on the highest grounds of law as well as of equity, to the benefit of any ambiguity, if such can be traced, in the contract now under consideration.

"It is said that the present question arises from the failure of an extensive building speculation, which the feuars wish to throw upon the superior. But though the fact here stated be true, the inference of the defenders does not seem just. Unquestionably the hope of all parties as to the expected value of this ground has failed; and it is supposed that even if the whole of Regent Street had been completed, the speculation would have failed, and the feuars would still suffer a great loss, as their areas, instead of being worth 9s. 6d. per foot, might still not be worth half-a-crown. But the question is, if the feuars are bound to bear a greater share of loss? To hold that they, and not the superiors, are bound to advance the expense of paving the whole street, would be to throw on the feuar a part of the loss which naturally falls on the superior. In fact, if any feuars pave any other part of the street than that opposite to their own areas, the articles of roup contain no clauses, and provide no machinery for their reimbursement when the lower or higher parts of the street are ultimately feued.

"Farther, it is plausibly remarked by the defenders, that it is impossible to look round a great town without seeing numerous instances of single houses built along unformed streets, which remain for years as examples of the failure of feuing speculations in these districts, from which it is inferred that no superior ever undertakes the formation of streets. But it is obvious to answer, that no argument applicable to the present question could be drawn from these instances, unless the contracts or agreements were examined under which the lots were feued, and under which the houses have been afterwards held. The records of the Court attest that every different proprietor of feuing property has his own rules for the attraction or regulation of builders,—as in the neighbourhood of this city, Lord Moray has one set of rules, Heriot's Hospital another, while other proprietors of suburban ground about Stockbridge, Leith Walk, Newington, &c. &c., act upon their own views of what is most expedient and advantageous. The present case must obviously be decided on the contract libelled on, and on its own circumstances, which have been now brought fully into view.

"On these grounds, the Lord Ordinary would be inclined to hold that the second plea or branch of the pursuers' libel is substantially well founded. This is limited to the constitution of the superior's obligation to form and complete Regent Street, so far as not already formed and completed, and also the road or street called Great Junction Street, and to get the same opened, levelled, formed, causewayed and paved in a proper manner. No doubt the defenders have argued, that on the same principle on which the pursuers urge this plea, they might be called on to complete the whole of the numerous streets and lanes represented on the feuing plan. But while the pursuers urge no such demand, it is thought that as the pursuers' areas are situated both in Regent Street and Great Junction Street, they have a direct connection with, and interest in those streets, which they do not possess in any other streets. Then as the articles of roup (art. 6) provided, that Regent Street shall be 'formed agreeably to a section corresponding as nearly as may be convenient to the level of Great Junction Street,' the formation of Junction Street seems to be a preliminary operation indispensably necessary to the proper construction and completion of Regent Street. No doubt the fifth article provided that the feuing plans should be binding on the said John Campbell, 'only in regard to Prince Regent Street, where the same intersects Couper Street, and not in regard to any of the other streets therein laid down.' That clause may exempt the superior from any obligation to finish at present these other streets: but the minute of sale, entered into when Mr Anderson made his offer at the roup, specially declared, 'that that part of Great Junction Street which relates to the above stance' (i. e. Anderson's area), 'is to run in the line pointed out by the before-mentioned plan.' And therefore it seems plain that the pursuers have pleas relative to the completion of Prince Regent Street and Great Junction Street, which do not apply to the other streets, and which, accordingly, are not maintained in the present action.

"There are other conclusions of a very important nature in the pursuers' summons, into which it is unnecessary to enter till the extent of the superior's obligations is ascertained. The pursuers seem to have been subjected to heavy claims, and to a severe loss, which can hardly be laid entirely on them, if it shall be found that the superior and those in his right have failed, for the great length of time which has elapsed since the date of the feus, to fulfil specific obligations incumbent on them by their contract. But it is plainly impossible to discuss these till the pleas of the parties as to the legal construction of the original contract are disposed of."

At advising,

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The summons at the instance of Anderson's trustees is founded upon the articles of roup and the feu-contract. I don't understand how any presumptions ab ante can arise between a superior and vassal as to the formation of streets, or such like. I know no other measure of the rights of parties than the contract, and any such presumptions are pre-eminently hazardous. The feuar held under the articles of roup for a number of years—the speculation failed; and in 1825 a feu-contract was entered into containing obligations different from those in the articles of roup. The superior, wishing to lighten the burden on the vassal, relieves him from the obligation to build within a certain period, and gives up his claim for feu-duties prior to 1820. The contract being thus concluded, it is incompetent to look back upon the articles of roup, which are materially different. The contract mentions them only narratively, and is not in implement or pursuance thereof. It is in itself a substantive deed. The summons says the contract was entered into in pursuance of the articles, with the view of making them regulate the construction of the contract; but there is no warrant for this. Any reference to the articles is excluded by the completed bargain; and this is a rule which cannot be too rigidly enforced. The case is very short. We have only to compare the conclusions of the summons with the clauses of the contract. It provides, that when houses are built, they shall be in a line such as shall be pointed out by Mr Gillespie; but how can he be required to point out the line before the vassal is prepared to build? Then it provides that the houses shall be conform to a plan and elevation to be approved of by an architect appointed by the superior. This is no obligation on the superior to furnish a plan. Lastly, the vassal binds himself to be at one-half of the expense of making the common sewers, paving and causewaying the streets, &c. This is to be done by the vassal, and implies that he must pay one-half of the expense. No obligation is laid upon the superior. It is said that he must furnish the street, and he must pay in proportion to the ground not feued. I cannot agree to this view of the relative rights of parties. There is no demand made upon the vassal to build. In the action at the instance of Anderson's trustees, I would sustain the second defence and assolvie; and in the other action, repel the defences, and decern in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

Lord Medwyn.—The respective rights of the parties arise under the articles of roup and the contract; but it is a common rule, that prior minutes and communings cannot control a concluded contract. The contract here is different;—the articles are narrated, and may be used in explaining any obscurity; but we cannot import the one into the other. If a superior feus ground for houses, he must provide access to them, or he could not insist on payment of the feu-duties. But the feuar is not entitled to retain his feu-duty by merely insisting on access, if he has no occasion for it, and has not begun to build. The obligations are mutual, and it were unreasonable to insist on fulfilment by the superior, while the vassal has not put himself in a condition to insist upon it, by fulfilling his own part of the obligations by building. Till the pursuers do something to fulfil their own obligation, they can't insist on these accommodations. They do not say they intend to build; their object is to get quit of the contract. Matters are still in the same situation as when Anderson entered into the contract; and he continued to pay the feu-duty down to his death, without making any demand upon the superior for implement of these conditions.

Lord Moncreiff.—The case is to be decided on the special contract, and not on loose general law. Every question must be determined by a reference to the contract, which was entered into in the full knowledge of all the circumstances at the time,—which altered the articles of roup,—was implemented by Anderson, who took possession of the ground, and paid the feu-duties without objection till his death. A contract so entered into, and acted upon by the original parties, cannot be set aside by trustees. The contract is the regula regulans for determining the rights of parties, and the trustees wish to effect a total voidance of it. The same pretensions were set up in defence against the former action; but it was determined that the contract was subsisting and binding on both parties. I have just compared the conclusions of the summons with the clauses in the contract, as has been done by your Lordship, and have come to the same conclusion, so that it is unnecessary for me to go over what I have written. The obligations are laid upon the vassal, and not upon the superior. True, the superior had done something before the contract, and the obligation on the vassal is to pay the expense laid out. I can see no ground on which the case can be maintained. There was considerable speculation on both sides; if successful, it might have turned out of vast profit to the vassal; as it is, the risk may have fallen upon him;—but seeing that the transaction stood upon the articles of roup for fourteen years—that the original party then entered into a feu-contract, and went on paying the feu-duty till his death,—is it tolerable, that after the superior has been tied up all the while from doing any thing with the ground, that the vassal can now turn round and ask the contract to be set aside, unless this and that be done,—not one word in relation to which is in the contract?

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court sustained the second defence, and assolvied in the action at the instance of Anderson's trustees; and in the other action, repelled the defences, and decerned.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H.B.)

No. 125.—PETER GREIG and OTHERS, Petitioners, v. JOHN MILLER and JAMES NORMAND, Respondents.

Burgh, Managers of.—Lease—Statute 3 Geo. IV. c. 91—The managers of a disfranchised burgh are bound, in letting the burgh property, and in all their other proceedings, to conform themselves to the rules and regulations that would be binding on the Magistrates and Councillors.

The burgh of Dysart having been placed under the charge of three managers, Peter Greig, one of them, and certain of the burgesses, presented a petition to the Court, in which, on the allegation that Messrs Miller and Normand, the other two managers, had "pursued a system of managing the affairs of the burgh on their own individual authority, or by private concert between themselves;" that they had taken many steps "detrimental to the interests of the burgh," and, by these irregular proceedings, "involved its affairs in litigation and expense for objects of no public importance;" that they had "even, in some instances, taken upon them to dispose of the property of the burgh on lease, and otherwise," without complying with the provisions of Act 3 Geo. IV. c. 91, to which they, as judicial managers, were as much bound to conform as the ordinary magistrates and council would have been,—they prayed the Court to find "that the said John Miller and James Normand, jun., have been guilty of malversation in their said offices of managers of the said burgh of Dysart, or have acted irregularly and illegally therein, and to remove them from their said offices accordingly, and nominate other persons as managers in their room; so that the affairs of the said burgh may be fairly and efficiently administered; and to find and declare that the managers now and hereafter administering the affairs of the said burgh, are bound to conform themselves to the rules and restrictions that would be binding on the legal Magistrates and Councillors of the burgh, and that they are only entitled to act or interfere in the administration of the affairs of the said burgh, at regular meetings of the managers duly called, or in consequence of resolutions previously adopted at such meetings, and to enjoin the said managers to conduct themselves accordingly; or to afford the petitioners such further or other remedy in the premises as to your Lordships shall seem fit, and to find them entitled to expenses."

Messrs Miller and Normand denied the allegations of the petition, but admitted that, in terms of a resolution entered in the minutes of a meeting of managers, to which the petitioner, Mr Greig, had been regularly summoned, though he did not attend, certain premises of the burgh had been let without public advertisement for a term of years, of which the rent was to be highest at first, with a fall afterwards. They maintained, however, and offered to peril their defence on the fact, that the lease was most beneficial to the burgh, and the rent as high as any public competition could have obtained.

At advising,

Lord President.—The main objection to the conduct of the respondents is, the granting a lease of the burgh property without due advertisement. I cannot entertain a doubt that managers appointed to manage the affairs of a disfranchised burgh cannot be possessed of powers superior to those with which the law has intrusted the Magistrates and Council. The mode of procedure in letting the property of the burgh has been expressly declared on the authority of the Legislature; and without entering into the question, whether managers failing to comply with the terms of the Act incur its penalties, the point we have to consider is simply this,—seeing the clear line which that Act has drawn as to the letting of burgh property, can we possibly sanction the course which these managers have taken? I see no ground whatever to impute improper motives to them. I am not at all inclined to interfere with their petty squabbles. I look merely to this one transaction, and ask, whether a lease of burgh property so granted can be sustained? I have the greatest doubt of this. These managers ought clearly to have acted as the Town-council must have done. At the same time, I cannot see anything in their conduct implying such gross misconduct as to call for their immediate removal. That I think would fix a stigma on them more severe than the extent of their offence requires.

Lord Gillies.—I concur with your Lordship. These managers have been going on a wrong tack, in first doing the thing and then calling a meeting to approve of it. This was altogether irregular. It will not do to say that they were the majority, and could have carried at the meeting any course they had previously resolved on. We must suppose that they remained open to conviction, and it was therefore not impossible that the arguments of the other manager, if opposed to their proposal, might have induced them to change their opinion of its propriety. Then, as to the Act of Parliament, I agree with your Lordship that they were bound to have complied with it. It is said the lease was advantageous; but there is certainly something very strange in the fact that it stipulated for a fall in after years instead of a rise. There is still a question behind,—Have these managers been guilty of such malversation as calls upon us to remove them and appoint others? The affirmative is a grave conclusion, and I confess I am not prepared to come to it.

Lord Mackenzie.—I concur. I don't attach importance to the other allegations; but the one relating to the lease deserves attention. I don't enter into the question, whether the Act of Parliament applies to the case of managers, and annuls any agreement which they may have made contrary to its provisions, but certainly the existence of such an Act ought to have impressed them with the necessity of acting with eminent caution. As to the lease itself, I am not satisfied that it was disadvantageous to the burgh. On the contrary, my impression is, that it was a good enough bargain. Assuming this to be the fact, it appears that a wrong has been committed by these managers in the manner of acting, but that no harm has resulted from it. In these circumstances, I should think an admonition sufficient. The removal from a public office like this inevitably carries a stigma with it; and the consequence of resorting to it, unless on strong grounds, would be to deter individuals from accepting of the appointment. I cannot see any thing here to call for removal.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Find that the respondents, as managers of said burgh, acted irregularly and improperly in their mode of letting the subjects in question; but that the irregularity was not of a description to call for their removal from said management: Find that in their future proceedings as managers, they shall be bound to conform themselves to the rules and regulations that would be binding on the Magistrates and Councillors of said burgh, and that they are only entitled to interfere in the administration of its affairs at meetings of the managers duly called or authorised; and further, find that in respect of the impropriety aforesaid, the respondents are personally liable in expenses; allows an account," &c.

12th February 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J.W.)

No. 126.—A. B., Advocator, v. JANET CHISHOLM, Respondent.

Parent and Child—Aliment—Process.—The mother of a natural child having, for an onerous consideration, discharged all claims against the alleged father, and afterwards brought an action against him for inlying charges and aliment, in usual form.—Held that she could not pursue for inlying charges, or for aliment prior to the date of the action; but as she could not discharge the claims of the child, the action sustained for behoof of the latter, for aliment falling due thereafter.

Janet Chisholm raised an action before the Sheriff of Inverness, concluding against the defender for the sum of £5 of inlying charges at the birth of a male child, alleged to have been begot in fornication with him, and for the sum of £10 Sterling yearly for the aliment and support thereof, commencing from the birth of the child. In defence—while the defender expressly denied being the father of the child—he founded on a probative discharge granted by the pursuer, whereby, in consideration of two sums, amounting to £52. 12. 6., paid to her by him, she discharged him

“ of all claims and demands competent to the said child, or me as the mother of the said child, on account of aliment due or to become due, inlying charges, or otherwise, and generally, of all claims and demands arising from the paternity, or alleged paternity of the said child against the said A B as the father, or alleged or reputed father of the said child, on account of aliment, inlying charges, or otherwise, and of all action and execution competent thereon: And further, I, the said Janet Chisholm, bind and oblige myself to free and relieve the said A B, and his foresaids, of all claims and demands competent to the said child, or to me as the mother of the child, on account of inlying charges, aliment or otherwise, in all time coming.”

On 6th August 1840, the Sheriff

“ Repels the defence founded on the discharge produced, as ultra vires of the party granting the same; and in respect the libel is denied, allows the pursuer a proof of the same, and to the defender conjunct probation; grants diligence against witnesses and havers,” &c.

“ Note.—The discharge in this case is ex facie incompetent and null. It sets out by acknowledging receipt of two sums of money;—the first on or about 24th May, more than two months before the birth of the child; and the second, for which no date is assigned, being probably the further price paid for obtaining this discharge. The document produced bears to have been granted at the request of the defender, and is dated several months after the birth of the child,—its tenor being, ‘to discharge and exoner the said A B of all claims and demands competent to the said child,’ &c.

“ Such an attempt to get rid of an obligation, imposed alike by the laws of nature and of every civilized community, can never be countenanced in a court of justice; fortunately, in the present case, it is felo de se, bearing as it does in gramio, that it transacts the rights of a third party.”

The defender advocated under the 40th section of the Judicature Act, and pleaded, that “ the action being raised in name of the pursuer Janet Chisholm alone, and being founded on her own alleged individual rights, it is effectually barred by the transaction entered into between her and the defender, expressed in, and instructed by, the formal and probative deed of discharge produced by the advocate.”

The respondent pleaded—That the action was for behoof of the child, and no bargain by her could relieve the defender of his natural obligation for aliment.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, accompanied by a relative note:

“ 12th January 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the record, advocates the cause; recalls the interlocutor complained of; sustains the defence founded upon the discharge; assolizies the defender, and decerns: Reserving all the rights of the respondent’s infant son, of which she alleges that the advocate is the father, and of the respondent, or any other party, as administrator for this infant; and particularly reserving to the infant, and to its administrator, to raise an action for obtaining aliment, if due, from the advocate, and to the respondent her defences against any such proceedings: Finds the advocate entitled to expenses, both in this Court and in the Sheriff-Court: Appoints accounts thereof to be given in, and, when lodged, remits the same to the auditor to tax and to report.

“ Note.—The discharge is effectual as against the mother, but is of no efficacy as against the child. And therefore, if this action had been instituted by the child, or by any person, even his mother, as administratrix for him, the discharge would not have formed any obstacle. But, as the summons stands, the action is raised solely in the name, and solely for the advancement of the interests of the mother, inasmuch that it concludes for payment of the very inlying charges which her discharge bears to have been paid. If the advocate be the father, he is plainly bound to maintain the child; but after what has happened, it is not clear that he is obliged to risk what he may be liable to give, by paying it to the mother—which shows that her claim, and the claim of her child, are not necessarily identical. In the case of Pott, 7th December 1833, the action was not raised solely by the mother, but also by the child.”

The respondent having reclaimed, the Court held that she could not to any effect pursue for her own behoof; and as she must be considered to have defrayed the inlying charges and the aliment of the child prior to the raising of the action, out of the sums acknowledged to have been received from the advocate, the action to that extent could not be sustained. But, on the other hand, as she could not discharge the claims of the child, or of any one actually alimentering him, and as it was not alleged that she was unfit to take charge of him, while an infant, that the action should be sustained at her instance, for behoof of the child, for the aliment due subsequent to its date.

The following interlocutor was pronounced:

“ Recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary; and in respect it is not alleged by the reclamer that she has contracted any debt for the bygone aliment of the child at the date of the action, sustains the defences founded on the discharge by the pursuer against her claims for inlying charges, or for bygone aliment prior to the date of the summons; and with this finding remit the cause to the Sheriff: Find the reclamer entitled to the expense of printing the note; modify the same to three guineas, and decern.”

No. 127.—CRAIG v. THOMSON.

Process—Proof—Reference to Oath—Production of Documents.

A party having brought an action against his client, ninety years of age, for recovery of certain business accounts which had prescribed, the record was closed without any productions being made, and a reference was made to the oath of the defender. In the reference a summons was produced, and the defender was asked if he recollected of the action relative thereto—Held that the document might be shown, to refresh the memory of the deponent, but could not be used in evidence to contradict his oath, or be produced in process.

Act. Maitland.—Alt. Turnbull.—[J.W.]

SECOND DIVISION.—(J.W.)

No. 128.—THOMAS DORES, Pursuer, v. MESSRS HORNE and ROSE, W.S., Defenders.

Diligence—Reparation—Guarantee—Agent and Principal—Liability.—A creditor having obtained decree and diligence against his debtor for the sum of £102. 6. 9½., the agents of the debtor wrote saying,—“ we have now received authority to offer you, for an assignment of the debt and diligence, the sum of £85,” which was accepted of. Eighteen days thereafter, the agents wrote, stating that the party expected to make the advance had found it impossible to give the money. In an action against the agents themselves—Held that they were personally liable to implement the offer which they had made.

In February and March 1841, the pursuer obtained decree and sentence against Mr Hamilton Miller for the sum of £102. 6. 9½, in virtue of which he executed a charge against him, and thereafter obtained a warrant for his apprehension and imprisonment. In consequence, the agents of Mr Miller, the defenders in the present action, addressed to the pursuer's agent a letter of offer for an assignment of the debt and diligence in the following terms:

"We received your letter of the 6th. We are authorised by a friend of Mr Miller to offer you payment of the expenses in the action, and a dividend of 10s. per pound on the principal sum, and the ordinary expense of diligence (but not that unnecessarily incurred by sending to Aberdour, &c.) on condition of an absolute supersederes of diligence, and an assignation to the debt to the extent paid, so as to allow the assignee to rank on any fund which may be realised from Mr Miller's claims on the Dalawinton estate."—"We can assure you that Mr Miller has not a sixpence to pay this or any other claim; and we are," &c.

This offer was duly communicated to the pursuer by his agent, who was instructed by him to address a letter to the defenders, which he accordingly did on the following day (10th April 1841), refusing the same, but at the same time making offer to accept of 10s. per pound on the principal sum and interest contained in the decree, with expenses of process and of diligence in full, and to grant a discharge or assignation of the debt and diligence at the expense of the defenders' client, if required. The defenders made two several applications to the agent of the pursuer for delay in communicating the above proposal, which was accordingly granted; and thereafter, on the 21st April, they addressed another letter of offer to the pursuer's agent, in the following terms:

"We have now received authority to offer you, for an assignment of Mr Dorea's decree and diligence against Mr Miller, £85, which we hope you will accept." "Mr Miller is now at home, in a state of health which renders personal diligence out of the question, and with the exception of what may be recovered in a difficult and complicated litigation with the Dalawinton trust, he has no fund out of which you can realise any thing. We are," &c.

On the 23d April, the pursuer directed his agent to accept of this offer, which he did in a letter in the following terms:

"Edinburgh, 23d April 1841.—I am favoured with yours of the 21st inst., making offer of £85 for an assignment of Mr Dorea's decree and diligence against Mr Hamilton Miller, to which Mr Dorea agrees,—the expense of the assignation falling on your client. I therefore send you enclosed the decree, in order that you may prepare the assignation. I am," &c.

On the 11th May, the defenders returned the decree and diligence, accompanied with the following note:

"We regret to be under the necessity of returning the decree Dorea v. Miller,—the party from whom Mr Miller expected the advance to pay you the composition proposed, having found it impossible at present to give him the money," &c.

In consequence the present action was raised, concluding against the defenders to implement their part of the letters of offer and acceptance by making payment to the pursuer of the sum of £85.

The defenders pleaded—1. The summons sets forth no relevant ground of action against the defenders personally. There is no medium concludendi from which personal liability can be inferred against the defenders, in reference to a transaction in which confessedly they were acting as agents for a third party. 2. The defenders are not parties to any bargain or agreement with the pursuer, and did not become personally bound to purchase the pursuer's claim against their client Mr Miller, or to pay Mr Miller's debt to the pursuer, or any portion of it. 3. Separatim, and under reservation of the pleas above stated, The letters specially libelled do not contain or constitute a concluded bargain. Either party was entitled to resile, notwithstanding the letters libelled.

The record having been closed on summons and defences, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"5th November 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties, and considered the process, sustains the defences, assolizies the defenders, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses: Appoints an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits to the auditor to tax the same and to report.

"Note.—A party, though he may in truth be acting for another, may undoubtedly so conduct or express himself as to constitute an obligation against himself personally. This was the position into which the defender placed himself in the case of Sorley's trustees, 14th February 1832; and it seems to have been that into which other agents placed themselves in the English decisions referred to by the pursuer. These authorities only show that the circumstance of the obligant being an agent, and describing himself as such, are not sufficient to prevent his becoming obliged. But though an agent may bind himself, the question here is, did the defenders do so?

"Now the Lord Ordinary thinks that they did not. The letters, especially when read together, show that they merely communicated a proposal made by an employer, who is recognised by the pursuer as their client. Every letter bears this to be their situation. The only obligation constituted against themselves is, that they shall disclose the person for whom they profess to be acting, and this it is not said that they have failed to do.

"The pursuer says that the offer communicated by them obstructed his diligence. But if he chose to abate his diligence during the discussion of a proposal perfectly honest on their part, they are not responsible for this.

"If the defenders had been bound personally, the Lord Ordinary would have disregarded their plea, that the pursuer's acceptance of the offer was qualified by a condition not agreed to. Because their silence, after that condition was intimated, was a virtual acceptance of it.

"But he decides upon the ground that there was no obligation, beyond that of revealing their party, constituted against them."

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued, that a law-agent does not stand in a more favourable situation than a factor in mercantile transactions, who is presumed to know the circumstances of the party for whom he acts; and those with whom he deals are entitled to go against either him or his principal: 1 Bell, 492. Young, 14th December 1831. Stevenson, 25th July 1836. Burrel v. Jones, 3 Barn. and Ald. p. 47. The Lord Ordinary says, that the defenders are only bound to disclose the party for whom they acted; but they are bound to disclose one able and willing to pay. Miss Miller was not called in the action because her name was not disclosed till after the action was instituted. The pursuer has no case against her, as no mandate has been produced; but if the defenders hold an authority from her to make the offer which they did, they will have their relief.

Answered—The principle contended for goes this length, that unless an agent, before he makes such an offer, has taken from his client a written mandate on which action may be raised, he will be personally liable in implement. The question is, does Miss Miller dispute the authority which she gave? We say she is bound; and they don't say that she disowns the authority on which we proceeded.

At advising.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I cannot concur with the Lord Ordinary. In my opinion, the case is clear for the pursuer, but it is one of great practical importance. In March, Dorea held diligence against Mr Miller, and on the 6th of April, he writes inquiring whether he had any proposal to make for liquidation of the debt. Horne and Rose write on the 9th April—(reads letter.) This is an offer of payment, and contains a statement of Mr Miller's inability to pay one sixpence. Then comes the letter of the 21st April, making an offer of £5, and implying that the money was ready to be paid. It imports the belief of the agents that they had sufficient authority to make the offer, and amounts to a guarantee. The character and effect of the letter are most important. It relates to the matter of staying diligence when the creditor was ready to incarcerate, and when time was of the greatest moment. The party was a Sheriff, and no exertions would be spared by his friends in order to avoid what would lead to a forfeiture of his office. Here the diligence was to be immediately acted upon; and the letter imports immediate payment. One party was ready to imprison, and the other to pay. Where the funds were to be got, the creditor had nothing to do with. After caption, such an offer implies that the money is ready to be paid. If the pursuer's agent had sent for the money next day, with the assignation signed, the defenders were bound to pay. In many matters conducted through agents, they are, at the utmost, only liable for damage—not implement; but in an offer of this kind for staying diligence, all distinction between principal and agent is excluded. The offer succeeds, and the diligence is stayed. Their letter was a guarantee that they had the money ready on demand. The offer was not to be the commencement of new proceedings, but only payment, as if caption were in the hands of the messenger. Agents ought not to interfere, if not certain that the money will be provided; or if uncertain, they ought to make the creditor acquainted with it. In staying diligence, the party who makes the offer is truly the principal. The doctrine of the Lord Ordinary, that the agent is only bound to disclose the principal, is utterly inapplicable to such a case. If there is a principal able, bound and willing, to pay, then there will be no question; but it is not enough that the agent produce a principal able and bound. If not also willing, he gives only a law-suit and not payment. If he has mistaken the instructions of his principal, he must carry on the suit for his own relief. I don't go upon the specialties at all, but upon broad principle. It is asked, why does not the pursuer ascertain whether Miss Miller disowns the authority given to the defenders? But is that an offer to pay £86? The facts just show the duty and liability of agents. The agent ought to know and be sure of his ground before he makes such an offer. If the defenders have a written mandate from Miss Miller, they are safe; if they have not, parole evidence is questionable; and then, in an action at the instance of the pursuer, Horne and Rose would be objected to as witnesses without a discharge from the creditor, and thus he would lose his recourse against them.

Lord Medwyn.—I agree with your Lordship. I don't think that a law-agent in all cases incurs the responsibility of a mercantile factor; but he may so act as to render himself personally liable. When a party, on the faith of an offer, has done something which cannot be recalled, the agent is bound to produce a responsible person. Here the diligence was ready. The agents believed that the transaction would go on, and on the 23d of April it was completed. During all this time diligence was suspended, when payment might have been recovered. On the 1st and 11th of May, the pursuer remonstrates against delay, and then he receives the letter returning the decree, and stating that the party expected to advance the composition could not give the money. I do not see how the pursuer could have had any action against Miss Miller, because she had not bound herself, nor was he bound to proceed against her. The offer and acceptance being counterparts, and acted on for a month, it is too late for the defenders to disclose their principal in this process. They should have ascertained that Miss Miller was able as well as willing to give the money; and they ought to have avoided delay.

Lord Moncreiff.—I have given a great deal of consideration to this case, and I cannot say that I differ from your Lordships in the result; but I do not think it an easy case, and I would not throw out of view the specialties. For if an agent writes to a creditor in terms of the letter founded on here, for the purpose of staying diligence, and if immediately thereafter he wrote, stating that the party resiled,—and if he disclosed the party's name, and gave the authority on which he made the offer,—I see no example laid down, or decided in law, for holding that the agent would be personally liable. Gordon v. Hill, 18th November 1839, bears a little on one point. An action was raised on a prescribed bill. The pursuer was willing to compromise, and the agent of the defender wrote, saying distinctly, I offer £50 as a settlement of the case. Afterwards he discovered that the bill was on a wrong stamp, and then attempted to retreat from the offer he had made. No action was brought against the agent but against the principal, and the pursuer got decree. The party for whom the agent made the offer was solvent; and in the case I have supposed, I assume that the party is solvent. In such a case, I find no authority for bringing an action directly against the agent without calling the principal. Diligence is a much stronger case than any other, and the offerer should be prepared to pay; but I would be sorry to lay it down as a rule, that action could proceed against an agent direct, if he gives up a solvent party, and shows his authority. In the English case quoted, and also in Sorley, there was a plain guarantee. If the case were to be decided on abstract law, I think it a very doubtful case; but the offer having been made with the view of staying diligence, the agent ought to have been certain of fulfilling it before he made it. I cannot throw out of view the specialties of the case; but considering them, I don't see how the agents can be relieved. It is not stated that they had any authority from Miss Miller on which action could have proceeded. It is said Miss Miller does not deny having given authority; but that is not enough. It is sufficient for the pursuer, at the present stage, that her authority is not produced. Looking to the delay which occurred, and taking all the circumstances into account, along with the peculiar nature of the case—the staying of diligence—I think that the agents are liable.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

No. 129.—JOHN GREGORSON AND OTHERS, Raisers, v. ARCHIBALD EDWARD MACDONALD, Claimant.

Trust-Deed—Trustees, Discretionary Powers of—Process—Multiplepointing—Competency.—A testator bequeathed the sum of £3000 to his natural son, the interest of which he appointed to be applied in defraying the expense of his board and education, "until he make choice of a profession; and how soon my trustees are satisfied that he is doing well in such profession, and that it will be prudent to give him the command of the capital sum," to pay it over to him. The legatee, after having completed his thirty-second year, finally made choice of the business of a farmer, but had not taken any farm; and under these circumstances, required that the legacy bequeathed to him by his father should be paid over to him. The trustees raised a multiplepointing, for the purpose of having it determined whether they were warranted to comply with the demand. The action was dismissed, 1st, in respect of its being incompetent in the form of a multiplepointing; and, 2d, in respect that the question raised was matter for the discretion of the trustees in the first instance.

The question at issue relates to the construction of the following bequest, contained in the trust-deed of the late Alexander Macdonald of Glenaladale:

"Second, I leave and bequeath to my natural son, Archibald Edward Macdonald, the sum of £3000 Sterling, with which my lands and estate of Glenaladale are hereby burdened in manner after mentioned, and bearing interest from the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after my death, £1000 of which I appoint my trustee or trustees to invest in his or their names upon a redeemable annuity, the income of which to be applied in defraying the expense of the said Archibald Edward Macdonald's board and education, and until he make choice of a profession; and how soon my said trustees are satisfied that he is doing well in such profession, and that it will be prudent to give him the command of the foresaid capital sum of £3000, I hereby direct and appoint them to invest him in the right of the said annuity-bond of £1000, and convey to him such other security as they may hold for the remaining £2000, in order that he may be put in the absolute right of the whole."

The testator died in January 1815, and the claimant reached majority in November 1830. The £1000 referred to in the trust-deed was never invested upon a redeemable annuity, it being considered by the trustees and the claimant inexpedient and unnecessary. No part of the £3000 has ever been paid, and the whole of that sum, together with about £800 of accumulated interest, is now in the hands of the trustees.

After the education of the claimant was completed, exertions were used by the trustees to procure for him a commission in the army, but without success. The profession of a civil-engineer, to which he afterwards directed his attention, was also abandoned as unsuitable. The only other business or employment for which he has shown a preference, is that of a farmer, and for some time past he has been occupied in acquiring the practical knowledge necessary to qualify him for that line of life. As yet, however, he has not taken any farm nor commenced business on his own account.

Under these circumstances, the claimant having required that the capital provision left by his father, should be immediately paid over to him; and the pursuers having entertained doubts how far, in the right execution of the trust committed to them, they would be warranted to comply with this demand—the claimant having not yet entered upon a profession, it was arranged that the present process of multipointing should be brought for the purpose of having the question judicially determined.

The Lord Ordinary, after hearing parties on the closed record, ordered minutes of debate to be given in, and made avizandum therewith to the Lords of the Second Division, accompanying his interlocutor with the following note:

"The object of both parties in this amicable suit is, to have an early and authoritative judgment of the Court on the question that has arisen between them as to the construction of the trust-deed. To facilitate their views in this respect, the Lord Ordinary has at once taken the cause to report.

"Had he been to dispose of the matter himself, his decided inclination would have been to sustain the claim for Mr Macdonald.

"Apart from the words of the bequest, the material facts of the case seem to be these:—1st, That the trust-deed bears date in October 1815, and was apparently executed in the prospect and anticipation of its being speedily followed by the dissolution of the testator,—his death having actually taken place in January thereafter. 2d, That the claimant, to provide for whom was the object of the bequest, was then a mere child, not quite seven years old, it being admitted that he did not reach majority till November 1830. 3d, That with the single exception of this bequest, there were no means ever provided, or ever likely to be provided, whether for the claimant's maintenance and education in childhood, or for settling him in a profession in a more advanced age; and that as this was known to the testator (the claimant being his natural son), it is fairly to be presumed, that whatever directions were adjected by him as to the management and disposal of the fund bequeathed, the primary end and intent of the bequest must have been to render the same as available as possible for the claimant's settlement in life. 4th, That the claimant has now completed, or is just about to complete his thirty-second year, having still no other means belonging to him than what the bequest affords, and that after various attempts on the part of the trustees, first to procure for him a commission in the army, and afterwards to educate and bring him up as a civil-engineer, &c., which are admitted to have been unsuccessful, he has himself finally made his choice to follow the profession of a farmer, having (as the trustees themselves state, revised minute, p. 5), 'for a considerable time past been engaged in qualifying himself for following out that line of life,' though not having as yet actually 'taken any farm, or commenced business on his own account.'

"So far the parties are at one. But, while the claimant, on the one hand, demands his legacy, not merely as indispensable for enabling him to prosecute the farming business with success, but as essential even to his entering, with any regard to prudence, upon the responsibilities of tenant, by taking and stocking a farm at all,—the trustees, upon the other, hold themselves not in safety to comply, conceiving that, by the terms of the bequest, it is requisite that the claimant not only shall have made choice of a profession, but shall, moreover, in order to entitle him to payment of his legacy, 'have made such progress in it, as to afford reasonable evidence that it would be safe and prudent to intrust him with the entire command of the money.'

"The trustees do not allege that there is any thing in the conduct or character of the claimant to render it, in their own estimation, supposing them to have been vested with a full and absolute discretion in the matter, unsafe or imprudent to intrust him with the disposal and management of his own money. Neither do they say, that in proposing to follow the business of a farmer, he has made choice of a profession for which he is not qualified, or which he does not mean in good faith, and with reasonable prospects of success, to pursue. Finally, they do not say, that if he be to pursue it, the possession and application, for that end, of the money which he now demands, would not greatly enhance his chances of succeeding. The first element, therefore, for a decision in the claimant's favour, seems here to exist in its fullest force, viz., that unless from a supposed defect of power, rested on the express intention and will of the testator, the trustees have themselves nothing to object to the claim, and would not, on any grounds within their own mere discretion, have resisted it. Indeed, looking to the mature age at which the claimant has now arrived, and the acknowledged fact that nothing but want of the necessary means has prevented him before now from entering upon, and successfully prosecuting the business of his choice, it would be difficult for the trustees, in any pure question of discretion, to have arrived at any other conclusion.

"Accordingly, the trustees have hardly ventured to maintain, that but for the accumulated interest accruing on the legacy, and now in their hands, to the amount of about £800, which they represent as 'probably adequate to enable him to take and stock a farm in every respect suitable for a beginner,' they could have had any justification for withholding payment of the legacy. Indeed, had the interest been annually consumed, as the testator appears to have intended, in the expense of the claimant's education and maintenance, the trustees, before they could have made good such a result, must have been prepared to contend that the claimant, down to the very last moment of his life, unless he could successfully establish himself in a profession, without the possession of any means whatever, must have been content to see the provision left by his father for the express purpose of his advancement, remain wholly idle and unproductive.

"But this accumulation of interest, the Lord Ordinary is disposed to regard as a mere accident in the case. It was not in the view of the testator in making his settlement, and ought not, therefore, to be considered now, in any attempt to spell out his meaning. It might, besides, at any time have been put an end to by the claimant—as, indeed, it may be even now—by simply uplifting what is his own absolute property. Had it been so, the same abstract question, as to the true reading and intent of the trust-deed, and the powers thereby vested in the trustees, would still have remained. An imprudent and extravagant expenditure of the interest might no doubt have been dealt with by the trustees, in coming to a discretionary judgment, how far it might be safe to intrust him also with the principal. But where it is conceded that they have nothing, in point of mere discretion, to urge, where no objection has been taken on that head, and where the very accumulation of the interest speaks to the prudence and propriety of the claimant's past conduct, and consequently to the chances of 'his doing well in the profession' of which he has made choice—it is quite plain, that so far as the question of construction goes, viz., whether it be within the power or beyond the power of the trustees to pay this legacy—(the expediency, in mere discretion, not being contested),—this matter, arising out of the accidental accumulation of interests, can have no proper place.

"Is there, then, anything in the words of bequest which should, in point of mere construction, constrain and force the trustees to do otherwise than they would have been disposed to do, supposing them to have had unlimited discretion?

"1. In the first place, the legacy is so given, as ex concessis to vest at once a morte testatoris.

"2. There is no destination over, so as to raise a conflicting interest in any third party. The legatee is not to forfeit his right, happen what may. In no event is the provision to lapse, so as even to fall back into the residuary estate. Whether he choose a profession, and choosing it succeed,—or the reverse,—the power of ultimate disposal is with him. He may test upon it. He may convey it inter vivos. If he get into debt, his creditors may attach it. Even the interest annually to accrue upon it, is not secured from their diligence. It is not declared an alimentary provision, nor in any way protected, so as to be available against the day of misfortune. To what end, then, withhold it, when it may be best turned to account for his advancement? And why force him to dispose of it—at a loss it may be—by a sort of post obit transaction? If there be no good end to answer, it is not to be presumed that such was the testator's intention. He obviously meant to do what was best for the legatee. And without express words of positive and unbending direction, the construction which would lead to an opposite result is, in dubio, to be rejected.

"3. But there are no words of positive and unbending direction. The bequest itself is absolute: and, so far as there is any suspensive quality adjoined to its payment, not only is its existence left at best to mere implication, but there is a peculiar ambiguity in the expression of the deed as to the very term and endurance of the suspense. Thus, as to the income derivable from the £1000 appointed to be invested upon redeemable annuity, it is said that it shall be applied by the trustees in defraying the expense of the legatee's 'board and education, and until he make choice of a profession.' But what is to happen after he has so made his choice? Is the application of this income then to stop? The trustees, in this argument of construction, ought consistently to have maintained, that they have no power to pay the income, any more than the principal, until they be satisfied 'that he is doing well in such profession.' But this could never be maintained. And therefore, taking the clause as a whole, the Lord Ordinary thinks that, both as to income and stock,—the 'making choice of a profession,' when the income is to stop, and 'the doing well in such profession,' when the stock is to be handed over, are to be taken as equivalent and co-ordinate forms of words, and to be construed, not as inferring two distinct termini for two diverse and separate events, but as being mere duplicate expressions of what, in the testator's mind, had substantially reference but to one and the same event. There was plainly to be no interval between the cessation of the income, as referable to one event, and the payment of the capital as referable to another. The two branches of the clause, therefore, and the diversity of expression employed in each, must, in some way or other, be reconciled. Now this, as it appears, may fairly enough, and without any violence to the just spirit of the bequest, be done by holding the testator to have intended,—on the one hand, by 'the choice of a profession,' and on the other, by his 'doing well in such profession,'—just such a deliberate, persevering, and steady devotion of himself to a particular business or calling, by the legatee, and such a previous endeavour to qualify himself for its successful prosecution, as might entitle the trustees reasonably to infer that he would do well in it, without exacting, as an additional test, anything so extravagant and absurd on the face of it, as that he should actually have succeeded in settling himself lucratively in business, without either capital or assistance of any kind to start with.

"4. If, indeed, the opposite construction contended for by the trustees were to be adopted, the all but unavoidable result must be, that the legacy would not become payable during the whole lifetime of the legatee. It is very true, that as things have turned out, there is a separate fund now extant, to the amount of £800, from the accumulation of interest in their hands, wherewith, as the trustees have submitted, the claimant may probably be enabled to start well enough as 'a beginner.' But, as already remarked, this was not in the testator's view, and must be treated as an accident. What the testator looked forward to, was the advancement of his son, by the direct aid of the capital of the provision. He never intended that the best years of his son's life should be spent in idleness, in order to hoard up a separate stock, from miserable savings out of his annual income, wherewith to set him up at the ripe age of thirty-two, or later, in a comparatively trifling business by way of 'a beginning.' He left his son a child, and therefore naturally trusted him so far to the discretion of his trustees. But it was only to this effect, that they should be enabled to superintend his education, until, as the Lord Ordinary has proposed to read the clause, he had made choice of a profession. And how soon he had done this, under such circumstances as to give augury of success, and to satisfy them—for that, after all, is the substance of the matter,—that it will be prudent to give him the command of the forsoaid capital,—he enjoined them to pay it over,—having nowhere, it will be observed, given counter injunction that they should even, under any circumstances, withhold payment of the money altogether. The Lord Ordinary is satisfied that the money has already been withheld too long; and that it cannot longer be withheld without defeating the primary end that the testator had in view in making the provision.

"5. Finally, even if the claimant had refused to betake himself to any profession, and had resolved to employ his money, for example, in the purchase of a life annuity, the Lord Ordinary is by no means satisfied that the trustees could have refused payment. He understands the rule to be, that even where a legacy is expressly given to answer a particular purpose, if this purpose be disappointed, without fault in the legator, the legatee is still entitled to the legacy, it being considered that the property was intended for the legatee at all events, and that the mode directed for its application was merely a secondary consideration, and independent of the gift. In England, accordingly (and with regard to the construction of legacies our law does not rest on a different principle), Roper gives us an instance of this, the case 'of a sum of money being left for the benefit of an infant, as an apprentice fee, and he is never placed in the situation or character of an apprentice.'—(1 Roper on Legacies, 551; 2 Ib. 433.) But the present case is still stronger, for the legacy in itself, so far as the mere words of gift go, was not here given for any particular purpose. It was given absolutely, and was not made, either ex figura verborum or otherwise, defeasible upon any contingency. If the legatee, therefore, do not choose a profession, shall the legacy be postponed or forfeited? Or rather, shall not the directory words be made to yield to the shape in which the case actually presents itself, and (the supposed condition implied in these words being but of secondary consideration, and no longer applicable to the actual case) the legacy still be rendered available to the legatee, as a gift which was at all events, and under whatever circumstances, to endure for his benefit.

"There is a separate question raised by the trustees. Whether they be not still under an obligation to invest £1000 of the legacy upon redeemable annuity? But if the Lord Ordinary's view of the case be otherwise well founded, there would seem to be no reason why the claimant, now that he is sui juris, should not, as the sole party interested, have his own way as to this matter. He is now, according to that view, entitled to demand and discharge the entire provision; and even were an annuity to be purchased, he would be entitled, immediately on getting a conveyance to it, to dispose of it at his pleasure. Besides, as the sole object of purchasing the annuity was, from the first, to enlarge the income for the claimant's board and education, 'until he made choice of a profession,' now that the claimant has actually made that choice, there seems still less reason, than at any former period, to make such an investment. If the trustees, having the claimant's consent, were justified in not doing so hitherto, and, more especially, if their abstaining be placed, as they have placed it, on the footing that investment in that form was inexpedient, surely still more must they be justified, on the same ground, in continuing in the same course now, when they are about to make, once for all, a final settlement with the claimant for the whole provision."

At advising,

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I doubt the right of the trustees to ask the advice of the Court in this matter. If it was left by the trustees to their discretion, they must judge and act for themselves. Besides, a multiplexing is not the proper form of action.

Lord Medwyn.—I have the same opinion. Looking to the terms of the trust-deed, it is a matter of discretion, which the trustees must exercise in the first instance.

Lord Moncreiff.—If there were a question as to the power of the trustees, it would be different. But this is a multiplexing with only one party, and the trustees just want the advice of the Court. The discretion is with themselves, and it rests with them, in the first instance, to exercise it. If the beneficiary should be dissatisfied, he might then come to the Court and get an opinion. If there be any ambiguity in the trust-deed, a declarator may be brought; but the present form of action is objectionable.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court dismissed the action—first, in respect of its form; and, second, in respect that the question raised was a matter for the discretion of the trustees in the first instance.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

No. 130.—ANDREW CLASON, W.S., Pursuer, v. DAVID BLACK and OTHERS, Defendants.

Public Officer—Messenger—Reparation—Negligence—Process—Statute 1672, c. 6.—A messenger having returned an execution of a summons in which a number of the defenders were neither named nor designed, and the action having in consequence been dismissed, and the pursuer found liable in expenses—Held, in an action by the pursuer against the messenger, that he was liable for the expenses paid to the defender, and for those incurred by the pursuer himself, in raising, executing, and bringing into Court the summons in the original action, as well as in maintaining the same against the preliminary defence founded on the invalidity of the execution returned.

The pursuer, in the month of March 1837, transmitted to Mr Alexander M'Arthur a summons of wakening and transference, in order that it might be executed against such of the defenders in the libel as resided in the neighbourhood of Inverary. Mr MacArthur put the summons into the hands of the defender, with instructions to execute it, inter alios, against John Campbell, late of Craignure, and the defender returned the summons, professing to have duly executed the same against all the parties named in the execution,—in particular, against the said John Campbell.

None of the defenders called or cited to the libel lodged defences, with the exception of Mr Campbell, who proposed the plea of no process, in respect that the parties thereto were not designed in terms of law in the executions of citation returned by the messengers employed. This defence was founded upon the terms of the Act 1672, c. 6, which enacts, that all executions of summonses shall "bear expressly the names and designations of the parties, pursuers and defenders, and it shall not be sufficient that the same do relate generally to the summons, otherwise the execution shall not be sustained,"—the allegation in the defence being, that in the execution against the said John Campbell, a number of the other defenders called to the action were neither named nor designed.

The Lord Ordinary, 4th July 1837, sustained the dilatory defence, dismissed the process as incompetent, and found the pursuer liable to Mr Campbell in expenses. This interlocutor was intimated by the pursuer to the defender on 10th July 1837, and led to considerable correspondence. Ultimately, however, the defender wrote, 4th September 1837,

"I decline to give any advice, or to interfere in the matter, being satisfied that the alleged blunder is not one for which I am responsible, under all the circumstances of the case. I consider the objection untenable, and shall maintain the validity of the execution in any action to which I may be made a party."

In these circumstances the pursuer reclaimed against the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor; but the reclaiming note was refused by the Court on 21st December 1837, and the pursuer was subjected to Mr Campbell in additional expenses,—(Vide Vol. X. p. 171). Mr Campbell's expenses amounted to £26. 3. 2., and were paid by the pursuer. He also incurred the sum of £31. 4s. 5½d. in raising the summons and discussing the dilatory defence.

The present action is directed against Mr Black the messenger, and his two cautioners, and concludes for payment of the above sums, amounting to £57. 7. 7½.

Pleaded by the pursuer.—1. The expenses sued for having been occasioned by the negligence or want of skill of the defender Black, in the execution of his duty as a messenger-at arms, he and his cautioners are liable in reimbursement thereof to the pursuer. 2. There are no grounds relevantly set forth, or truly existing, on which this liability can be evaded; and more particularly, (1.) The alleged irregularity of the summons can form no justification to the defender for his neglect of duty, or for the erroneous and inept execution returned by him. (2.) The summons was not, in point of fact, irregular. (3.) Even the irregularities, as alleged, could only have rendered the summons defective as a warrant of citation against Mr Harkness alone, which might have been obviated by that gentleman voluntarily appearing, or by a supplementary summons; and this, again, forms no justification for the defender's contravention of duty in not executing the summons.

Pleaded by the defender.—The action is unfounded, 1. In respect that the pursuer has not suffered any damage through the fault or negligence of the defenders, or either of them, for which they are legally responsible. 2. More particularly, in respect that the pursuer's said original summons of wakening and transference was null, void, and objectionable, having been vitiated by erasures in essentialibus, having contained no valid and effectual will or warrant of citation, and having been inconsistent with, and unwarranted by the bill and the deliverance thereon, on which it bore to have passed the Signet. 3. That the draft of the defender's execution libelled, was specially revised and approved of by the pursuer's country agent, as well as by the pursuer himself, before appearance was entered under said summons. 4. As also, in respect of the difficulty of the question in regard to the formality of the said execution, and the general practice in conformity therewith in similar cases. 5. On the part of the defender Mr Black, the messenger, it is separately submitted, (1.) That the pursuer's claim is unfounded, in respect that the defender's execution was valid and sufficient, and conform to the general practice in similar cases: (2.) That the defender cannot, in any view, be liable for that part of the expenses claimed, which were incurred prior to the 10th July 1837, the date of intimation of the said preliminary defence to him as aforesaid. 6. On the part of the cautioners, Messrs Paterson and Livingstone, it is submitted that they cannot, in any view, be liable for the expenses claimed, seeing that they did not receive intimation of the said preliminary defence until long after it had been finally sustained by the Court.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"2d November 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties on the closed record, and made avizandum, repels the defences: Finds that the defenders are liable to the pursuer,—the defender, David Black, primarily as principal debtor, and the other defenders, Archibald Paterson and Donald Livingstone, conjunctly and severally subsidiarie as his cautioners,—primo, for the sum of £26. 3. 2., being the admitted expenses decreed for against, and paid by the pursuer in the original process at his instance against Mr Campbell and others; and also, secundo, for the expenses incurred by the pursuer himself in raising, executing and bringing into Court the summons in the said original action, as well as in maintaining the same against the preliminary defence founded on the invalidity of the execution returned by Black, as the said expenses shall be taxed by the auditor of Court between agent and client, with interest upon both sums of expenses from the date of citation in the present action; remits the last-mentioned account of expenses to the auditor to tax and report: Finds the pursuer farther entitled to his expenses in this process; remits the account thereof likewise to the auditor to tax and report, and decerns.

"Note.—1. On the main defence, so far as regards the expenses paid by the pursuer to Campbell, and his own expenses, at all events from the date of intimating the proceedings upon the preliminary defence, there can, it is thought, be no doubt that he is entitled to decree. The case of Henderson, 3d March 1831, is, to this extent, a distinct authority in his favour.

"But, even as regards the expenses incurred by the pursuer prior to the intimation, the Lord Ordinary has felt himself bound to adopt the rule of decision unanimously given effect to in the later case—Cullier, 6th December 1836; and to decern also for these. The present is, indeed, a stronger case in this respect than Collier's; for not only did Black here (to use Lord Balgray's words), 'allow the litigation to go on without objection, and would have taken the full benefit of it all, had it proved successful;' but he expressly 'declined to give any advice, or to interfere in the matter,' and insisted 'that the alleged blunder is not one for which I am responsible, under all the circumstances of the case. I consider the objection untenable, and shall maintain the validity of the execution in any action to which I may be made a party.' And accordingly, down to the very last, even in the present action, he has contended 'that the pursuer's claim is unfounded, in respect that the respondent's said execution was valid and sufficient, and conform to the general practice in similar cases.'

"Even according to Henderson's case, it would be but a comparatively trifling deduction to which the defenders would be entitled; for, in any view, the expense of raising, executing, and bringing into Court of the original action, would seem to be a loss of which they must relieve the pursuer. The question would thus be reduced to the mere expense of the Outer House debate on the preliminary defence.

"2. The other grounds of defence, the Lord Ordinary does not consider to have any weight."

The defenders reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Medwyn.—I do not think there is any speciality in this case to relieve Black. The country agent may have seen, but does not appear to have taken charge of the execution returned. Neither was it found to be incorrect, in consequence of the error in the will of the summons; but, in terms of the statutory law of the land, a messenger has a peculiar duty to perform, and he is bound to know the statutory law which regulates it.

Lord Moncreiff.—I am clearly of the same opinion. This was a statutory duty, and the messenger fails in that duty; and in consequence, the summons was found not duly executed, and dismissed. The preliminary defence was settled summarily, and there was no time for intimation; but the pursuer immediately thereafter gave notice of the interlocutor pronounced. I have not the least idea that the messenger can relieve himself by sending a draft of the execution to be revised by the country agent, who was not employed to do that, but merely to put the summons into the hands of the messenger.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I am of the same opinion. I had an idea that the execution was revised by the agent in the country, but this would not relieve the messenger, as the agent had no mandate from Clason to do so. Nor can I admit, that when a preliminary defence is stated, the want of immediate intimation will relieve the messenger. Often there is not time; and when a party receives an execution, he is entitled to hold it good, and go on to defend it—not certainly to any protracted litigation; but there is no such speciality here, and I think it precisely a case of liability for which the messenger must be answerable.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court refused the note, with additional expenses.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

NO. 131.—HERITORS AND KIRK-SESSION OF AYTON, Advocators, v. HERITORS AND KIRK-SESSION OF COLDINGHAM, and JEAN ALLAN, Respondents.

Parish—Commonty—Aliment—Usage—Proof.—In a question between two parishes as to the locality of the residence of a pauper, and the liability of the one or the other to aliment her—Held that as lands can be neither extra-parochial, nor belong in common and pro indiviso to several parishes, the different portions of a common, allotted in a process of division before the Court of Session, do not accrete to, and form part of, the parishes in which the different dominant tenements are situated.

Parish—Commonty—Title—Usage.—One of the allotments of a commonty having been feued out subsequent to a decree of division—Circumstances in which the usage following thereupon was found insufficient to annex the feu to a parish different from that in which it was described as lying by the feu-contract.

This action originated in a petition presented by Jean Allan to the Sheriff of Berwickshire, craving him to ordain the Heritors and Kirk-session of the parish of Ayton to modify alimient to her and her indigent family. The Heritors and Kirk-session put in answers, in which they submitted that the late husband of the petitioner possessed a property (of which the petitioner is liferentrix) situated in Coldingham Moor, in the parish of Coldingham, where he died, and where he had resided for five years immediately preceding his death. The Heritors and Kirk-session of Coldingham thereupon sisted themselves in the action; and the question at issue between the two parishes is, which of them is liable for the support of the petitioner? The solution of this question depends on the fact, whether the lands of Laverock Law lie in the parish of Ayton or the parish of Coldingham Moor.

Coldingham Moor, of which Laverock Law is a part, was a commonity surrounded by dominant lands, situated in several different parishes. In 1772, a process of division was raised before the Court of Session, and a claim having been made by Mr Fordyce of Ayton, in respect of his lands in the parish of Ayton, a share of the common, extending to 602 acres, was allocated to him in property, as part and pertinent of his lands. Soon after, Mr Fordyce converted his share into a separate farm, and gave it the name of Laverock Law. By a feu-disposition, dated 24th March, he feued out part of this farm to the husband of the petitioner, and the ground is described in the title as "lying in the parish of Coldingham, and sheriffdom of Berwick," &c. A record having been made up, and a proof allowed and adduced for both parties, the Sheriff appointed minutes of debate to be lodged in process.

Argued for the parish of Ayton—

In Carr's History of Coldingham Priory, it is observed,—"The parish of Coldingham is, with the exception of that of Lauder, the largest in the county of Berwick, containing within its area 57,600 imperial acres, upwards of 5000 of which form the extensive waste called Coldingham Moor." Again, at page 131,— "After the arrangement of parishes, the present parishes of Ayton, Eyemouth, and Coldingham, formed the then parish of Coldingham. At the Reformation, Ayton was disjoined from Coldingham, and united with Lamberton; but not long afterwards, it became, as it is now, a parish per se." According to the county map of Berwickshire, in the Scotch Atlas, and the large map of Sharp, Greenwood, and Fowler, published in 1828, the whole of the tract, known as Coldingham Moor, and in the very centre of which lies the allotment of Laverock Law, is entirely within the bounds of the parish of Coldingham. The terms in which the common is described in the decret of division 1776, are—"the commonity, commonly called the Commonity of Coldingham, or Coldingham Moor." In all the leases and feus of Laverock Law, the lands are described as "lying in the parish of Coldingham." Down to 1830, the whole of Mr Fordyce's tenants and feuars in Coldingham Moor, including Laverock Law, have been invariably charged for, and paid statute-labour conversion-money, as in the parish of Coldingham. Although feuars alone, and not superiors, are legally liable in poors'-rates, the feuars of Laverock Law have never been so charged in the parish of Ayton, and though charged for road-money, for two years subsequent to 1830, payment was effectually resisted, and at last, by a minute of the Commissioners of Supply, they were allowed to expend it "on the roads passing through their own lands." According to the law of Scotland, no land is extra-parochial. And the Moor of Coldingham was at no time common to several parishes, but belonged either entirely to one parish, or in distinct and separate portions to more than one parish. The situation of a common, as within any particular parish, cannot be affected by the locality of the several dominant lands whose owners have an interest therein. The only competent tribunal by which the boundaries of a parish can be altered, is the Court of Teinds; and the Moor of Coldingham, including the lands of Laverock Law, being locally situated within the bounds of the parish of Coldingham, and having, prior to the division of the commonity, formed part of that parish, no portion thereof could be transferred to, or fixed in another parish, by virtue of the decree of division pronounced by the Court of Session, or by any usage following thereupon.

Argued for the parish of Coldingham—

According to Chalmers, in the historical account which he gives of the Monastery of Coldingham, in his Caledonia, Vol. II. p. 226, it appears "that before the Reformation, the monks of Coldingham had acquired in proprios usus, the churches of Coldingham, Ald-Cambus, Ayton, Fishwick, &c.; a fact which shows clearly that both Ayton and Ald-Cambus were then separate parishes, just as much as Coldingham. The titles of Mr Fordyce describe his lands as all lying within the parochia of Ayton; and where a party is infeft under a bounding charter, by which his lands are expressed to lie within a particular parish, such limitation will form an absolute bar to his prescribing any right of property in lands beyond the boundaries expressed in his charter. Accordingly, if the commonity in question had been wholly situated in the parish of Coldingham, the proprietor of Ayton could not have been found entitled, in the division, to a share in the property of the common: Hepburn v. Duke of Gordon, 25th November 1823. 1st, It is admitted, that ever since the date of a division of the valued rent in 1779, the lands of Laverock Law have always been separately rated, and have paid cess, bridge, and rogue-money, and all other county burdens, as being a part of the parish of Ayton. 2d, Both prior and subsequent to the division, the lands of Laverock Law have always paid stipend, in cumulo with the rest of the barony of Ayton, to the minister of the parish of Ayton; and it is admitted that they have never paid stipend to the minister of the parish of Coldingham. 3d, It is further admitted and proved by the documents in process, that the proprietor and tenants of Laverock Law have always paid schoolmaster's salary to the schoolmaster of the parish of Ayton, and have never made any similar payments to the schoolmaster of Coldingham. 4th, It is admitted, that neither the proprietor nor tenants of the lands of Laverock Law have ever at any time been charged with, or paid poors' rates in the parish of Coldingham. 5th, It is proved by the lists produced, corroborated by the evidence of the sheriff-officer, that the residents on the lands of Laverock Law, including the husband of the present petitioner, were charged for road-money in the parish of Ayton, that warrants to poind were from time to time applied for, obtained and executed by the collector against the defaulters, and that although little was recovered in this way, no appeal was ever made on the ground of the parties having been charged in a wrong parish; and lastly, what is equivalent to actual payment, the parties so charged were allowed by the statute-labour trustees, upon their application to that effect, to expend the sums charged against them upon the repair of their own roads. 6th, That the persons residing at Laverock Law, liable to serve in the militia of the county of Berwick, were included in the militia lists for the parish of Ayton, and that none of these persons were ever included in the lists for Coldingham is proved by the lists produced in process. 7th, The notoriety of the fact, that Laverock Law was within the parish of Ayton, is farther demonstrated by the circumstance, that the inhabitants were included in the population of that parish at the last census of 1831; that they gave up their names for proclamation, with a view to marriage, there; that the persons resident at Laverock Law, qualified to act as jurymen, were returned in lists for that parish, and that they claimed and were enrolled as voters in the same parish. The lands of Laverock Law having thus, for the last sixty years and upwards, formed an undoubted part and parcel of the barony of Ayton, which is confessedly situated wholly within the parish of Ayton, and the said lands, and the owners and occupiers thereof respectively, having been, during the whole of that period, recognised and treated, in regard to all public and parochial burdens, rights and privileges, as a part of the parish of Ayton, these facts amount to conclusive legal evidence, that the said lands of Laverock Law do belong to, and form a part of the said parish. Laverock Law having been originally part of a common, in which the heritors of several lands situated in different parishes held rights of common property, in respect of the titles of the said dominant lands, and possession had by them in the common; and there being no evidence whatever to show that the whole of the said common was locally situated within one only of the said several parishes; and the state of the titles, and of the use and possession of the common, previous to the period of division, having been such as to exclude the application of the usual tests for determining the parochial boundaries of its different portions, the only rational and practicable rule for fixing that matter, after the division had actually taken place, was to hold the shares of the common, respectively allotted to the heritors of the said several lands, as parts of the several parishes within which the said dominant lands respectively lay.

The Sheriff-substitute pronounced the following interlocutor:

"5th December 1839.—The Sheriff-substitute, on resuming consideration of this case, with the minutes of debate for the heritors and kirk-session of the parishes of Ayton and Coldingham with reference to the subjoined note, Finds that the parish of Ayton is the parish liable in aliment to the original petitioner, Jean Aitchison or Allan; and remits to the Heritors and Kirk-session of that parish to take her claim under consideration, and dispose of the same in terms of law; and supersedes disposing of the question of expenses till it shall be ascertained whether this interlocutor shall be acquiesced in or affirmed by the Sheriff.

"Note.—By the decret of division, which is dated 12th December 1766 and 2d March 1776, and intervening dates, No. 81 of process, the common in question is described as 'the common of Coldingham, or Coldingham Moor.' No farther description is given to it in any part of the decret as lying in either of the parishes of Coldingham, Ayton, Old-Cambus, or Eyemouth. It appears sufficiently established that it never did lie within any one of these parishes, but lay before the lands comprehended in these parishes were separated into their present boundaries (at what period before the decret of division no evidence has been produced) in an undivided and unseparated state, in common, as parts and pertinents of dominant tenements, situated in each and all of the four parishes above mentioned, under certain rights of servitude to the other tenements not dominant. By the decret of division, to which all parties having any interest in the common were called, the Supreme Court accordingly found that the lands of certain heritors, situated not in one but in all the four parishes respectively, 'are dominant tenements upon the fore-said common, and have a common property thereon, and that the said heritors of the said lands have a right to draw a share of the said common, conform to the valuations underwritten of said dominant tenements belonging to them respectively.'

"By the decret, it was at the same time found that other lands were not dominant tenements, but had certain servitudes on the common, which, with roads, were provided for out of the measurement of the common before the respective portions, as parts and pertinents of the dominant tenements, were allotted to these tenements respectively in absolute property.

"Had the dominant tenements, in each of the four parishes, not been fixed by the decret of division of the common, and certain fixed portions allotted to them (supposing it possible, in that case, that a question such as the present could have arisen), it would have been a difficult matter to have ascertained the proportions in which each dominant tenement was liable in support to a pauper having acquired a legal residence upon the common; but the decret having fixed this, and allotted to the dominant tenements in each the part and pertinent which belonged to it, and that share of the common allotted to Mr Fordyce (whose dominant tenements, beyond a doubt, are situated in the parish of Ayton) being that part of the common now called Laverock Law, a part of which was feued out by Mr Fordyce to the petitioner's husband, and on which she has acquired a legal residence, the difficulty appears to be removed, as it can now be ascertained what portion of the common each parish has a right to as parts and pertinents of the dominant tenements.

SCOTTISH JURIST.

"If the valuations of the dominant tenements have, by the decret of division, in any case been taken in cumulo, where they lay in different parishes, in consequence of their belonging to the same heritor, in the event of these dominant tenements falling into the hands of separate heritors, and such a question as the present occurring, it may give rise to another division of the allotment of the common, so far as respects that cumulo valuation. Indeed, one instance occurs in the decret, where separate allotments were set apart to an heritor for his entailed, and another for his lands held in fee-simple. But no question of the kind arises in the present case.

"It cannot occasion surprise that the proof brought forward by the parishes of Ayton and Coldingham, as to the payments of burdens affecting that portion of the common allotted to the dominant tenements in the parish of Ayton belonging to Mr Fordyce, should not have been uniform, but the evidence brought forward by the parish of Coldingham much predominates, and is not to be overlooked. The common, notwithstanding the division of it, has continued to bear the same name which, in every probability, it bore before the separation of the dominant tenements into separate parishes, and certainly bore at the date of the decret of division, so far back as 1766, viz., 'the Common of Coldingham, or Coldingham Moor.'

On the 13th March 1840, the Sheriff having resumed consideration of the process, the Sheriff-substitute, as advised by him, affirmed the interlocutor appealed against.

"Note.—The Sheriff concurs in the views expressed in the note subjoined to the interlocutor appealed against.

"Whether the division of the district or barony of Coldingham into parishes was accompanied by an express declaration of a corresponding right in each of the parishes to a proportional part of the common moor, or the moor was afterwards regarded as situated partially in each of these parishes, which, in point of locality, it appears that it may have been, has not been shown, and it was not judged to be necessary in the process of division before the Court of Session, to ascertain. The parishes of Coldingham, Ayton, Old Cambus, and other parishes, obtained by that decree adjudged rights of separate property in what was originally a district common to all. If the name of the moor was retained from the original barony or district, and was not adopted from a locality in the parish of Coldingham as divided, the appellants have established no ground for holding that, beyond the proportions adjudged to dominant tenements in each parish, any part of the moor shall be held to be located in one parish rather than in another; while, so far as regards the understanding and conduct of the parishes of Coldingham and Ayton, and all interested, as to the locality parochial of the property in question subsequent to the decree of division, the evidence in process, whether of a nature more or less public, seems to leave little doubt."

The Heritors and Kirk-session of Ayton, presented a note of advocacy, accompanied with the following additional pleas:—1. According to the principles of the law of Scotland, no lands can be either extra-parochial or common to several parishes, so that whatever may be the rights of property or servitude over a common, it must be locally situated either wholly in one parish, or in distinct portions in different parishes. 2. As lands can be neither extra-parochial, nor belong in common and pro indiviso to several parishes, the rule contended for on the part of the parish of Coldingham, that the different portions of a common shall, subsequent to a division, accrete to, and form part of, the parishes in which the different dominant tenements are situated, is unwarranted and untenable, and would, if acted on, lead to the greatest difficulty and confusion. 3. An estate may be situated exclusively in one parish, and yet possess rights of part and pertinent over lands in other parishes, and even in parishes not immediately contiguous to the dominant tenement.

VOL. XIV.—No. XVIII.

The Lord Ordinary made avizandum with the process to the Lords of the Second Division.

At advising,

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I am not satisfied as to the manner in which this case comes into the Inner-House. It is a question of fact, in which the assistance of a jury would not only have been beneficial, but is almost necessary. Such questions are generally tried in England by a jury, and with perfect ease—(Burrel). I feel the more inclined to state this, as it may be remarked upon in the House of Lords, if the case should be carried to appeal. As to the documents produced, such as registers and lists, there is no way of ascertaining how they were made up; and the value to be attached to them was a point proper for the estimation of a jury. I doubt whether registers, embracing a period within the memory of man, are evidence, without the testimony of the parties by whom they were made up. If the keepers be alive, the registers are only secondary evidence of a very low character. There is no legal presumption that a commonity belongs to contiguous parishes, or to those within which the dominant tenements are situated. It cannot belong pro indiviso to several parishes. I never heard of a commonity in reference to parishes, or as parts and pertinents of parishes. A parish is territorial, and implies that it consists of a distinct portion of ground, however difficult it may be to determine the boundaries. Dominant tenements may have allotments of a commonity furthest removed from them; and therefore I never can hold that a division of commonity can have any effect upon the divisions of parishes. Laverock Law had no connection with the parish of Ayton before the decree of division in 1776; and the recent usage can be of no avail. The question is, whether the facts afford any presumption retro of a prior connection? The connection is by reason of the allotment alone, and is not only recent but insufficient. There is a good deal of secondary evidence which ought not to have been received; and in some instances it is not uniform. But I attach more importance to the titles which describe the lands as lying in the parish of Coldingham—particularly the feu-disposition granted to the petitioner's late husband. These titles commence when there was no inducement or interest to throw the lands out of the parish of Ayton. In all the cases, the utmost importance has been attached to the evidence contained in the titles—(Nith fishings). The older evidence leaves an impression on my mind that the moor belonged to the parish of Coldingham. The case of Hepburn is not applicable. Part of the commonity lay in the parish of Fetteresso, and Hepburn's lands lay in Fetteresso; and it was found he could not prosecute a division of the commonity beyond what lay in the parish of Fetteresso. But that case does not sanction a runrig division of parishes according to the attempt here,—nor does it establish that contiguous parishes may hold a pro indiviso right of property in a common moor. Whether Mr Fordyce could have prosecuted a division of the commonity, was a question in the process of division, and may not have been started. On the whole, I see no ground for holding that the moor was not in the parish of Coldingham, except upon the theories of the Sheriff, which I think inadmissible, and the usage, which is of recent date. On this question of presumptions, the case of Reid v. Mercer has a considerable bearing.

Lord Moncreiff.—I entirely concur. There might be a doubt in the minds of a jury whether the lands in question were situated in the parish of Coldingham or not; but it is impossible to go along with the principles relied on by the Sheriffs. It is impossible to hold that a commonity extending to six hundred acres belonged neither to one parish nor another, but was in all four separate parishes. I can understand that one part might be in each parish, and that, in a process of division, it might be ascertained which part belonged to each parish. That is intelligible. But the theory is, that the whole was in neither, but partly in each, and that when the division took effect, the parts were allotted—not to the parishes, but to the dominant lands which immediately fixed the parishes. Hepburn's case has no application; but it is said Fordyce's titles described his lands as situated within the parish of Ayton, and that the parts and pertinents must be within the same. This would be the theory of the Sheriffs; but I cannot agree with it. On the whole evidence, we must say that the feu of the petitioner belongs to one parish or another; and I think it belongs to Coldingham. Locally, it lies in the centre of the moor, away from the parish of Ayton. Usage is relied on; but the best evidence of usage is that in the titles of the feu itself, which Fordyce not only gave, but the feuar received.

Lord Medwyn.—If the usage had lasted longer, and if the evidence of it had been stronger, I would have thought it sufficient to join the lands to the parish of Ayton, notwithstanding their discontiguity. But I am satisfied that the usage is neither consistent nor old enough; and looking to the titles, I think the evidence preponderates that the lands lay, and must remain annexed to the parish of Coldingham.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

“Advocate the cause: Find that the parish of Coldingham is the parish liable in aliment to the original petitioner, Jean Aitchison or Allan, and remit to the Heritors and Kirk-session of that parish to take her claim under consideration, and dispose of the same in terms of law; and find no expenses due to either party.”

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

No. 132.—The TRUSTEES of the HARBOUR of DUNDEE, Pursuers, v. The MAGISTRATES of DUNDEE, Defenders.

Obligation—Contract, Mutual—Sale—Title, Delivery of—Price, Payment of—Statute 11 Geo. IV. c. 119—The magistrates of a burgh having, by virtue of an Act of Parliament, transferred their rights of harbour to certain statutory trustees, and accepted, in consideration thereof, certain bonds payable ten years thereafter, and that period having arrived—Held that the magistrates were entitled to withhold delivery of the disposition and conveyance, until the trustees should pay up the sums contained in the bonds.

By the 11th Geo. IV. c. 119, entitled “An Act for more effectually maintaining, improving, and extending the harbour of Dundee, in the county of Forfar,” the trustees to be elected in the manner appointed by the Act, and their successors in office, were erected into “one body politic and corporate, by the style and name of the Trustees of the Harbour of Dundee.”

The 38th section of the Statute authorised and required the Magistrates and Council, or managers ad interim, of the burgh of Dundee, on compensation in manner therein mentioned, to convey and make over to the said Trustees all right, or claim of right, which they had to the port and harbour of Dundee;

“and the said Magistrates and Council, or managers ad interim respectively, and the said Trustees were thereby authorised and required to treat regarding the compensation or value to be paid to the said Magistrates and Council, or managers respectively, on behalf of the community of Dundee, for the right, or claim of right, so to be transferred; and upon payment of such value or compensation, or satisfaction therefor, the said Magistrates and Council, or interim managers, were directed to convey the said rights, and claims of right, in manner before mentioned."

In terms of this section, the Magistrates and Trustees concluded an agreement, by which the Trustees, on the one hand, became bound to pay to the Magistrates and Town-council the sum of £27,500, as at the 1st September 1841, and to grant bonds for the same, bearing interest at the rate of four per cent. per annum, payable half yearly, from 1st September 1831, during which period of ten years, it was agreed that the said principal sum should remain in the hands of the Trustees at the credit of the Magistrates and Town-council, and that as compensation for all the claims competent to the said Magistrates and Council under the said Act, or, generally, as grantees of the port and harbour of Dundee. On the other hand, the Magistrates and Council became bound, in consideration of the said sum of £27,500 so agreed to be paid, and bonds to be granted therefor, to renounce and make over in favour of the Harbour Trustees, their whole rights to the harbour of Dundee, and rates and duties leviable thereat; and they farther bound themselves, at any time the same might be required, to grant a formal disposition to the said harbour and other rates, containing procuratories of resignation and precepts of sasine. In conformity with this arrangement, bonds or assignments were granted by the Harbour Trustees in sums of different magnitude, but amounting in whole to the sum of £27,500, as set forth in a schedule of bonds or assignments on the back of the deed of renunciation. The renunciation itself bears this narrative:

"And now, seeing that the said Trustees have, in implement of their part of the said treaty and agreement, granted, executed and delivered, or are about to grant, execute and deliver, in favour of us and our successors in office, bonds or assignments in conformity to, and in terms of the said recited Act, as specified in a schedule thereof hereunto annexed, and amounting in all to the said sum of £27,500 Sterling, of which bonds or assignments we hereby acknowledge the receipt, renouncing all exceptions or objections of the law proponable on the contrary: Therefore, and in consideration thereof, we, the said Magistrates and Council, have renounced, discharged and over-given, as we hereby renounce, discharge and overgive, to and in favour of the Trustees of the Harbour of Dundee, acting under and by virtue of the before-recited Act of Parliament, all rights, and claims of right, and claims of damages competent to us under the said recited Act," &c.

By section 62, the Trustees were empowered to borrow any sum or sums of money, not exceeding at any one time £180,000 in whole, on the credit of the rates and duties of the harbour, for the purposes of the Act, "and to grant, assign, and set over the several rates and tonnage, and other duties granted by the said Act, to any person or persons whomsoever who should be willing to advance and lend money thereon, for securing repayment of the same." All which assignments should be granted under the hands of the trustees, in the form prescribed by the Act. That form contains no specific term of payment, nor any obligation on the Trustees, either personally or in their corporate capacity, to repay the money so borrowed. On the other hand, the bonds granted to the Magistrates were made payable on the 1st of September 1841. They all contain (1.) an obligation on the trustees, qua such, to pay at that date, and (2.) a separate assignment in security to the rates and duties,—and in all of them there is inserted a clause of registration.

The Harbour Trustees having recently called on the Magistrates and Council to grant a formal disposition of the harbour in their favour,—and the parties having differed as to the terms in which it should be expressed,—the points of controversy were submitted to determination in the present action of declarator at the instance of the Trustees against the Magistrates. In this action the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor, dated 20th March 1841, approving of a draft disposition prepared by Mr Alexander Duff, W.S., and appointing the same to be executed by the Magistrates. Both parties acquiesced in this interlocutor, and the Magistrates accordingly executed a disposition in terms of the draft as adjusted. At the date of that interlocutor, the term of payment of the bonds granted for the price had not yet arrived,—the bonds being payable at the 1st of September 1841; but the Trustees having refused to pay the money, and the Magistrates having, in consequence of that refusal, declined to part with the disposition, the Trustees enrolled the case, and moved the Lord Ordinary for an order on the Magistrates to deliver the disposition. A note of objections was lodged for the defenders, and answers for the pursuers.

Pleaded for the objectors—1. In terms of the Dundee Harbour Act, the Trustees had full power and authority to treat and agree with the Magistrates and Council regarding the amount of compensation to be paid by them for the harbour, and other rights to be transferred by the Magistrates; and as the Act prescribed no limitation as to the time at which such compensation should be paid, it was also within the statutory powers of the Trustees to agree with the Magistrates that the period of payment should be postponed to any particular term that might be fixed, and to grant bonds or obligations accordingly, binding themselves, in their corporate capacity, to pay the amount at the arrival of such term. 2. The terms of the bonds actually granted by the Trustees for the amount of compensation agreed on, differing essentially, both in form and substance, from the statutory assignments to the rates and duties applicable to the case of borrowed money, in so far as these bonds specify a fixed term of payment, and contain an express obligation on the Trustees to pay at that term (over and above an assignment in security to the rates and duties), and likewise a clause of registration for diligence, prove conclusively that the consideration contemplated by the parties was not a mere assignment of the nature alluded to, but an obligation binding the trustees to pay at the stipulated term. 3. As the bonds granted by the Trustees contain an express obligation to pay on the 1st September 1841, and that period having now arrived, the Trustees are not entitled to demand delivery of the disposition from the Magistrates and Council, unless they themselves are prepared at the same time to make payment of the agreed on price or compensation. 4. In requiring the Trustees to perform the counterpart of the agreement, the Magistrates are neither disturbing the statutory arrangements of the harbour trust, nor imposing any hardship or inconvenience on the trustees, since these parties have it in their power, at any time, to raise on loan the funds necessary for paying the amount of compensation to the Magistrates.

Pleaded for the respondents—1. Under the transaction entered into between the parties in 1831, the compensation due to the Magistrates and Council for the transference of the rights of harbour, and other rights in question, was finally settled and satisfied, and no farther claim remained in the Magistrates, except under the bonds or assignments granted to, and accepted by them as statutory securities. 2. The Magistrates, under the transaction in question and subsequent proceedings, were truly divested of all right to the subjects in question, and cannot now plead that it is competent for them, on any footing, either to annul the arrangement then concluded, or to withhold the title which they were taken bound to grant at any time when required. 3. Under the terms of the disposition finally adjusted and executed by order of the Lord Ordinary, it is incompetent for the Magistrates to allege that they have not got full implement of the consideration therein set forth, or to retain the disposition until payment of the sums contained in the assignments, which they received in satisfaction of their original claim. 4. Under the mutual dealings of the parties, and in the whole circumstances of the case, the utmost that the Magistrates could demand under the assignments in question, as at 1st September 1841, was, that the Trustees, if not in a situation to pay the principal sums in the assignments, were bound to relieve the Magistrates of their obligations to the holders of the bonds, by paying legal interest on the amount; and as the Trustees have always been willing to comply with that demand, no farther claim is, in hoc statu, competent against them.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor, accompanied by a relative note:

"18th December 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel on the motion of the pursuers, the Trustees of the Harbour of Dundee, for delivery of the disposition and conveyance executed by the defenders, the Magistrates of Dundee, in terms of the deed of renunciation granted by them in 1831, as well as of prior judgments in this cause, now final.—Finds that the defenders are bound forthwith to deliver the said disposition to the pursuers; reserving to the defenders to take such steps for recovering payment of the bonds held by them as they may be advised, and to the pursuers all pleas against such proceedings, if adopted, as accords; and allows interim decree to the preceding effect to go out and be extracted, if the said disposition be not delivered on or before the first sederunt-day in January next.

"Note.—The Magistrates of Dundee, as representing the community, gave up their right to the harbour of Dundee and its pertinents to certain trustees in 1831, soon after the Act 11th Geo. IV. cap. 119, was passed, entitling the latter to acquire that harbour and the dues exigible thereat. Apparently after much communing, the price or consideration was fixed at £27,500, for which the Magistrates, in 1831, agreed to take bonds from the Trustees 'in terms of the Act.' A deed of renunciation accordingly was executed in November 1831, and bonds containing assignments of the rates for sums varying in amount, and extending in all to £27,500, were then granted by the Harbour Trustees to the Magistrates.

"These bonds bore interest at four per cent., and were not payable for ten years till 1st September 1841; the reason of such postponement, according to the view of the Harbour Trustees, being, that the money should carry interest only at that limited rate certain till 1841; while the Magistrates allege that the postponed time of payment was fixed to enable them, in September 1841, to demand payment of the price of the harbour in cash, if inclined then to call it up.

"From circumstances not fully explained, there was considerable delay in the adjustment and execution of a formal disposition and conveyance by the Magistrates in favour of the Trustees, in terms of the preceding arrangement. At length, in January 1840, the Harbour Trustees brought the present action against the Magistrates, to have them decerned and ordained to execute and deliver a valid and formal conveyance to the pursuers of the said Harbour, pertinents and dues. After the usual preliminary proceedings and debate, the Lord Ordinary remitted the case to Mr Alexander Duff, W.S., to hear the agents, and to prepare the draft of such a conveyance as appeared suitable to the previous arrangements and legal rights of the parties. Mr Duff accordingly prepared the draft; counsel and agents were heard thereon at great length; and the draft was finally adjusted, and the principal conveyance was executed in terms thereof in the month of April 1841.

"It was supposed that this exhausted the present action; but this has not turned out to be the case. The same delay in finally settling the question still occurred as had been exhibited in the previous stages. The disposition was not delivered prior to September 1841. By that time the nominal term of payment, during which the rate of interest was limited to four per cent., had arrived. The Magistrates then demanded payment of the principal sums from the Trustees. The latter resisted, and stated that they were neither bound nor entitled by the Statute under which they acted, to pay up the principal sums in the bonds; that the Magistrates, if so disposed, might now exact the full legal interest instead of four per cent., but that they could not ask more. The defenders, on the other hand, contended that a new ground had lately emerged, in consequence of the Trustees refusing to pay the bonds at the stipulated term, which entitled them, on the principles of common law, to refuse implement of their part of the contract. The case was assimilated to that of a purchaser who refuses, or is unable to pay the price of an estate sold, in which case the seller has right to retain the title.

"In order to bring that new plea in due form under discussion, the pursuers moved for a special order or decree against the defenders, to deliver the disposition and conveyance to the pursuers, as adjusted at the sight of the Court. After hearing parties fully on that motion (the pleas of the parties on reference to it being shortly exhibited in the objections and answers lately given in), the Lord Ordinary was of opinion that the objections of the defenders to deliver the disposition were not well founded, and therefore he has granted the motion of the pursuers on the following grounds:—

"1st, It is thought that the plea of the defenders is not maintainable in the present action, and under the terms of the conveyance executed in terms of prior interlocutors long ago final. By the narrative of this disposition (which so far corresponds with the renunciation executed by the Magistrates in 1831), it is incontestably established that the consideration stipulated consisted of bonds granted by the Trustees in virtue of their statutory powers. The said disposition sets forth, that 'the said Trustees have, in implement of their part of the said treaty and agreement, granted, executed and delivered in favour of us and our successors in office, for behoof foresaid, bonds or assignments in conformity to, and in terms of the said Acts, and amounting in all to the said sum of £27,500 Sterling, and that in terms of the obligation to that effect expressed in a discharge and renunciation executed by us in favour of the said Trustees, dated the 3d day of November 1831.' As the Magistrates have long ago got, and still retain these bonds, they are in possession of the only consideration stipulated for granting the conveyance, and the Magistrates must give the counter consideration for which they were granted, and forthwith deliver the disposition to the Trustees for the harbour.

"2d, With regard to the plea of the Magistrates, that a new and unexpected circumstance has emerged in the non-payment of the bonds at the stipulated term of payment, which entitles them now to withhold the disposition,—it is thought that this objection is not maintainable in this cause, and between the two sets of public functionaries here at issue with each other. If the Magistrates are advised, or sincerely think that they have now a right to be paid the amount of their bonds in cash, let them give a charge on the bonds. It is not thought that they can either reasonably or in consistency with the adjusted terms of the conveyance, resist delivery of the title to the pursuers, till the extent of their legal right under the bonds is tried. As the pursuers are public functionaries who cannot alienate the property conveyed, they are exposed to no hazard by delivery of the title.

"3d, It does not appear to the Lord Ordinary that the defenders have made out any case to show prima facie that they are now entitled in justice, or will ever be able, under any form of proceeding, to demand payment of these bonds and assignments in cash, or in any other manner than the other holders of bonds and assignments of the rates are entitled to make them effectual under the Act. It is manifest, both from the deed of renunciation executed in 1831, and from the conveyance lately framed and executed at the sight of the Court in this cause, that the bonds stipulated for by the defenders were specially declared in words that cannot be mistaken, to be 'bonds or assignments in conformity to, and in terms of the said Acts.' But on recurring to the Act 11th Geo. IV. § 62, it seems clear that the Trustees were only entitled to grant bonds to the effect of assigning the rates and dues; that no preference of one creditor over another could be given among the holders of these bonds; and that the Trustees were not personally liable for repayment of the same. The legal import and effect of these bonds, therefore, just was to constitute the parties creditors over the rates till their principal sums were paid.

"The Magistrates found strongly on the terms of the bonds granted to them; they state that they differed essentially from the style given in the Act (§ 62), in so far as there was here a specific obligation to repay the principal sum at a definite term (September 1841), together with a clause of registration in terms altogether at variance with the form and substance of the bond authorised by section 62. But the cause of any difference in the style seems to be self-evident. The style in section 62 of the Act was adapted to bonds granted for money to be held at the legal rate of interest. The Trustees in the present instance, however, stipulated for bonds more favourable to the trust than these, as the money was to be held at four per cent. for ten years. Even the provision in section 63 of the Act was not in all points applicable to the transaction between the parties, as that enactment contemplated the case of money being always capable of being raised to five per cent. at the will of the creditor, on six months' notice. But that was not meant here. It seems plain, therefore, that the bonds were framed in the present instance to meet a particular arrangement made by the parties respecting the interest, and by no means to give the Magistrates a preference over the holders of bonds and assignments.

"In all other points the Lord Ordinary conceives it to be clear that the Magistrates, as holders of these bonds, were to be subject to all the conditions, and to have all the rights of the other bondholders and assignees of the rates, and no more. It is not possible to give any other interpretation of the express words both of the renunciation of 1831, and the conveyance of 1841, whereby it was set forth that 'the said bonds or assignments were in conformity to, and in terms of the said Acts.'

"It is said that the bonds were conformable to the Acts, because the trustees were authorised by clause 37th of the Act of 11th Geo. IV. to 'treat regarding the value to be paid for the said right, &c., and it is said that, under this clause, the Trustees were authorised to issue bonds payable at a future day in money. But the same clause provided, that 'on payment of such value or compensation, or satisfaction therefor,' the Magistrates and Council should convey the harbour; and the Lord Ordinary conceives that it is proved beyond doubt, under the hand of the parties, that all interested agreed in 1831 that satisfaction for the price should be given in statutory bonds, with an arrangement as to the interest, not contrary to the Statute. Accordingly, it deserves very particular notice, that the Magistrates, since 1831, have had under their bonds the security which the Statute authorises, in assignments of the rates. These assignments they still hold: and their present proposition is to recover payment in cash from the trust-property, of large sums secured by assignments, before any of the other assignees of the rates are paid. This is conceived to be directly contrary to the Act. If, then, the predecessors of the defenders really had it in view to demand payment of their principal sum in September 1841, and at the same time, to hold legal assignments of the rates for a temporary term, they were attempting to obtain two sorts of obligation incompatible under the Act, and which the Trustees were not entitled to grant. The defenders, therefore, cannot in any form enforce their bonds and assignments to any greater extent and effect than 'in conformity to, and in terms of the said Act.'

"Finally, when the defenders referred to the style of other bonds and assignments as being different from theirs, it is impossible not to remark, that the latter were subsequent in date to the defenders' assignments, and apparently intended for loans on other terms than were agreed upon in reference to the price of the harbour."

The defenders reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Medwyn.—This appears to me to be a simple case. The harbour of Dundee is proposed to be enlarged, and the Magistrates are empowered by Act of Parliament to make over all right which they had therein to trustees, "upon payment of such value or compensation, or satisfaction therefor," as should be agreed upon. The Trustees are empowered to borrow money to the extent of £180,000, but the creditors are not entitled to exact payment unless the Trustees insist on paying only a low rate of interest. The compensation is quite distinct from the sums borrowed. The Act plainly contemplated that it should be immediately paid, but the Magistrates agreed to postpone payment for ten years; and the Trustees now say that the bonds granted are not payable after ten years, but that the Magistrates are in the same situation as ordinary creditors. They were entitled to payment at September 1841. The conveyance might have been granted within the ten years, but these have now expired, and the Magistrates are entitled to retain the title till payment of the compensation. In an ordinary purchase the bargain may be rescinded, but that cannot take place here; and the Magistrates are entitled to enforce implement by withholding the title.

Lord Moncreiff and the Lord Justice-Clerk concurred.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Find that the defenders are entitled to withhold delivery of the disposition and conveyance executed in terms of the treaty and agreement in 1831, until the pursuers, the Harbour Trustees, shall pay up the sums contained in the bonds granted by them in implement thereof: Find the defenders entitled to expenses of this discussion, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed accordingly, and further, as shall be just."

SECOND DIVISION.—(J.W.)

No. 133.—MRS ELIZABETH MADDEN and OTHERS, Pursuers, v. ARCHIBALD CURRIE'S TRUSTEES and OTHERS, Defenders.

Husband and Wife—Liferent and Fee—Destination—Sale—Implement—Title—A few-right of certain property was conveyed "to, and in favour of, Edward Kerr and Elizabeth Kerr, and to the longest liver of them two, in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the heirs of the marriage of the said Edward and Elizabeth Kerr; whom failing, to his and her own nearest and lawful heirs or assignees whomsoever, equally between them in fee, heritably and irredeemably." The husband having died leaving no issue of the marriage, the widow sold the property as belonging entirely to herself—Held that she could not give a valid title to the purchasers for the property sold.

The pursuers, on the 21st of April 1840, sold to the late Archibald Currie, hair-dresser in Greenock, a certain subject situated in the town of Greenock. The price of the subject was, according to the missives, £530 Sterling, and the purchaser's entry was to be at Whitsunday 1840. Archibald Currie, the purchaser, is now dead; but he is represented by the defenders, who refuse to accept from the pursuers alone a conveyance of the subjects as in implement of the sale. In consequence, the present action was raised, concluding to have it found and declared that the pursuer, Elizabeth Madden, has, by virtue of a disposition and sasine libelled on, a good right and valid title to the whole of the subjects sold to Currie, and that the pursuers are consequently in a situation to grant a valid disposition and title to the defenders, as the representatives of the purchaser. The title founded on in the summons consists of a feu-contract or disposition granted by the commissioner of the late Sir Michael Shaw Stewart, Baronet, whereby the subjects were sold and disposed in feu-farm and heritage for ever,

"to and in favour of Edward Kerr" (the pursuer's first husband), "and Elizabeth Morrison or Kerr" (the pursuer), "and to the longest liver of them two, in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the heirs of the marriage of the said Edward Kerr and Elizabeth Morrison; whom failing, to his and her own nearest and lawful heirs or assignees whomsoever, equally between them in fee, heritably and irredeemably;"

which contract bears the dates of 28th October and 24th December 1833. In virtue of the precept of sasine contained in this contract of feu, sasine was granted to and in favour of "the said Edward Kerr and Elizabeth Morrison, and to the longest liver of them two, in conjunct fee and liferent, and to their aforesaid in fee," conform to instrument of sasine, dated the 6th of February, and registered in the Particular Register at Glasgow, the 1st day of April 1834. Edward Kerr having died, and there never having been any children born of the marriage, his widow, the pursuer, maintained that she thus became sole fiar of the whole property under the foresaid feu-contract and infeftment.

Pleaded in defence—A conveyance to spouses in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the survivor, and their heirs and assignees, meaning the general heirs and assignees of the survivor, will vest the total right of fee in the surviving wife: Erskine, B. III. t. 8, § 36; Fergusson v. M'George, 22d June 1739, Mor. 4202; M'Gregor v. Forrester, 3d June 1831, 9 Shaw, 675, 1 Shaw and M'Lean, 441. But the case is different where the conveyance is to the spouses in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the survivor and the heirs of the marriage, and not to their general heirs and assignees. In that case, even though the wife survive, the fee is, by presumption, in the husband. It was so found in the case of Nelson v. Murray, Craigie and Stewart's Reports, p. 65. The same rule was recognised in the cases of Finlayson v. Finlayson, Mor. 12,874, and M'Donald v. M'Lauchlan, 9 Shaw, 269; and incidentally also in the case of M'Kellar v. Marquis, 3 Dunlop, 172, New Series. In the present case, if there had been no substitution beyond the heirs of the marriage, the fee, upon the principles above stated, would have been exclusively in the husband. The substitution that here occurs, "to his and her own nearest and lawful heirs or assignees whomsoever, equally between them in fee, heritably and irredeemably," may have the effect of giving to the wife the fee of one-half, but cannot have the effect of giving her more. In these circumstances, the defenders are not bound to accept a title from the pursuers, unless without delay an express conveyance shall also be offered from the heirs of Edward Kerr, after these parties shall have taken up by service the other half of the subjects.

The record having been closed on summons and defences, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"2d December 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel on the record as closed, and thereafter considered the title-deeds produced, and whole process, finds that in 1833 the deceased Edward Kerr, first husband of the pursuer, Elizabeth Morrison, acquired a feu-right of the property libelled on from Sir Michael Shaw Stewart, whereby it was conveyed 'to and in favour of the said Edward Kerr and Elizabeth Morrison or Kerr, and to the longest liver of them two, in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the heirs of the marriage of the said Edward Kerr and Elizabeth Morrison; whom failing, to his and her own nearest and lawful heirs or assignees whomsoever, equally between them in fee, heritably and irredeemably;' and that infeftment passed on this feu-right, in the course of the same year, in favour 'of the said Edward Kerr and Elizabeth Morrison, and to the longest liver of them two, in conjunct fee and liferent, and to their foresaid in fee.' Finds that a house was erected on these premises, and that Edward Kerr soon afterwards died: Finds it presumable that the said feu-right was granted by the superior in the above terms at Edward Kerr's request, and that the pursuer has not established, or alleged, that Kerr was under any antecedent obligation to take the right in these terms: Finds it not alleged that the expenditure made on the premises was defrayed by funds of the pursuer, or from which her husband's jus mariti was excluded: Finds that the said Edward Kerr died some time ago, leaving no issue of the marriage, and that the pursuer has since sold the said subjects as belonging entirely to herself, to Archibald Currie, now deceased, whom the defenders represent: Finds that the pursuer is not in a situation to give a valid title to the whole property to the defenders; and that, by the conception of the said feu-right, she was only vested in a contingent liferent of the same, and that her husband was fiar thereof during the subsistence of the marriage: Finds that, upon the dissolution of the marriage, the pursuer was entitled to claim one-half of the fee of the said property, as now belonging to her and her heirs, under the ultimate destination in the settlement, without prejudice to her right of liferent over the other half: And in respect this appears to be agreeable to the view of her right, admitted in the defences, on the whole matter sustains the defences, and assoilzies the defenders from this action: reserving to the pursuer to bring such action of implement or otherwise, as she may be advised, of the contract of sale libelled on, upon her tendering a good and sufficient title to the defenders, and to the latter parties their defences thereagainst, as accords: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses, as the same may be taxed by the auditor, and decerns.

"Note.—Had the property here been of greater value than it is, the Lord Ordinary would probably have ordered it to be argued in writing, as the legal construction of the destination on which the question depends is of importance in practice, and deserves to be deliberately considered. At the same time, as the case has been fully and elaborately argued at the bar, and as there are many precedents on record, having a close analogy with this case (though none in which the whole words used in the present destination occur), the Lord Ordinary has found little difficulty in satisfying himself that the construction of the destination founded on by the defenders is the sound one.

"The general canons as to the legal import of destinations, in conjunct fee and liferent, to spouses and their heirs, is nowhere better explained than in Professor Bell's Commentaries, Vol. I., p. 56. The rule which at first sight appears most applicable to the present case, is stated under the 5th head of his chapter on this subject, as follows:—'5. When the destination is to husband and wife, and the survivor and their heirs, it was doubted whether their heirs did not mean only the heirs of the marriage. But this opinion did not prevail. The fee was held to be in the surviving wife, or rather in the surviving party, whether husband or wife, on the principle that it was the heirs of the survivor who were substituted to the spouses in the nomination. And the cases of Fergusson and of Riddell, reported in the Dictionary, voce Fiar, (p. 4202,) and others, are referred to by the learned author.

"But the destination in the present case differs, in two important parts, from the preceding:—

"(1.) The right here was not taken to the spouses, and 'the survivor and their heirs;' but the first branch of the substitution differed in a material point,—the destination here was, 'to the spouses, and longest liver in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the heirs of the marriage;' whom failing, to his and her own nearest and lawful heirs, equally between them,' &c. The interposition of the heirs of the marriage makes an essential difference in the interpretation of the right. In the first place, it strengthens the presumption that the husband was meant to be the unlimited fiar, and to have the absolute power of burdening and disposing of the fee of the subject as he chose, probably in the view that such power in a father is in general expedient for the benefit of the children themselves. In the next place, however, from the effect given to the rights of the children of a marriage, the wife, under such a destination, has no more than a liferent, and has not the power given to husbands, which, in the quaint jargon of the old law, was conferred on them ob eminentiam masculini sexus. Accordingly, Professor Bell lays it down as a fixed point under his second head,—'it is a sufficient destination to give a fee to the husband, if the subject is taken in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the heirs of the marriage in fee.'

"There are various cases illustrative of that rule, which, indeed, has never been controverted; but the case bearing the most near resemblance to the present is that of Nelson v. Murray, in 1732, reported in Craigie and Stewart's Appeal Cases, p. 65, in which case a destination, even of the wife's estate, to herself and her husband, and the survivor, in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the heirs of the marriage in fee, was found, on the failure of children of the marriage, and notwithstanding the survivorship of the wife, to vest a fee in the husband and his heirs. To the same effect was the case of Edgar in 1727, (Dict. p. 4202), Watson in 1766, (4288), and the late case of M'Donald and M'Lauchlan in the First Division in 1831, (10 Shaw, 269.) In these cases, no doubt, the ultimate destination, failing children of the marriage, was to the husband's heirs and assignees; while here the ultimate substitution is in other terms, which remain to be noticed.

"(2.) The second peculiarity, therefore, in the destination in the present case is, that the fee-right is destined, on failure of the children of the marriage, 'to his and her own nearest and lawful heirs and assignees whomsoever, equally between them in fee.' It is apprehended that these words must be taken in their plain and obvious meaning, as a substitution of the heirs of each spouse to the extent of one-half only, and not as changing the right primarily given to the wife, which, without such a destination, would have been that of a liferentrix only, as to the whole, i.e. that of a fiar of the entire estate, one-half only of which is destined to her heirs. It would be a new application of technical rules and principles so to interpret the destination. Accordingly, there are various cases in the Dictionary, in which the legal import of provisions nearly equivalent (which seem to have been common in ancient times) is well fixed. Thus, in the case of Anderson v. Bruce in 1660, (Dict. p. 4332), in which there was a destination very analogous with the present, when the husband survived the wife, he was found to have the free disposal of a fund so secured during his life; and the wife, notwithstanding the substitution of her heirs, was found to be only a liferentrix. A similar decision was pronounced in 1697 in the case of Laws, (Dict. p. 4236), and lastly, in the case of Purdie and Ross in 1707, (p. 4238), where the wife survived without leaving children of the marriage, 'the husband's heir was ordained to procure himself infeft in the conquest, and to dispose the half, with warrandice from fact and deed, to the wife's assignee, though the husband was fiar.'

"These authorities appear to be sufficient to support the plea of the defender in the present case.

"Had this been a question between the husband and wife's heirs, the Lord Ordinary would not have given expenses to either party; but as the defenders are purchasers, having right to a good title, which it has been found has not yet been offered to them, it is impossible to refuse them costs."

The pursuers reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Justice-Clerk.—In this action the defenders plead, that the pursuer has not right to the whole subject sold, but only to one-half. It is fixed, that where a conveyance is to spouses "in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the heirs of the marriage," the fee is vested in the husband as much as if the right had not been conjoined; and the right of the wife is limited to a liferent. The case of Nelson v. Murray is clearly in point, and the case of Fergusson is not inconsistent with it. There are other and older cases in Bell's Illustrations, II. p. 555, and there is one referred to in the Lord Ordinary's note. The heirs in this case having failed, and the husband having died, what becomes of the other half it is needless to inquire. If the pursuer has not right to the whole property, she can't give a valid title; and that is sufficient for deciding this case. The first part of the interlocutor appears to me to be too special, and I should propose to take only the finding, that the pursuer is not in a situation to grant a sufficient title.

Lord Medwyn.—I concur. The heirs of the marriage always means the heirs of the husband; and in such a destination, although the wife survive, and there be no heirs of the marriage, the law holds that the fee is in the husband. A conveyance in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the survivor, is not of much importance, if also to the heirs of the marriage. The wife, in that case, only takes a liferent. The terms "to the survivor," are only of consequence when the further destination is "to their heirs and disponees."

Lord Moncreiff.—Although at the first I had some doubt, I concur in thinking that the wife in this case acquired no right to the whole property by survivorship, and this is sufficient for judgment. By a conveyance "in conjunct fee and liferent, and to the longest liver, and to their heirs," the wife has the fee if she survive; but here the destination is not to "their heirs," but to "the heirs of the marriage." By the heirs of the marriage, there is raised a positive presumption not to give to the heirs of the wife. Nelson v. Murray leaves no doubt as to the point here in question, although there may be some obscurity in the report.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Recal the interlocutor complained of; of new find that the pursuer cannot give a valid title to the defenders for the property sold, and assoilzie them from the conclusions of the action, and decern; reserving to the pursuers, within due and proper time, to bring such action of implement, or otherwise, as she may be advised, of the contract of sale libelled on, upon her tendering a good and sufficient title to the defenders, and to them their defences as accords; of new find expenses due to the defenders, allow an account," &c.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J.W.)

No. 134.—JOSEPH BROWN, Pursuer, v. JAMES GEORGE and OTHERS, Defenders.

Superior and Vassal.—Sale.—Retention of Title in Security of Price.—Contract, Breach of.—A party sold a property, and executed a disposition in favour of the purchaser, in virtue of which he was enrolled as a voter for the county, was entered in the rental-book of the superior, and obtained possession of the subjects; but it being admitted that the deed remained in the custody of the seller at his death, as a security for payment of the balance of the price; and he having died before completing a feudal title to the subjects—Held, in a question between his heir-at-law and the disponees of the purchaser, that the heir had the only good and undoubted right to obtain a charter from the superior; and that the disponees were not entitled to molest the superior in the granting, or the heir in the obtaining of the same.

Charles Brown, the brother and immediate ancestor of the pursuer, held, in May 1837, a certain subject in the village of Huntly. The original rentaller of the subject had been a John Allan. But the right and title to the subject had been transmitted to different individuals by means of deeds of assignation completed by an entry of the assignee's name in the landlord's rental-book, followed by possession. Charles Brown's own title was thus constituted. He sold the property to Robert Porter in Huntly, in whose favour he granted, upon 30th May 1837, a deed of disposition and assignation, conveying the subject to him and his wife in conjunct fee and liferent, &c. The price agreed upon was £190, whereof £50 was to be paid at Whitsunday 1837, and the purchaser engaged to grant a bill, and security for payment of the balance, with interest, within a year from said term, it being understood and agreed that no disposition should be delivered till the security was granted.

In reference to this agreement the following memorandum was found in the repositories of the seller, now deceased:

"Huntly, 26th May 1837.

"The cause of my having the title-deeds of the property I sold to Robert Porter in my possession is, that he could not find security to me for the balance due of the purchase-price, which is £190 Sterling. £50 was paid to me, being part of the purchase-price, and the balance, which is £140, is due, for which he is to pay me five per cent. interest until paid up, and I retain the title-deeds until the whole is paid, with interest."

(Signed) "CHAS. BROWN."

The following is the receipt granted for the £50:

"Huntly, 30th May 1837.

"SIR—I have received from you £50 Sterling in part of the purchase-price of £190 Sterling for that property in Huntly purchased by you from me; and having executed the deed in your favour to-day, I retain the same, along with the whole title-deeds, in my possession, as a security to me for payment of the balance and interest,—your entry to commence at 26th current. I remain," &c.

(Signed)

"CHARLES BROWN."

"JAS. SKINNER, witness."

"ALEX. STEWART, witness."

The summons bears, that notwithstanding the retention of the title-deeds, it was stipulated "that, in the meantime, the said Robert Porter should be put into possession of the said subjects, with right to claim and exercise the elective franchise, and all other privileges which could be exercised by a proprietor of heritable subjects burdened with an unpaid balance of the purchase-price thereof; and that the said Charles Brown should, if it became necessary so to do, to entitle his intended disponee to claim such rights, exhibit, but in the custody of his, the said Charles Brown's, own agent, a disposition of the said subjects in favour of the said Robert Porter." The above conveyance was entered in the rental-book of the lordship of Huntly in the following terms:—"Charles Brown disposed feu, No. 213, in favour of Robert Porter and spouse, and their family, on 30th May 1837." Porter at the same time entered to possession of the subject, and continued thereafter to pay the feu-duty or rent exigible by the landlord. Moreover, he was enrolled as a freeholder for the county of Aberdeen at the registration for the year 1838, in virtue of the conveyance from Charles Brown—entry in the landlord's rental-book—and possession of the subjects. Porter having become embarrassed, he, on the 23d May 1840, executed a disposition and assignation to the above-mentioned subject in favour of the defenders. This deed was delivered to the defenders, as the assignees, and was forthwith intimated both to the factor of the Duke of Richmond, the landlord, and also to Sir James Gibson-Craig, his Grace's commissioner. This is instructed by the following markings indorsed upon the disposition itself:

"This disposition was this day presented to me, and noted in the rental book of the lordship of Huntly."

(Signed)

"GEO. M'PHERSON."

"Huntly, 23d May 1840."

"Intimated 29th May 1840."

(Signed) "J. G. CRAIG."

Charles Brown having died before he had taken out a charter of the subjects, and completed a feudal title to the same in his person, the pursuer expéde a general service as his nearest and lawful heir before the Sheriff of Aberdeen, on the 5th of February 1841, which was duly retoured to Chancery. And he has brought the present action, concluding to have it found and declared that he has the only good and undoubted right to obtain a feu-charter from the superior, to the end that he may dispose the subjects in implement of the missives or agreement of sale entered into between his deceased brother and the said Robert Porter or his assignees, on payment of the balance of the purchase-price, or failing such payment, to sell and dispose of the subjects for payment of the said balance; and it being so found and declared, "Charles Gordon Lennox Duke of Richmond," the superior, and one of the defenders, "ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decret foresaid, to grant and deliver to the pursuer, and at his expense, a feu-charter of the said subjects accordingly; and the said other defenders ought and should be prohibited and discharged, by decret foresaid, from troubling or molesting the said Duke in regard to the granting of the said charter in favour of the pursuer, and the pursuer in obtaining the same, and making up a feudal title thereon."

It was pleaded in defence—1. That Messrs George and Falconer and Morrison, being now vested with the real right in the subjects, according to the nature of the title, the pursuer, as the heir of Charles Brown, cannot now claim any right in the property. 2. Charles Brown being bound to warrant the right, title, and possession which he granted and conferred upon Porter, the defenders' right and title of possession, onerously derived from Porter, cannot be called in question by the pursuer as the heir of Charles Brown. 3. In any view of the nature of the title, and of the pursuer's claim, he is nothing more than an ordinary personal creditor of Porter, and cannot therefore compete with the defenders under their title and possession. 4. The pursuer cannot claim the property, or the right to complete a feudal title thereto, in competition with the defenders; or at least, he cannot maintain any such claim unless upon payment of the defenders' debts.

The record having been closed on the summons and defences, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor :

" 25th November 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, repels the defences, and decerns and declares in terms of the libel : Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses : Appoints an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits to the auditor to tax and to report.

" Note.—It is clear that, as in a question with the pursuer, Porter had no right to dispoise in favour of the defender. He had neither a feudal nor a personal title to the subject,—no right or title whatever, either in law or in equity. On the contrary, the contract between him and Charles Brown was, that he was to get no title till he paid the balance of the price, and his attempting to dispoise to the defenders was a breach of this arrangement.

" Accordingly, all that the defenders have to say is, that they were misled to give him credit by his being put into possession, and by his being allowed to exhibit himself as the owner in the Registration Court. If the defenders can make the pursuer or the property responsible for their debts on this account, they may bring forward a proper claim for this purpose. But the only question now at issue is, whether they, as his disponees, are entitled to prevent the pursuer from completing his title with the superior ? The Lord Ordinary thinks they are not. They trusted to no saine—for Porter was not infest ; and those who trust to the mere possession of the person they deal with, or to their apparent right of real property, ought to know that they are liable to all exceptions competent against him.

" The entries in the rental-book, whatever effect they may have in any other action, can have no influence in the question raised in this summons."

The defenders reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Medwyn.—If the purchaser had paid the price, he would have got delivery of the disposition, but the seller retained it until the price was paid. If the disposition was delivered for a temporary purpose, such as to enable the dispoinee to be admitted to the elective franchise, but was thereafter returned, that was no delivery.

Lord Moncreiff.—The dispoinee might defraud the register, but he was not entitled to defraud the party.

Lord Justice-Clerk concurred.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor :

" In respect that it is admitted that the disposition executed by the late Charles Brown remained at his death in his custody, in terms of the letter in process, 26th May 1837, and receipt taken by Robert Porter, dated 30th May 1837, Adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and refuse the desire of the note : Of new find the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 136.—JAMES INGLIS and ALEXANDER HUME, Pursuers and Respondents, v. WILLIAM RICHMOND, Defender and Advocate.

Property—Possessory Judgment—Road.—An individual having, at his own hand, enclosed a piece of ground which a public body had kept for more than seven years under their charge, as part of a street for the use of the public, on the allegation that that body, and the public through them, had no title, and that he was the true proprietor—Held that the public body were entitled to retain possession until dispossessed by the order of a court of law.

James Inglis, clerk to the Commissioners of Police for the city of Glasgow, and Alexander Hume, superintendent of streets, presented a petition to the Dean of Guild, in which—founding on a Statute-Labour Act (1820), relating to the royalty of Glasgow, and vesting the management in fifteen trustees, and another Act (1837), transferring the powers of these trustees to the General Commissioners of Police, and empowering them to sue or be sued in name of their clerk,—they complained that William Richmond, merchant in Glasgow, proprietor of a wood-yard within the royalty, had proceeded, without consent or order of law, to enlarge his wood-yard, by erecting a wooden paling which enclosed a considerable portion of a public street and foot-path, which had been upwards of seven years under the management, first, of the Statute-Labour Trustees, and afterwards of the Commissioners of Police, for the use of the public,—and prayed that he should therefore be ordained to remove said paling, so far as it encroached on the foot-path and street, and restore them to the state in which they were previous to his interference.

Richmond pleaded, as a preliminary defence, that the Dean of Guild had no jurisdiction, as the object of the action was to dispossess the defender of an heritable subject in which he was infest, and in the actual possession. This defence having been repelled by an interlocutor, which " sustained the competency of the Court to the effect of regulating the interim possession of the piece of ground in dispute ; reserving to the defender to establish his heritable right to the said piece of ground in the competent action and in the competent Court."

Richmond pleaded on the merits—1. The defender, as absolute proprietor of, and infest in the subjects in question, was entitled to make the enclosure complained of. 2. The pursuers, or the public whom they profess to represent, cannot acquire a right of property in a street or passage, except in one or other of two ways ; 1st, by a regular feudal title ; or, 2d, by uninterrupted possession for forty years. 3. The pursuers do not claim in respect of either of these rights. They have not founded upon any title whatever. 4. Although the ground in dispute had remained unenclosed, and had been used as a street for ten, twenty, or thirty years, this would not imply a right of permanent occupation on the part of the public, without a proper title. 5. It is not competent to the Dean of Guild to prevent a proprietor from building or enclosing to the extreme verge of his property, although his doing so should obviously interfere with the public convenience : Smellie, 12th May 1803 ; Dict. 7588. 6. The present action is incompetent in your Lordship's Court. Its object is to dispossess the defender of an heritable subject in which he is infest, and of which he is in the actual possession. It is competent to the Supreme Court only.

The pursuers pleaded—1. The defender having made the erection complained of, enclosing and appropriating to himself the ground in dispute, vi aut clam, he is bound, and the Court is amply warranted to order restitution of the possession, irrespective of, and without inquiring into, the defender's alleged right of property. 2. But esto that the defender could be allowed to justify his forcible aggression on the street, by alleging, or even proving that the ground in dispute was originally private property, and has been conveyed to him, he could not succeed in his present attempt to deprive the Statute-Labour Trustees and the public of the possession enjoyed for upwards of seven years. 3. The defender's predecessors having ceded the ground in dispute for the purpose of forming London Street, as laid down on the plan of 1827, if it was private property previously, the defender cannot now claim the ground as private property.

A proof having been led, the Dean of Guild pronounced decree in terms of the prayer of the petition.

Richmond advocated, and put in an additional plea, to the effect that he had raised a declarator, and that the possessory question ought to be sisted until the declarator was decided.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"18th January 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel for the parties, and thereafter made avizandum to himself with the whole process, Finds it proved in matter of fact, that the pursuers, in behalf of the public, have for upwards of seven years had possession of the area or stripe of ground claimed by them as part of the public street: Finds, in matter of law, that the pursuers, under the Acts of Parliament referred to in their complaint, have the rights and powers belonging to the Statute-Labour Trustees, and have charge of the public streets, &c., within the royalty of the city of Glasgow; and that the ground in question having been for more than seven years a part of the streets within the royalty of the said town, they are entitled to retain possession of it, and to prevent the defender from inverting that possession via facti, until they shall be dispossessed by the order of a court of law: Therefore remits the cause simpliciter to the Inferior Court, and deerns: Finds expenses, both in this Court and the Inferior Court, due; allows an account of the expenses in this Court to be given in, and, when lodged, remits to the auditor to tax the same and to report.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary, after hearing parties fully, has not discovered any sufficient ground for altering the judgment pronounced in the Inferior Court, although the case was argued with great zeal and ability by the advocate's counsel. The advocate does not dispute that the Police Commissioners are now the Statute-Labour Commissioners for the city of Glasgow, and that their clerk, supposing this to be a street falling under their charge, has a title to present a complaint of this nature, where any encroachment is made on the streets that fall under their superintendence. The plea chiefly urged by the defender is, that the ground in question belonged to certain commissioners appointed by the 5th Geo. IV. cap. 69, for amending a former Act for opening a street from the Cross of Glasgow to Monteith Row, and that the property having been acquired and vested in them under that Act of Parliament, they had no power, unless by a sale in terms of the Act of Parliament, to make over any part of it (even the street) to the Statute-Labour Trustees, or any other persons; and that the Statute-Labour Trustees, on the other hand, having obtained no conveyance to it, had no right to apply the statute-labour funds to it, or to possess it as one of the streets falling under their management and superintendence: that they therefore have no sufficient title upon which they can found a possessory action; while, on the other hand, the defender has received a direct conveyance under the Statute from persons to whom the ground in question, including this stripe, was disposed by the London Street Commissioners in 1837 under the Act of Parliament: Therefore, that while there is a direct real right on his part under the Statute, the pursuers have no title to which they can ascribe the possession which they have had.

"It appears to the Lord Ordinary, that if this had been possessed for a period exceeding seven years as one of the public streets within the royalty of Glasgow, the pursuers had a good title to complain of any encroachment made upon it. The Statute 1 Geo. IV. cap. 88 (1820), the first object of which is declared to be for amending the 47th Geo. III. cap. 45, relative to the statute-labour of the royalty of Glasgow, declares, section 22, that that Statute, so far as not altered, shall remain in force and be construed as one Act. Sections 11 and 14 of the 47th Geo. III., taken along with the 1st Geo. IV., of which they must be held to form a part, give ample powers to the Statute-Labour Trustees for the royalty of Glasgow (which the complainers are admitted to have become under the Statute in 1837, referred to) to take charge of, and apply the statute-labour funds to all streets within the royalty of Glasgow. The question comes therefore to be, has this been a street for more than seven years within the city of Glasgow? The defender says no. It remained the exclusive property of the London Street Commissioners, who had no power to give it up to the Statute-Labour Trustees, and they sold and conveyed it, including the disputed ground, to the defender.

"That this street has de facto been paved and possessed as a street is abundantly proved. But it is said it illegally became such, and remained the property of the Commissioners when they made the conveyance to the defender's authors in 1837. This makes it necessary to look at the Statute under which this street or way was opened. The third object of the 1st Geo. IV. cap. 88, section 30, was to open a new street from Great Hamilton Street or Monteith Row to the Cross of Glasgow. That was the communication in question, but the Magistrates were unable to accomplish it, and therefore the 5th Geo. IV. cap. 69 (1824), was passed for the purpose of amending the former Statute, and for opening a street from the Cross of Glasgow to Monteith Row. Certain commissioners were named, and all who should subscribe not less than a hundred pounds for making the street were appointed commissioners for opening, causewaying and paving the said street, which it is declared shall be called London Street. A particular form of conveyance to purchasers is fixed in the Statute. The 15th section, upon which the defender founds, declares the capital stock, property of and in the said street, and of the lands and grounds through which the said street is to be carried, &c., to be vested in the subscribers. The 16th section empowers them to sell the grounds or lands to be acquired by them on each side of the said street, and the buildings or other heritages thereon. The Act contains no clause relative to making over the street to the Statute-Labour Commissioners, from which the defender argues it could not be legally made over to the Statute-Labour Commissioners, or come under their management. The Lord Ordinary has, however, come to the opposite conclusion. The object of the Statute 1 Geo. IV. cap. 88, as well as that of 5 Geo. IV. cap. 69, which was passed to amend, is to open a new street from Hamilton Street or Monteith Row to the Cross of Glasgow, —and such street was intended, when finished and opened, to form one of the streets of Glasgow. That being the obvious intention of the Act, it required no special enactment to provide that the street or communication, when opened, was to fall under the management of those who were by law intrusted with the charge of the streets of Glasgow. It was the apparent object of the Statute that it should be so; and if it had been intended that the street should remain, after it was completed and opened, in possession of the London Street Commissioners, clauses would have been required for that purpose, and for upholding and repairing it, and managing it separately from the other streets in Glasgow. The defender has referred to St

John's Street in Edinburgh, as an instance of a street remaining shut up, and separately possessed by the proprietors alone, and maintained by them. If that is the case, it is evidently the exception in opposition to the general rule, that all streets and roads, when opened, fall under the superintendence and management of those who by law are intrusted with the management of roads and streets within certain limits, and levy rates for the purpose of maintaining them. Where a new street is to be made, paved, and opened by certain commissioners, who undertake the expense of doing so, there may be a certain period, before the buildings are finished, during which it may be considered under their intermediate management, and as not fully completed and opened for the public. In this case, it appears from minutes of the Statute-Labour Trustees, that on the 30th October 1827, the London Street Commissioners had applied, through their architect Mr Weir, to the Statute-Labour Trustees, to relay a part of the causeway, previous to London Street being opened for carriages, and a small sum was granted. In 1828 there was a further application from the treasurer to the London Street Company, for payment of the expense of causewaying. The consideration of that application was however delayed till a future period by the Statute-Labour Trustees. On the 7th of December 1829, there is a renewed application by the commissioners for London Street, stating that a great proportion of the intercourse from the east passes through that street, and that consequently much of the expense of keeping the Gallowgate is saved. This renewed application is referred to the superintendent by the Statute-Labour Trustees, who, in his report, complains of the want of proper fence-walls and parapets. On the 16th of July 1832, the London Street Commissioners presented a petition to the Statute-Labour Trustees, in which they set forth, that in the years 1824, 1825, and 1826, they had opened this new street, and that it had been made use of for some years as a great leading thoroughfare into the city; and that they had been refused the money laid out for causewaying, on the ground that the street was not two-thirds built upon. After another report, the Statute-Labour Trustees agree to take the whole street under their protection in future, and to pay the London Street Commissioners £110 as a compensation for the materials laid on the street; and a receipt for that money, dated 6th October 1832, is produced. The defender maintains this was illegal on both sides. It appears to the Lord Ordinary to have been perfectly legal. The London Street Commissioners were anxious to get rid of the expense of maintaining the street as soon as they could. The Statute-Labour Trustees appear to have acted in general, in similar cases, on a rule not to take streets under their management until two-thirds of the houses were built. But it does not appear to have been fancied by the commissioners that they could retain and sell what was a public street, under the Act of Parliament, or possess it as their separate or exclusive property. There was nothing illegal in the London Street Commissioners giving up the street they had formed, or in the Statute-Labour Trustees applying a part of their funds, then and afterwards, towards maintaining a communication which appears to have been considered very beneficial to the public. At all events, the title of possession is apparently good and sufficient,—the defender having reserved to him whatever pleas he can make good in his action of declarator.

“The defender has stated that he does not admit the accuracy of the plans that have been produced and sworn to; and his counsel in the reply stated, that the street was broader than the seventy feet allowed by the Statute, without including the stripe of ground in question. If the defender was not satisfied with the accuracy of the plans, which the pursuers have proved by witnesses, he had an opportunity, not only of cross-examining those witnesses, but of producing any other plan while the proof was going on at Glasgow, and establishing its superior accuracy, if that could be done. As he did not do so, the Lord Ordinary must decide according to the evidence taken, and plans proved in the Inferior Court.

“The defender urged a minor point in the case, viz., that the ground enclosed by him was not upon London Street, but on a street which had no name at the time his authors received their conveyance, but has since been called Green Street. But it appears to the Lord Ordinary that all the communication from Great Hamilton Street to the Cross, by London Street, became equally public with the other streets of Glasgow, and equally fell under the management of the pursuers, and there is no reason for making any distinction between that and the other streets of Glasgow.”

Richmond reclaimed. At advising,

Lord President.—I see no solid ground for altering the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. I don't wish to say any thing as to the question of title, as that will be formally decided in the declarator which is now in dependence. But, prima facie, there was a title in the commissioners who transferred it to the Statute-Labour Trustees, by whom it was again transferred to the Commissioners of Police. Considered as a possessory question, there can be no doubt that the ground in question has been enjoyed for seven years by the public, and that the advocate's erection, if permitted to remain, would invert the possession. The cases which have been quoted to show that a party could not be maintained in possession without some title, referred to private property; but other decisions show that a distinction must be made when the question relates to public property.

Lord Gillies.—I have arrived at the same conclusion, though I was somewhat puzzled at one time from not adverting to the distinction to which your Lordship has referred. This is not a question of private property. The title may be one way, and the possessory right another. If it had been merely a question of private right, it might have been necessary to examine the title more minutely; but here the possession was first in one public body, who transferred it to another. It may be that Richmond's title is better than theirs, and that they did wrong in taking that part of the ground under their charge; but having done so, and without objection, they are now bound to prevent encroachment on their possession. Richmond says the ground is his property. That is a good plea; but is he entitled to take the law into his own hand, and enforce his right brevis manu? It is impossible to countenance such a proceeding. Spoliatio ante omnia restituenda. The public have enjoyed the use of this ground, and it is the duty of the commissioners to defend them against encroachment. I concur therefore with the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Mackenzie.—My conclusion is the same, and on the same grounds. Any street in any town, if such encroachments were allowed, might, seven years after its formation, be blocked up by a neighbouring proprietor, on the allegation that the ground was his, and the public had no title. Here they have at least title enough to support their possession. It is not said that they got possession clam, or by any unfair means. They took it, and have kept it without objection for upwards of seven years. In these circumstances, even the true proprietor could not be allowed, at his own hand, to take it back again. The result of the declarator may be, to find that the public have no good title; but, in the mean time, it is impossible to allow this sudden inversion of the possession.

Lord Fullerton.—I agree in a great deal of what has been said. In so far as the Statute-Labour Trustees, acting for the public, have had possession, it is impossible to allow it to be inverted in the manner which has been attempted; but I have some doubts as to one piece of ground forming the footpath. I don't see that the public have had the same use of it as of the street; and I doubt if mere possession by the Statute-Labour Trustees, unaccompanied with actual enjoyment by the public, would be sufficient to support that possession in the absence of a proper title.

The Court adhered.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J.W.)

No. 137.—JEAN BEATTIE and HUSBAND, Pursuers, v. ROBERT MURDOCH, Defender.

Competition.—Diligence.—Preference of Ancestor's Creditors.—Statute 1661, c. 24.—A creditor of a party deceased having constituted his debt by decree, and attached the estate of his debtor within three years from the period of his death—Held that a bond granted by the heir of the debtor within year and day of his death, was reducible under the Act 1661, c. 24, although averred to have been granted for the purpose of paying debts due by the ancestor.

The deceased David Beattie was proprietor of a small heritable property in Kilmarnock. The house having fallen into disrepair, his daughter, the pursuer, advanced several sums of money to enable him to rebuild it. David Beattie died in January 1836, when the work had not been taken off the tradesman's hands, and was succeeded by his son, Allan Beattie, who entered into possession of the subjects and made up a title thereto, conform to precept of clare constat from the superiors, dated 21st March 1836, and instrument of sasine following thereon, dated 25th April, and recorded 1st June 1836. On the same day, or within a year from his father's death, he granted to the defender a bond over the subjects for £80, which, it was alleged by the defender, was expended in completing the repairs upon the house, and in paying the business account of the agent of David Beattie, for which the titles were hypothecated. The pursuers, as creditors of the deceased David Beattie, constituted their debt, and attached the heritage of their debtor, within three years of his death,—1st, By a decree in foro, dated 6th March 1838, obtained by them in the Sheriff-court of Ayrshire against the aforesaid Allan Beattie, eldest son and heir of the said deceased David Beattie, as representing him, and as having made up titles to his father's heritage: 2d, By a decree of adjudication and abbreviate thereof, obtained against the said Allan Beattie, as representing his father, dated 3d July, and recorded in the Register of Abbreviates of Adjudications the 29th August 1838, adjudging from the said Allan Beattie, and all others pretending right thereto, the said houses or subjects in Kilmarnock, for payment and satisfaction to the pursuers of the several sums of money, principal, interest, and expenses, amounting, when accumulated at the date of the decree of adjudication, to the sum of £62 Sterling: 3d, By a charter of adjudication from the trustees of Henrietta Duchess of Portland, the superiors, in favour of the pursuer, Mrs Jean Beattie or Torrance, her heirs and assignees, dated the 15th October 1838, and instrument of sasine following thereon, in favour of the pursuer, Mrs Jean Beattie or Torrance, dated 27th November, and recorded in the Particular Register of Sasines for the shire of Ayr on the 5th of December 1838. The present action was instituted for the purpose of reducing the bond granted to the defender, in so far as it was to the prejudice of the pursuers and of their security as creditors of David Beattie. A record having been made up, it was

Pleaded for the pursuers—1. The pursuers are just and lawful creditors of the deceased David Beattie, and their debt is validly constituted by the unchallenged decree which has been condescended on. 2. As the pursuers validly and effectually attached the estate of their debtor, David Beattie, by their diligence within three years from the period of his death, they are preferable creditors, in terms of the Statute 1661, cap. 24, upon the estate so attached, to the defender, as a creditor of Allan Beattie, David Beattie's heir-at-law. 3. As the bond by the said Allan Beattie, as his father's heir-at-law, in favour of the defender, was executed within a year after the death of David Beattie, it is, in terms of the Statute 1661, cap. 24, invalid and reducible at the instance of the pursuers, as having been granted in prejudice of their rights as creditors of the ancestor as aforesaid. 4. The pursuers are therefore entitled, in terms of the conclusion of their summons, to obtain decree of reduction of the bond and sasine libelled on, in so far as they are prejudicial to their preferable rights as creditors of the said David Beattie; and as the defender has been in possession of his father's property, the pursuers are entitled to obtain an account of his intrusions with the rents, mails, and profits thereof; or alternatively, to obtain decree for the specific sum of rent concluded for. Further, they are entitled to decree of removing and for expenses as libelled.

Pleaded for the defender—1. The decree of constitution founded on by the pursuers does not afford conclusive evidence of the debt sought to be enforced, and the subsistence of the same is not admitted. 2. The provisions of the Statute 1661 do not apply to a person in the situation in which the said Allan Beattie was when he granted the disposition sought to be reduced. 3. No diligence having been done against the said Allan Beattie, as prescribed by the said Statute, within the time prescribed, the provisions thereof do not apply to this case; and, in particular, the first branch libelled of the said Statute is not applicable to deeds executed by the heir. 4. The said Statute does not apply to the case of a disposition made substantially for behoof of the ancestor's creditors, or to pay debts of the ancestor, more especially if any of those debts are preferable sua natura. 5. Supposing the said provisions to apply to this case, the pursuers could not succeed in this action, without giving the defender credit for such disbursements as were made on the property adjudged by them, and sought to be vindicated in this action. 6. The pursuers are not entitled to set aside the said security, in respect it is not averred in their libel that the said Allan Beattie is not possessed of means available to the pursuers for payment of their debt, independently of the said subject, and in respect it is not averred that the residue of the property of David Beattie is insufficient to pay the debt. 7. In no view of this case are the pursuers entitled to more than a pari passu preference on the said subject, along with the defender.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"2d December 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the process, repels the defences, and decerns in terms of the declaratory and reductive conclusions; and quoad the petitory conclusion for accounting, appoints the cause to be enrolled: Finds the defender liable in the expenses of discussing the conclusions now disposed of; and appoints an account thereof to be given in, and, when lodged, remits to the auditor to tax and report.

"Note.—1. The Lord Ordinary holds the pursuer's decree of constitution as conclusive evidence of the validity of her debt.

"2. Diligence having been done by adjudication against the estate, he does not hold that it was necessary also to do diligence against the heir personally.

"3. As the pursuer does not admit that the bond under reduction was granted for the purposes or to the effect of paying debts due by the ancestor, the Lord Ordinary would have allowed the defender to prove this, if he had thought the fact relevant. But he thinks it irrelevant; that is, he is of opinion that, assuming the matter to stand as the defender states, still the bond is reducible.

"4. For, after reperusing the opinions given in the case Christie against the Royal Bank, 17th May 1839, and the report of the case in the House of Lords, 6th April 1841, he adheres to the principles supported by the majority of the Court, that a deed by an heir, within year and day of his ancestor's death, is not saved from reduction under the Act 1661, cap. 24, by being made in favour of one of the ancestor's creditors. He has nothing however to add to the very full and very learned views there taken, and begs to refer to the report of that case."

The defender reclaimed. At advising, the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Adhere to the interlocutor complained of, and refuse the desire of the note; reserving to the defender in the present accounting, or in any ordinary action at his instance, to claim credit for such sums as he may prove to have been beneficially expended towards supporting the pursuer's right and title, and to the pursuer her objections thereto; of new find the defender liable in expenses, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed accordingly."

Reparation—Damages—Collision.

This was an action concluding for reparation of loss and damage occasioned to the steam-packet Windsor Castle, the property of the pursuers, in consequence of a collision between her and the steam-packet called the Tartar, the property of the defenders, in the river Clyde.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

No. 139.—ROBERT THOMSON, Petitioner, v. JOHN HAMILTON MACK, Respondent and Advocate.

Process.—Petition, Prayer of.—Decree.—Waiver.—Hypothec.—A party presented a petition, praying the Sheriff to decern and ordain the respondent to produce in process an account for which, he alleged, certain title-deeds were hypothecated, and failing his doing so, to ordain him instantly to deliver up the title-deeds. The respondent produced his account, with answers to the petition, and pleaded retention of the titles till payment. The application having resolved into an action of count and reckoning between the parties; and the Sheriff having decerned in terms of the original petition, after a condescendence and proof, it was objected, that under the prayer of the petition, the proceedings subsequent to the production of the account were incompetent—Held under the circumstances, that the objection, if competent, had been waived.

The petitioner is the tutor-at-law of John Thomson, who succeeded to a bond of £240, which, together with the instrument of sasine following thereon, had been deposited by his father in the hands of his agents, of whom the respondent was one. The petitioner applied for delivery of the bond, and received for answer that it would be delivered up on payment of certain business-accounts due to the respondent by the father of the pupil. But the respondent having failed to render his accounts, or deliver the bond, the tutor-at-law presented a petition to the Sheriff, praying him "to decern and ordain the said John Hamilton Mack to produce in process the said account for which he alleges the said deeds are hypothecated; and failing his doing so, to decern and ordain the said defender instantly to deliver up to the petitioner, as tutor foresaid, the said bond and disposition in security," instrument of sasine following thereon, and relative title-deeds.

The respondent, in his answers, admitted that the bond was in his possession, and stated, that "he can have no object in withholding the accounts, nor in retaining the said bond and disposition farther than in securing payment of the accounts. Copies of the accounts are herewith produced. They amount in whole to the sum of £27. 15s., and on the accounts being paid as taxed, if a taxation is required, the bond and disposition, and infestment thereon, will be instantly delivered up." The relative plea was in these terms:—Supposing the action properly directed against the respondent, and supposing him to be held individually liable as the custodian of the said bond and infestment, he is entitled to retain possession thereof till the said accounts be paid.

In the replies it was averred, that the respondent had been overpaid his account by his intromissions with the estate of James Thomson. The action came thus to resolve into one of count and reckoning between the parties.

A record having been made up, and a proof led with that view, the Sheriff pronounced an interlocutor decerning in terms of the original petition.

The respondent advocated and pleaded.—The advocate having, in the outset, satisfied the principal conclusion of the original petition, by producing with his answers to it, the business-accounts referred to; and as it was only "failing his doing so," or in the event of his failure to produce them, that decree for delivery of the titles was asked, it was illegal and incompetent for the Sheriff, in the face of the respondent's own application, to go beyond its conclusions, and to pronounce the decree against the advocate complained of, for delivery of these titles.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"20th November 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the process, advocates the cause, sustains the second additional plea for the advocate, viz., that after he produced the account called for in the original petition, it was incompetent for the Sheriff, under the peculiar prayer of that petition, to proceed further, either by ordering a proof of the articles of the account, or by decerning for delivery of the writings: Recals all the interlocutors of the Sheriff subsequent to the production of the account; and finds, that after that account was produced, the proceedings ought to have terminated: Finds the advocator liable in expenses till the date of producing the account; modifies the same to £2. 2s., for which decerns, and finds no subsequent expenses due to either party.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary has a strong desire to decide against the advocator, because, considering the position of the parties, he does not like the complexion of his case.

"But the Lord Ordinary cannot support the Sheriff's interlocutors, because he thinks that, under the terms of the prayer of the petition, in which nothing is asked except that, failing the production of an account, certain writings should be produced, the Sheriff was bound to have considered the production of the account, as satisfying the petitioner's demand.

"But he can give no expenses to the advocator, because, instead of resting on this plea, he never even stated it till the case came into this Court; on the contrary, he virtually abandoned it by going into the accounting and into all the other matters of the cause; insomuch, that if it stood even now solely on his objecting, the Lord Ordinary would not give effect to the plea. But it is pars judicis to notice the terms of the petition, and not to go beyond what is prayed for."

The petitioner reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Medwyn.—I cannot concur with the interlocutor in this case, however anxious I may be that matters should be accurately conducted in a legal process. If, on making production of his accounts, the respondent had craved to be assolized, this would have been granted, or the prayer of the original petition would have been allowed to be enlarged. But he pleads retention till his accounts be paid. If they are to be paid, they must first be investigated; and he joins issue thereon. If he did not waive the objection, that this was beyond the prayer of the petition, he should have stated it before allowing a revised condescence and proof. This is very like a waiver.

Lord Moncreiff.—The substance of the thing was, that the respondent should produce his accounts, and if settled or paid, or found not due, then to produce the bond and titles. If the objection had been taken at first, then the Sheriff would have ordered an amendment of the prayer. I think there was a sufficient waiver to justify us in altering the interlocutor.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I concur. The answer of the respondent was very simple. If he meant to rely upon this objection, he had merely to produce his accounts and ask absolvitor. On the contrary, he states his claim of retention till payment of his accounts. Stewart v. Gloag was a summons, where one must look to the conclusion; this is a summary petition for redress, and the prayer must be looked to in connection with the petition, and is more flexible. I think the objection was clearly waived.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court recalled the interlocutor, repelled the additional plea in law, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed further in the cause.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

No. 140.—JOHN THOMSON, Suspender, v. AGNES WESTWOOD, Charger.

Prescription—Act 1579—Parent and Child—Aliment of Bastard Child—Found that the claim for aliment of a bastard child does not fall under the triennial prescription of the Act 1579.

The suspender was charged at the instance of Agnes Westwood, residing in Airdrie, for aliment to an illegitimate child, of which he admitted he was the father, at the rate of £6 annually, from September 1828, the date of the birth of the child, till the child should attain the age of seven years. The action in which the decret under suspension was pronounced, was brought in September 1836. The suspender pleaded, that he had already paid to the charger sums on account of this child, more than equal to the whole amount of the aliment claimed; and he, at the same time, pleaded the triennial prescription, as applicable to the first five years for which aliment was claimed.

The Lord Ordinary, entertaining a doubt whether the statements made by the suspender upon the record were sufficiently specific to raise the plea of payment and prescription, pronounced an interlocutor, 20th May 1841, ordering the suspender to condescend more specially "on the particular items of goods and money composing the cumulo amount of £135. 4. 2., which he alleges to have been advanced and furnished by him to the charger, with the precise date of each several advance or furnishing, and the manner in which he proposes to apply the same."

Against this interlocutor the suspender reclaimed, and contended, that he had already put upon record a sufficient averment of payment of the aliment of this child. But in order that no doubt upon the question might remain, he lodged a minute, in which he made the following explanation:

"The Dean of Faculty for the suspender stated,—with reference to the averment made on the part of the suspender in the Inferior Court record, and repeated in the record in this Court, viz., that he had paid the pursuer sums amounting in whole to £135. 4. 2., being considerably more than he was bound to pay, or the pursuer could demand, for the aliment of both the children of which the defender is the father,—that although the averment of payment of the sum now sued for is there made with sufficient specification, the suspender, nevertheless, farther averred, that from the date of the birth of the child in question, on 26th September 1828, till the date of the summons, he had advanced and paid to the charger, expressly on account of its aliment, and in extinction of all claim, a sum amounting to upwards of £65 Sterling."

Their Lordships of the Second Division pronounced the following interlocutor:

"26th June 1841.—The Lords having resumed consideration of the reclaiming note, with a minute for the reclamer, recal the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary submitted to review; and in respect of said minute, remit to his Lordship to hear parties on the plea of prescription, and to do therein as he shall see cause, reserving all questions of expenses."

The Lord Ordinary afterwards ordered minutes of debate to be given in on the question of prescription.

Argued for the suspender—

The words of the Statute 1579, c. 83, are,—“that all actiones of debt for house-maitles, mennis ordinars, servands' fees, merchantes comptes, and uthir the like debts, that are not founded upon written obligations, be persewed within three zieres, uthirwise the creditour sall have nae action, except he outther preif be the writ or be aith of his partie.” By this Statute prescription was made applicable to all that class of debts which are not usually constituted by writing, and which were supposed likely to be paid at the time, or periodically as they fell due. Sir George Mackenzie remarks, in his Observations on this Act, that it was founded on a presumption “that men would not suffer such debts to lie over without taking an obligation for them in writ, and the presumption lies for their being yearly paid; and that which was presumptio hominis is, after the current of three years, made here presumptio juris et de jure.” The claim for aliment advanced to a natural child closely resembles those claims for entertainment, under the words “men's ordinars.” It is a debt of the like nature, consisting of periodical and continuous advances, which the party was not likely to allow to run into arrear for a lengthened period, without having them vouched by a written obligation. Accordingly, claims for repayment of aliment generally appear clearly, according to the opinion of our institutional writers, and the course of decisions, to be exposed to the triennial prescription; nor is there any distinction between aliment advanced under a contract, and aliment advanced in implement of a debitum naturale: Bankton, B. II. tit. 12, § 27. Ersk. B. III. tit. 7, § 17. Bell's Prin. 4th edit., p. 239. Balfour v. Landale, Nov. 1683. Harcarse, p. 216. Hamilton v. Lady Hamilton, M. 11,100. Galloway, M. 11,122. In Forsyth v. Simson, 15th Feb. 1791, Dict. 11,081, the question was in terminis decided in favour of the plea of prescription, and is the last case in which the general question has been decided free from specialities. It is said that "all the particulars expressed in the Statute were reducible to sale or location;" but it is plain that to many cases of sale or location the Statute does not apply. For instance, to bargains of sale of moveables, to cases of a single furnishing, or to cash advances. It is further argued, that the claim of the mother of a natural child for aliment from the father, is one of recompense, on the principle that both are jointly liable for the child's aliment; and therefore, that if the mother alimments the child alone, she has paid the father's share of the aliment as well as her own, and is entitled to repayment of the advances which he should have made; and to such claims of recompense it is maintained that the triennial prescription has no application. But by whatever name the pursuer may characterise her claim, the substance of the matter is, that the father of a natural child is bound in law to make a certain annual allowance, according to his circumstances, for the maintenance of the child; that the mother, in the event of his failing to do so, has the means of enforcing payment by obtaining a decree for aliment against him; that if she does not apply for such a decree, the reasonable presumption is that she did not do so, because the father, without the compulsion of law, had fulfilled the obligation to the extent that the law would have imposed it upon him; and that this presumption of payment, arising from the absence of any legal demand, or any written obligation showing that the sum is still resting-owing, is just as strong, if not more so, in the case of a debt due ex debito naturale, though not yet legally constituted, as of a debt which the father was bound to pay under a specific compact. It is a decided point, that it makes no difference, in regard to the application of the Statute, whether aliment has been advanced under a specific contract or not. Though no bargain has been entered into on the subject, and the aliment may have been advanced voluntarily, it still suffers the triennial prescription: Smellie v. Cochrane. The cases subsequent to Forsyth proceeded upon specialities. In M'Dowall v. M'Lurg, F. C., Feb. 19, 1807, the pursuer was non valens agere. In Arbutnot v. Symon, May 15, 1834, the decision rested not upon the plea of prescription, but upon a taciturnity of thirty-two years; and the judgments in Thom v. Jardine, 24th June 1836, and Butchart, 28th June 1839, proceeded upon the admissions of the parties.

Argued for the charger—

The Statute has plain reference to a class of debts which the creditor may have vouched by written documents, or has the means of instantly enforcing. The expression "uther the like debts," cannot possibly amplify the class to which it relates. It is a general rule of construction, that an expression of this sort, following an enumeration of particulars, can have no extending force. This is the clear law both of England and Scotland. Accordingly, however similar the debt may be, yet if it arise from a different species of obligation, it does not fall within the purview of the Statute. Thus a claim ex negotiorum gestione has always been excluded from the application of the Statute, though in one sense a like debt: Drummond v. Stewart, M. 11,103. Long before the date of this decision, and on the same principle, it was held that bargains of sale of moveables and single transactions, did not fall under the Act: White v. Spence, January 1683, M. 11,065. Baird v. Montgomery, February 1688, M. 11,092. Ewart v. Murray, June 1730, M. 11,067. The doctrine is also firmly fixed in modern practice: Hamilton v. Murray, 24th January 1795, M. 11,120. This was an action for payment of the price of seven hundred bushels of pease and thirty barrels of beef, consigned to the defender for sale. The defence was the triennial prescription. It was held that the object of the Act was to prevent the hariships from the loss of old discharged accounts of shopkeepers and other retailers, but not to apply to the contract of mandate. The defence was repelled: Bell's Illustrations, p. 366. Sadler v. M'Lean, 18th November 1794, M. 11,119. More recently, the same doctrine was held in Nobles v. Armstrong, 11th June 1813. Macfarlane v. Brown, 17th January 1827, 5 S. and D., p. 205. Following out the same principle, it has been decided that the Act does not apply to accounts of freight betwixt the owners and masters of a ship; Butchart v. Mudie, 13th June 1781; Hailes, II. p. 885;—to a single advance of money: Smith v. Bell, 19th June 1829, 4 S. and D. p. 771. Keir v. Magistrates of Kirkwall, 15th June 1827, 5 S. and D. p. 802. The claim of a schoolmaster for his salary, arising out of a public provision, does not fall within the Statute: Nicholson v. Monro, 20th January 1747, M. p. 11,080;—nor a claim of arrears of pay to a soldier: Graham v. Earl of Leven, 14th July 1709, M. 11,093. It has also been held that the triennial prescription does not apply to any claim arising in consequence of acting as factor: Froer v. Paterson, 27th July 1826, S. and D. Still more particularly, and more german to the matter now in hand, it has been held that the prescription does not apply to any claim of relief amongst corei debendi: Bland v. Short, 11th July 1825. Now, what is the real nature of the obligation to aliment a natural child as betwixt the parents? It is most plainly the obligation of recompense or remuneration. The parties are correi, and the obligation which the one has against the other is that of relief: Stair, I. 8, 2. In reporting the case of Balfour, Harcarse himself seems to have thought that it was of no authority, for he points to other cases decided afterwards thus—vide No. 776, p. 220: "Found that alimmenting and process, or defence thereon, doth not prescribe in three years, that not being in the case of men's ordinaries, mentioned in the Act of Parliament: February 1687, Irving contra Maxwell of Barncluch. The like was found betwixt John Dick and Walter Gibson, merchant, Glasgow. Vide No. 765." In Davidson v. Watson, M. 11,077, it was found in the House of Lords, reversing the judgment in the Court of Session, that the Act does not apply to actions for the aliment of minors. The next case is that of Paterson v. Cochrane, (11,080,) the rubric of which is,—"Aliment of bastard child found not to fall under the triennial prescription of the Act 1579. The defender had acknowledged he had paid a certain sum, which was evidently not sufficient." The judgment of the Court was: "The Lords repelled the defence founded on the Act 1579, and found the defender liable in £40 Scots yearly, for maintenance of the child till fourteen years of age, and in expenses of process." If the case of Forsyth stood alone, it might be deemed an express authority the other way, but it is shaken by the subsequent course of decisions. In the case of M'Dowall v. M'Lurg, the triennial prescription was found "not applicable to a claim of aliment against the father of a bastard child, he having gone abroad." In the case of Finlayson v. Gown, 7th July 1809, F. C., it was laid down by the Lord President (Blair) that no prescription applied. In the case of Arbutnot v. Symon, which was an action for a long term of arrears of aliment, Lord Medwyn laid it down expressly, that "prescription does not apply to such a claim." More's Stair, voce Prescription, p. 275, Note a a. Tail's Law of Evidence, p. 455. Finally, in the case of Thom v. Jardine, 24th June 1836, Lord Fullerton found that the triennial prescription did not apply to such a case, and added a note to his interlocutor, giving a concise view of the authorities, and his own opinion upon the point. To these views his Lordship adhered in the subsequent case of Butchart v. Ireland, 28th June 1839.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"11th January 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having advised the mutual minutes of debate for the parties, and resumed consideration of the closed record, and whole cause, repels the plea of prescription: Finds it admitted that the suspender is the father of the illegitimate child for whose aliment the decree now under suspension was pronounced: Finds that no objection has been taken to, or lies against said decree, so far as regards either the rate of aliment decerned for, or the number of years for which it has been awarded: But finds it alleged, that the claim for said aliment has been wholly satisfied and extinguished by the suspender's having, at various times, advanced in goods and money to the charger more than he was bound to pay, or than she could legally demand in name of such aliment; and more especially (as set forth in his minute of 24th June 1841,) 'that, from the date of the birth of the child in question, on 26th September 1828, till the date of the summons, he had advanced and paid to the charger, expressly on account of its aliment, and in extinction of all claim, a sum amounting to upwards of £65 Sterling.' Finds, however, on the other hand, that no proof of this alleged advance and payment has been adduced by the suspender, and that, in the absence of such proof, it must be held that the aliment decerned for is still resting-owing: Therefore, repels generally the reasons of suspension, with the exception of that set forth in the suspender's third plea in law as to the incompetency of the Sheriff's recal of the previous modification of expenses—in regard to which, finds that it was not competent for the Sheriff, in the face of his previous final judgment of 19th May 1837, finding expenses 'subject to modification,' to recal said modification; and so far, therefore, sustains the reasons of suspension, and finds the suspender entitled, in respect of said modification, to a deduction of £1. 11. 10. (the sum-total, subject to modification, as at the said 19th May 1837, being £5. 11. 10.) from the amount of expenses charged for: Therefore, on the whole matter, suspends the letters to the extent of the said £1. 11. 10; but, quoad ultra, finds the letters orderly proceeded, and decerns: Finds the suspender liable in expenses; appoints an account thereof to be given in, and remits the same, when lodged, the auditor to tax and report.

"Note.—Upon the construction and application of the Statute, the Lord Ordinary was disposed to have reported the case, for an authoritative determination of that most important question by the Court. But the charger having pressed for judgment, and stating that she was unable to bear the expense of printing, &c., the Lord Ordinary did not feel warranted to withhold a deliverance by himself.

"The view which he takes of the Statute is substantially, though not perhaps in all its details, nor more especially as regards the effect attributed to some of the authorities, the same with that expressed by Lord Fullerton in Thom, 24th June 1836, and Butchart, 28th June 1839. With that learned Judge, were the case to be dealt with as one now arising for the first time, he would have no hesitation in ruling that the statutory prescription did not, and was not intended to extend to a claim of the nature here in question. He cannot regard such a claim as a claim of debt, in the proper sense of the word debt, as used and exemplified in the Statute. The statutory debts are all more or less immediately referable, for their origin and constitution, to some contract, bargain, agreement, or at least some dealing or understanding implying positive convention between the supposed debtor and creditor. In house-maills, for instance, the debt arises on a contract of lease between landlord and tenant; in servants' fees, on a contract of locatio operarum between master and servant; in merchants' accounts, on a continued series of dealings and contractions, as between buyer and seller, or the like; and, finally, in men's ordinaries, on some positive agreement, or conventional understanding, between the party furnishing and the party receiving.

"It is thought impossible to bring a claim for the aliment of a natural child, such as is exhibited in the present case, within any of the enumerated heads of the Statute: or looking to the general category of debt, as that word is there applied, to bring it within the scope even of the general reference to 'other like debts,' with which the more special enumeration is followed up. Such a claim does not constitute debt, in the proper sense of contraction or convention at all. It is a claim in which the child, rather than the mother, is at bottom the father's creditor, and the liability to contribute to its aliment is a liability which attaches by force of the law itself, and simply in respect of the birth and existence of the child, without the intervention of any act or proceeding whatever on the father's part to constitute, in the statutory sense, a claim of proper debt against him. The mother indeed, is, as regards this claim of aliment, as much debtor to her child as the father, and her claim against the latter is truly a claim for rateable contribution or relief, just as would be the claim of the parish, where the mother (as frequently happens) is compelled to apply for parochial aid.

"It has been urged, that, in other alimentary questions, the statutory prescription has, in various instances, been held to apply. But there is a palpable distinction between the claim for aliment in a case like the present, and that which arises in the class of cases referred to, as to the ordinaries or board, whether of a person sui juris and dealing with his own means, or of a minor or fatuous person having means under the administration of others by whom he is represented—the liability in this latter case being always more or less a liability of express or implied paction.

"The real difficulty of the case lies, as the Lord Ordinary considers it, in the conflict of authorities, which renders it doubtful whether the question is now to be dealt with as being still an open one. But the very fact that the authorities are thus in conflict, is at all events conclusive, that there is as yet nothing, in point of legal construction, definitively or authoritatively fixed. And in dubio, therefore, the Lord Ordinary is compelled to resort to the Statute itself, were it only to decide how, consistently with the principles of a just interpretation, the conflict of authority is to be solved.

"The Lord Ordinary has felt himself much fortified by the two consecutive judgments pronounced to the like effect by Lord Fullerton. It is true that, in reviewing these judgments, the Court (there being enough to support them otherwise) did not find it necessary to adopt or proceed upon this particular ratio decidendi: But, on the other hand, neither did they repudiate or decide against it. The Lord Ordinary cannot, in such circumstances, hold the authority of the decision to have been seriously, if at all affected. And at all events, with such precedents before him, he should, as an Outer-House Judge, have hesitated to pronounce differently, even had his own opinion not been substantially concurrent."

The suspender reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Justice-Clerk.—In this case I concur with the Lord Ordinary on the only point now before us—the plea of prescription. I own I am not anxious to express a general opinion as to whether all claims of aliment are excluded from the triennial prescription. It is enough that the aliment of minors and bastard children has been found not to fall under it. If the case of Davidson be a decision on the point, and if there be no series of decisions contrary to it, it is authoritative, being a judgment of the House of Lords. The report by Kilkerran is short: that by Clerk Hume is fuller; and it was found in this Court in express terms, that the aliment of a minor did fall under the triennial prescription; and if the judgment in the House of Lords had been designed to rest on any other ground than the reverse of this finding, there were grounds in the interlocutor for doing so. Craigie and Stewart's Reports give the judgment at great length, and very specifically. It could not bring out the point more distinctly against prescription. Pater-son v. Cochrane is another decision; and I see no specialities, although Lord Fullerton, in his note in the case of Thom, seems to say that there were. I do not see any from the report; and I consider it a decision upon the general point. Then Finlayson v. Gown is another direct authority, in which we have the opinion of President Blair, and in which judgment was given for fifteen years' aliment,—the Court holding that the triennial prescription was not applicable. There are two cases following upon a judgment in the House of Lords, in support of the view taken by the Lord Ordinary;—at the same time the cases, where there is a presumption of payment, as in the case of Arbuthnot, arising from taciturnity, are not touched by this judgment.

Lord Medwyn.—The apparent conflict of authorities arises mainly from not attending to the parties against whom the claim for aliment is made. The presumption of payment applies only to persons of full age: Forrest; Hamilton; Fraser, 1838. The case of Davidson adopted the same principle. Payment in the case of a minor cannot be presumed; and the House of Lords reversed the interlocutor pronounced in this Court. If a party furnished aliment on an implied or positive agreement, the claim would fall under the triennial prescription; but the aliment of a child is not matter of contract: it is a natural obligation, and prescription does not apply. If the mother furnish the whole aliment, then she has an ordinary claim of relief against the father for his share. There is no case since Forsyth sustaining the plea of prescription. In Finlayson, the claim was for fifteen years' aliment; and I then acting as Sheriff, conceiving it to be a very grievous case upon a poor man—the claim amounting to about £100—restricted it to £20; but the Court altered, and gave the full amount,—Lord President Blair expressing his opinion that the plea of prescription did not apply. In the case of Arbuthnot, 1834, I laid it down that prescription did not apply to such a claim; and looking upon it as a claim of relief, it does not fall under the purview of the Statute.

Lord Moncreiff.—This question has undergone a great deal of discussion, and there have been contradictory decisions; but finding one clear case decided in the House of Lords, followed by Paterson and Finlayson, and the two cases decided by Lord Fullerton, I do not see how we can go past the judgment in the House of Lords. I am therefore for adhering.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

No. 141.—ELIZABETH M'GREGOR or MUNRO, Pursuer, v. Poor ANDREW MUNRO, Defender,—Et de contra.

Process—Expenses—Poors' Roll—Husband and Wife—Separation and Aliment—Adherence—A husband on the poors' roll, defender in an action of separation and aliment, and pursuer in an action of adherence, moved for absolvitor in the one, and decreet in the other, in respect that the wife had failed to lodge her revised condescendence,—the motion was refused, in respect that he had failed to obtemper an order for payment of £10 towards her expenses. The Court admitted her to the poors' roll, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to receive the condescendence, and to proceed in the cause.

The first of these conjoined processes was an action of separation and aliment at the instance of the pursuer against her husband, and the second an action of adherence at his instance against her. Defences having been lodged in both processes, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"17th December 1841.—Conjoins this process of adherence with the previous process of aliment; and in the conjoined process, appoints the condescendence to be revised against the box-day in the recess, and the revised answers to be lodged against the fifth sederunt-day in January next: Farther, ordains the husband, Andrew Munro, to make payment to Mr David Johnstone Macbrair, S.S.C., the agent for Mrs Elizabeth M'Gregor or Munro, of £10 Sterling, towards the expenses of carrying on for her the present conjoined process, and that within ten days, and decerns ad interim accordingly, and also for the expense of extract, in case that shall be necessary through non-payment within said ten days."

Elizabeth Munro having failed to obey the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary by revising and lodging her condescendence, the conjoined processes were enrolled by the husband, who moved for absolvitor in the action of separation and aliment, and decree in the process of adherence.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"25th January 1842.—Lord Murray, for Lord Cuninghame, SCOTTISH JURIST.

having heard the counsel for the parties on the motion for the defender, Andrew Munro, for decreet of absolvitor in his favour, Refuses this motion in hoc statu, in respect the said Andrew Munro has failed to obtemper the order for payment of £10, pronounced by the Lord Ordinary on 17th December last."

The husband reclaimed.

At advising, the claimer pleaded, that having been admitted to the poors' roll on account of his inability to pay his own expenses, it was unreasonable to stay proceedings until he should pay her's. She ought herself to go upon the poors' roll, which she had refused to do.

The Court, following the interlocutor in the case of Macgregor, 8th July 1841, (ante, Vol. XIII. p. 628,) found that, the husband being on the poors' roll, the wife was also entitled to have the benefit of that roll, admitted her accordingly, and remitted her to as counsel and agent to conduct her cause; farther, remitted to the Lord Ordinary to receive the revised condescendence when prepared, and to proceed in the cause.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

No. 142.—JOHN MONE, Pursuer, v. JOHN ANDERSON and OTHERS, Defenders.

Reparation—Damages—Wrongous Imprisonment—Public Officer—Process—Summons—Justices—Relevancy—Proof—Oath, Form of—Roman Catholic—A Roman Catholic, adduced as a witness, was sworn in the form usual in the courts of this country, but, on the requisition of the public prosecutor, was desired by the Justices acting as judges to take the oath a second time, with his hand upon a copy of the Bible having the figure of the cross cut upon it: he refused, on the ground that he was already sworn, and in consequence was imprisoned for a contempt of Court. In an action of damages against the Justices and the Procurator-fiscal, averring malice and want of probable cause, it was held, notwithstanding, that the facts set forth in the summons were not relevant, and the action was dismissed on the summons and defences.

On the 24th June 1841, the pursuer lodged a complaint at the Police-Office in Airdrie against Mathew Anderson, carter, and the following excerpt from the Police records of the Burgh Court will explain the instance at which the complaint was brought, and the nature of the charge:

"At Airdrie, the 28th day of June 1841 years. The Procurator-fiscal of Court, for the public interest, charges the offenders after named and designed in this and the following pages, with the offences and contravention after specified, and craves that, on conviction thereof, they may be punished according to law."

"HUGH M'CULLOCH, Pro-fiscal."

"Sitting in judgment—John Anderson and William Fleming, Esquires, two of the Magistrates of the burgh of Airdrie," defenders in the present action.

"Mathew Anderson, carter in Airdrie, summoned at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal of Court, for the public interest, is charged with annoying and molesting John Mone, spirit-dealer in Bell Street, Airdrie, on the forenoon of Thursday, the 24th day of June current, between the hours of eleven and twelve o'clock; all without any provocation, and in breach of the peace."

Mathew Anderson appeared in Court in terms of the citation which he had received, and the pursuer, as the party aggrieved, was cited as a witness against him.

VOL. XIV.—No. XIX.

The pursuer is a native of Ireland, and professes the Roman Catholic religion; and when he was called upon to give evidence, some discussion ensued as to the form in which the oath should be administered to him. He expressed himself willing either to be sworn in the legal form recognised and required in the courts in this country, or, if the Magistrates required it, in the form of the English law, which is also that followed in Ireland. After some consideration, one of the Magistrates administered to the pursuer the oath usual in the courts in this country, and the pursuer took and emitted the same. Thereupon the defender, Lawson, who is superintendent of police, and who was present in Court, although no party to the proceedings, stated to the Judges, that in consequence of the pursuer having been so sworn, and not sworn upon the Bible, they would not get a word of truth out of him. The public prosecutor then insisted that the pursuer should take an oath again in a different form and manner, viz., with his hand upon a copy of the Bible, having the figure of a cross cut in white paper pasted on it. But the pursuer having been already sworn in the manner usual in this country, and conceiving that he was not bound, especially after the remarks of the defender, Lawson, to take the oath again, refused to do so, giving for his reason that he was already sworn. In consequence of this refusal he was not examined as a witness, and the complaint against Anderson was dismissed as not proven. The Procurator-fiscal then moved the Court to have the pursuer committed to prison for contempt of Court; and the Magistrates pronounced an order ordaining him to be imprisoned accordingly. The following is the entry which appears on the record:—"John Mone, spirit-dealer in Airdrie, having been called as a witness, and refused to take the oath, the Bailies remit him to the Police-office till the Court is over, for contempt of Court, and dismiss him with an admonition."

In consequence of these proceedings the pursuer instituted the present action of damages, directed against the two Magistrates who officiated as judges, the Procurator-fiscal, and the Superintendent of Police. The summons set forth,—That the statement by Lawson was false, calumnious and malicious, and meant to charge the pursuer with an utter disregard of the oath which he had sworn, and an intention to commit wilful and deliberate perjury; that the Procurator-fiscal, in insisting upon the pursuer's taking an oath again with his hand upon a Bible bearing the figure of a cross, did so upon the false and erroneous assertion that such is the form required by the pursuer's creed; that after being seized by the officers of Court, and taken to the Police-office of the burgh, the pursuer was searched and locked up in a cell used for the confinement of criminals; that the commitment, apprehension, and imprisonment of the pursuer were grossly illegal, nimious and oppressive, and were done maliciously, and without any reasonable and probable cause; that they took place in the court-room of the burgh in the middle of the day, and when the Court was crowded; that the pursuer has been resident in the burgh for upwards of five years, and has always conducted himself in a quiet and peaceable manner; and that the proceedings were calculated to cause, and did cause, serious loss and injury to the pursuer's credit, character and reputation, and a deep wound to his feelings: "Therefore, the said defenders ought and should be decerned and ordained, conjunctly and severally, or severally, to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £500 Sterling in name of damages, and as a solatium to the pursuer in the premises."

Separate defences were put in for the Magistrates and the Procurator-fiscal,—Lawson, the superintendent of police, lodged no defence.

Pleaded by the Magistrates—1. As the defenders were acting judicially in their character of Magistrates, and were farther sitting as judges of a court of record, no action of damages is maintainable in law against them for any judgment pronounced, or act done by them when administering justice in such court,—at all events, without alleging in the summons that they were actuated by malice, and proceeded without reasonable or probable cause. 2. The defenders, sitting as Bailies of a burgh, having the statutory jurisdiction conferred upon them by the Act 3 and 4 William IV. c. 77, were entitled to vindicate the jurisdiction of their Court, and commit for contempt of their authority; and no relevant action of damages lies against them for so doing, at least without alleging malice and want of probable cause. 3. The defenders are entitled to the protection of the Statutes 43 Geo. III., 9 Geo. IV. and 11 Geo. IV., and 1 Will. IV., founded on. 4. Generally the summons is irrelevant, and the allegations insufficient to support the conclusions thereof against the defenders, who are entitled to be assolized, with expenses.

Pleaded for the Procurator-fiscal—1. The summons is irrelevant, as libelled against the defender. 2. At any rate, the defender having acted in the matter in question bona fide, and within the limits of his public and official duty, is not liable in damages to the pursuer. 3. Even supposing that the defender had fallen in any respect into error, he could not be subjected in damages unless malice and want of probable cause were established against him.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"18th December 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the parties on the defences as dilatory, and considered the summons and defences, sustains the defence of irrelevancy, dismisses the action as to all the defenders except James Lawson, and decerns: Finds the said defenders entitled to expenses; appoints an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits the same to the auditor to tax and to report.

"Note.—If it be sufficient to render an action of damages against Justices or other public officers relevant, that the words malice and want of probable cause be used, this interlocutor is wrong. But at present the Lord Ordinary does not think that these phrases can always prevent the real truth of the case, as disclosed in the summons, from being looked at. The pursuer himself reveals facts here which sustain the dilatory defence of irrelevancy.

"He admits that he is a Catholic; that he was sworn, when a witness, as a Protestant; that when the Justices desired him to take the oath according to the Catholic form, as practised in the country, he refused, and that it was for this contempt of Court that he was committed.

"In so far as the Justices are concerned, these facts entitle them to have the action instantly dismissed. They were acting judicially, and within their jurisdiction, and it was their clear duty to punish this clear contempt. Even if they had had a malicious pleasure in annoying the pursuer, this feeling will not render what they did unlawful; and, at any rate, malice alone is not enough. And as to want of probable cause, it cannot be stated without refuting itself. The pursuer admits that all this may be fairly stated in defence on a trial of the merits. But if the defenders have a defence of irrelevancy, they are entitled to be protected from protracted torture.

"As to the Procurator-fiscal, it is set forth in the summons that all that he did was to exercise his undoubted right, if not duty, of insisting that the witness should be correctly sworn, and of moving, when the witness refused, that he be committed. It is not even alleged that he was malicious and improbable in his cause; for these terms are only applied to the 'said commitment, apprehension, and imprisonment.' It is said that he made an erroneous and false 'assertion.' But what was it? That the proposed form of the oath was such as was 'required by the pursuer's creed.' Men may surely differ as to this fact without actions of damages."

The pursuer presented a reclaiming note, praying the Court to alter the interlocutor, and to sustain the action as relevant.

At advising,

Lord Medwyn.—Suppose the pursuer were to establish all the facts which he alleges, we are now required to institute the inquiry, whether they be sufficient to render an action of damages relevant against the defenders? This course was approved of in the case of Duncan; and the Lord Ordinary has dismissed the action as irrelevant against all but Lawson. Now, assuming the facts to be proved, do they show that the Magistrates acted maliciously, and without any probable cause? It is the common practice to swear Roman Catholics in a peculiar form; and such practice is neither illegal nor oppressive. If the public prosecutor use no insulting expression, and if the witness object, it will be presumed that he considers the form proposed as more binding than the common form; and the public prosecutor would the more, on that account, insist on its being taken. The pursuer in this case does not object that the manner in which the oath was tendered was against his creed or conscience, but simply that he was already sworn. In my opinion, he was not entitled to refuse the oath on this ground, and the Magistrates were entitled to insist on his taking it, and to punish him for refusing, as a contempt of Court, which is punishable on the spot. The Court of Justiciary sometimes commit a witness who refuses an oath on the ground of religious scruples: but here no such reason is alleged. The Procurator-fiscal only did his duty in moving that the witness be committed; and the Magistrates were guilty of nothing oppressive in ordering him to be so. I think, therefore, that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is right.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—Aware of the difference of opinion which subsists as to this case, I approach it with great reluctance, and have repeatedly considered it. I think the interlocutor involves points, both under the Statutes as to jury trial and those protecting magistrates, of the very greatest importance. But any question under the latter Statutes sinks into insignificance, when compared with the principle and result of the decision under the jury Statutes. It humbly appears to me that if this interlocutor stands, the main object of introducing jury trial is defeated, and that there is no case of oppression and wrong which the Court may not, on its own notions of the facts, intercept before going to trial, and thus deprive the subjects of the judgment and opinion of a jury upon the character of the acts in which the wrong is stated to consist. I do not wish to found merely upon the first sentence of the note of the Lord Ordinary, although I concur with Mr Maitland, that under the Statutes protecting magistrates, this summons is relevant, and cannot competently be dismissed. It is more important to notice, that the remainder of the note proceeds upon the Lord Ordinary's view, and estimate, and opinion of the supposed facts, and assumes that a contempt of Court is fully proved on the face of the summons. Even if that were so, yet if the action on the case, to use the phrase of the Statute, that is, the action for remedy and redress, shall libel that the acts were done maliciously and without probable cause, the action is, under these Statutes, perfectly relevant, and must be disposed of by the verdict of a jury, though under the direction of course of the Judge, and the ultimate review of the Court. These Statutes give no protection to inferior magistrates, where the act or proceeding is set forth as malicious and without probable cause, so as to exclude a trial. I own I think this is a view of the case which is lost sight of. Under these Statutes, when that allegation is made, the case cannot, I understand, competently be withdrawn in England from the cognizance of a jury. I do not think this Court has any such power. It is wisely and justly held, that in the administration of criminal justice by inferior magistrates, there may be great practical oppression and wanton tyranny, even under regularity of legal forms; and hence, while the Legislature has extended great indulgence and protection to them, if their motives are pure, it has, on the other hand, most wisely seen that they may often be liable to be influenced by motives from local causes or knowledge: so that, in order to protect the liberty of the subject, it is right that, if malice and want of probable cause is established, there shall be no protection. But in such cases, if I read these Statutes rightly—if I understand the principle of the jury Acts,—the Legislature entertains the greatest distrust of the estimate and opinion which the Judges of courts of law may form of the character of the facts as constituting oppression, and still more of the character and import of the acts by which the malice and the want of probable cause are to be established. I own I entertain of myself the utmost distrust in such matters. Let us see, in the first place, what the protecting Statutes require. The first of the Statutes, the 43d Geo. III. c. 141, relates exclusively to convictions or proceedings against the party apprehended or convicted,—but it is the Act which is subsequently extended; and it is declared, that in the action for or on account of any such conviction, although it may be quashed, the party shall not be entitled to recover any more or greater damages (this necessarily imports that there is to be a trial) than the sum of two-pence, nor any costs, "unless it shall be expressed in the declaration in the action whereon the recovery shall be had, and which shall be in an action upon the case only—(that is, a proper action for trial laid on the special facts)—that such acts were done maliciously, and without any reasonable and probable cause." Here a trial is assumed to be essential, and the provision is merely that more shall not be recovered, unless the declaration sets forth the malice and want of probable cause, which must be in an action on the case, which, though an English phrase, is, I believe, the same as a proper action of damages with us on account of the alleged injury. This is a Statute applicable to Great Britain and Ireland. Such actions are now jury actions in Scotland; and if the declaration or summons in the action alleges that the acts were done maliciously, and without reasonable and probable cause, I hold that the party has an absolute right by Statute to attempt to recover damages through a jury, if the jury think damages ought to be given. What more is the party bound to aver in the action? It is not enacted that the acts must be shown upon the face of the action to be illegal. They are averred to be illegal, and the pursuer undertakes to make that out. The legality of the acts does not necessarily exclude the action from a jury, or form a defence in bar, if malice and want of reasonable and probable cause is averred as leading to practical oppression. Here there is a statutory declaration as to the requisites to entitle a party to recover damages, if that allegation shall be made out. On what ground can the Court intercept this case from trial? The 9th of Geo. IV. c. 29, § 26—a Statute applicable to Scotland—extends the Statute to all "inferior judges and magistrates in Scotland, in regard to any sentence pronounced, or proceeding had in any criminal trial." I am ready to hold this to go beyond the case of the party apprehended or convicted, as in the British Statute, and to give to the defenders the benefit which they ask—viz., that it applies to any thing done in the course of a trial. The 11th Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. c. 37, § 13, clears this up, by declaring that the protection shall extend to all acts done in regard to any criminal cause or proceeding. Holding the case, then, though a proceeding as to a witness, to be within the protection of the 43d Geo. III., yet the party has averred that the act which he alleges was illegal and oppressive, was done maliciously, and without any reasonable or probable cause, and has a title thereby under the Statute to recover damages, if the proper tribunal for taking cognizance of the damages are of opinion that they are due. I am of opinion that, with the effect of this Statute, it is not competent for the Court to interfere, and that on this ground alone the interlocutor must be altered. The incompetency of intercepting the case from trial, even under these Statutes, will more clearly appear, when I notice the objections. The interlocutor, in my opinion, is clear and insurmountable in point of statutory incompetency, under the ordinary system of jury trial in Scotland. With a view to that question, it is necessary to see what the statement in the summons is, and what is the supposed point of irrelevancy on which the interlocutor is founded. I take the fair meaning and import of the summons to be clear. The counsel of the defenders took the same view of it in argument; and if there was any doubt as to what the party meant, certainly I think that of itself would be a sufficient reason for a condescendence before answer;—the more so, as the only result would be a new action setting forth the pursuer's meaning in a way to avoid mistake or doubt. The pursuer states "that he is a native of Ireland, and professes the Roman Catholic religion. When he was called upon to give evidence in the trial in question" (the summons states), "some discussion ensued as to the form in which the oath should be administered to him." I can interpret this only to mean, that being and professing to be a Roman Catholic, a question arose how he should be sworn. I shall speak presently to the distinction in the note, of being sworn as a Protestant or as a Catholic. But here, in the outset, the party who is to be sworn, and whose religion I think the statement imports was known, tells us that it was matter of discussion how he was to be sworn. Then the summons goes on to say, that "the pursuer expressed himself willing either to be sworn in the legal form recognised and required in the courts in this country, or, if the Magistrates required, in the form of the English law, which" (the summons states expressly) "is also that followed in Ireland, the pursuer's native country. That after some consideration, the said John Anderson, one of the magistrates, administered to the pursuer the oath usual in the Courts in this country; and the pursuer took and emitted the same." What is the meaning of this declaration? It is, I think, that he declared that he held either form of oath to be equally obligatory; and that, if sworn in either way, he would be bound thereby. This is a very important point. What more could be done before swearing him, unless there had been an inquiry instituted into his own opinions, or those of his persuasion? The pursuer was willing to take the oath in either of the ways above proposed or talked of; thus declaring that the Scotch form was binding on his conscience, if taken. According to this statement (and we must go entirely upon the allegations in the summons,) the pursuer was, in my opinion, legally and effectually sworn, and in the way, moreover, first, in which he had a right to be sworn; 2dly, in which the Magistrates were bound to swear him, though a Catholic, if required, and no reason to the contrary proved; and 3dly, in the way which the Magistrates, after consideration, and in the knowledge of the facts, decided to be proper and fitting. The pursuer having been willing to take it in the mode which he alleges is used in Ireland, and which we must for the present hold to be the mode in Ireland, What is it that the summons next states? (Read summons, p. 2). Then the summons avers the imprisonment under the commitment, and that the same "were grossly illegal, nimious and oppressive, and were done maliciously, and without any reasonable and probable cause." This is the specific and substantive averment. What follows is only amplification. I cannot take this case from a jury, and shall deeply deplore for the interests of the subjects of the country, if this interlocutor shall stand. The pursuer was regularly and deliberately sworn (of course I take the summons as a statement merely, but as the statement on which we must now go), and after consideration as to the manner in which he should be sworn. Then he was sworn according to the law of the land,—legally, effectually, religiously sworn. Then a party present makes a statement, the most injurious and insulting which can be conceived, and one directly striking against the religious faith and opinions of the pursuer, and that statement, accordingly, as a gross libel, remains for trial. But what is done? Upon this statement, that not a word of truth could be got from the pursuer after he had been so sworn, the Magistrates are moved to swear him again, and in a particular form,—and this, the summons states, upon the false and erroneous assertion that such was, and is the form required by the pursuer's creed.

So far as this is matter of averment—and I think it is wholly averment—it is enough for me to say that the pursuer avers, and offers to prove, that no such form of oath is required by the religious faith of Catholics. Now, this is a most vital part of the case. The only pretence for making a man take an oath different from the legal oath, is, that his religious faith is such that he can only be bound by an oath in a particular form. If that ground is not true, then swearing him in that manner is against law. If that ground is not true, the act is further illegal; because, if a person takes the oath prescribed by law, he cannot be legally compelled to be sworn again in a way different from the legal form, and against his religious opinion. If that ground is not true, there was no contempt: and so the Lord Ordinary seems to hold. Now, it is one thing to administer an oath different from the legal form, if the party is willing to take that oath, and acknowledges it to be binding,—and another to compel a party, under the penalty of contempt, to take such an oath, when he is willing to be sworn in the way the law prescribes, and objects to the other form; nay, when he has been sworn in the legal way after discussion. Whether this was a form required by the pursuer's creed, is matter of fact, and most important matter of fact; for it was the ground of the motion pressed upon the Court. I hold this must and ought to be matter of proof. On that ground, I am unwilling to say a word upon the subject; but I think it right to state, that after all the examination in my power, I am satisfied that the sign of the cross is no part of the mode of administering an oath in Catholic countries, or under the Catholic faith; and that they hold a person to be religiously sworn by our oath, and without the sign of the cross. Further, I am satisfied that this extraordinary plan of pasting a piece of white paper, cut in the shape of a cross, upon a Bible, is regarded by intelligent Catholics as a gross and wanton insult to their faith. The sign of the cross is made in token of reverence by the party himself on certain occasions—by the priest in certain religious rites. But to suppose that they hold that to put the hand on a symbol of the cross made by a Protestant clerk,—a cross in paper, or as in Mr Neaves' Bible in ink, on one page,—is a religious form, is truly to ascribe to them the admission of gross idolatry. If Catholics choose to take it, good and well; but the law administered to the pursuer must be the law equally for every Catholic of every station; and shall it be said, that if a Catholic takes the oath according to the law of the land, he can be again sworn, upon the allegation that he would not be bound by the oath in the way here proposed, and if he declines, be committed to prison instantly for contempt of Court—by a refusal which only the more proves that the man is actuated by sincere and rational religious belief. I put the case that this had been a Roman Catholic bishop, or a learned and intimate friend of mine, a member of the bar,—is he to be so dealt with by an inferior magistrate, because somebody in Court utters a gross and wanton libel upon him, equally injurious to his character and to his religious opinions, and that, when he seeks redress, alleging that the act was oppressive and illegal, as well as malicious, and without reasonable or probable cause, he can be told this was a contempt of Court, and to a jury we will not send you. The very case lately occurred before my learned friend, the late Sheriff of Perthshire, where a Catholic clergyman was to be examined as a witness. The Bible with a paper cross was tendered to him. He declared that no consideration would induce him to take an oath in a way so revolting, and which his faith abjured. He was much pressed by one of the bailies, but the Sheriff justly declared that he could not, and would not, compel him to take the oath in such a form. The legal qualities under the protecting Statutes being averred, the summons further avers that what was done was illegal and oppressive. How can this be decided until the facts are proved? The pursuer says there was no inquiry. Is that not a particular fact? Is the whole character of the scene—the precipitancy, harshness, and manner in which the thing was done—of no moment, especially in at once holding that there was a clear contempt, without any further inquiry? So far from thinking that there was contempt, on the showing of the summons, I should say the pursuer acted legally, honestly, and from religious motives. As a proof of the necessity of knowing the facts, I recollect Mr Macfarlane pressed upon us, in behalf of the Inferior Court prosecutor, M'Culloch the Procurator-fiscal, that he could not be suspected of any undue feeling against the pursuer, for the prosecution originated in the pursuer's own complaint of an assault committed on himself, which he was adduced to prove. That fact would be a most excellent observation to a jury; but would it not just weigh greatly in considering also whether the man's refusal to be sworn, proceeded from any desire to defeat justice, or from an honest feeling that he had been regularly sworn, and that the proposal was a gross attack on his religious opinions? Whether the thing was done oppressively and illegally, I hold to be a matter on which the opinion and estimate of a jury must be taken. A thing might be legal, and yet, in the circumstances, most grossly oppressive; nay, might originate in the bitter spirit of intolerant Protestant bigotry; and whether it was oppressive or not, I apprehend this Court is incompetent in law to decide. Whether it was illegal, combines a great variety of mixed matters of fact and law, and on which I equally think that it was essentially necessary that the opinion of a jury must be taken under the guidance and direction of the Court as to law, so far as there is pure law in the case. But the view of the Lord Ordinary converts the question into a point of law, and one of the very deepest importance. He says that the man was sworn as a Protestant, and that he was ordered, and competently ordered, to take another oath, because a Catholic, which he had no right to refuse. I have already shown that the fact that he was a Catholic was known before he was sworn, according to the summons. But what is this rule of law that is to subject a man to contempt of Court and summary imprisonment, upon the ground that he has been sworn as a Protestant, and will not be sworn, as it is called, as a Catholic. I am not aware of any law making a distinction as to a witness being sworn as a Protestant or as a Catholic. I do not understand the distinction. The law requires witnesses in Scotland to be sworn in a particular manner. Whether there is any prescribed form of oath in England or not, there is in Scotland; and the form in Scotland is of the more importance that the Judge administers the oath. Statute has made exceptions for Quakers and another sect. The common law of this country, and of every country in Europe, as Lord Stowell has beautifully pointed out in a very striking judgment, has made an exception in regard to Jews, who have been allowed to maintain their peculiar laws and customs, even as to marriage, entire and inviolate in the very heart of the most artificial and most intolerant systems in Christendom. A special rule was introduced in England as to Mahomedans (Morgan's case, 1 Leach, 64) by the Supreme Court, after full discussion, and after deliberate inquiry. But we admit of no exceptions in regard to Catholics any more than Episcopalians. They must equally take the ordinary oath, if required. In practice, those who have been in the habit of being sworn by holding and kissing the Bible, as being natives of England, are often indulged by being sworn in that way,—a practice of doubtful authority and expediency. I do not say that if it should be established upon proper and full inquiry in the Supreme Court, that any particular individual, or at least sect, did not regard an oath as obligatory unless administered in a particular way, it would be incompetent at least for the Supreme Court to administer the oath in the way that was ascertained to be in the understanding and principles of particular sects, alone binding on their members, although no such case has yet occurred, or has ever been mooted. And it must be kept in view, that this comes to be a very delicate subject with us, when the Judge is the party who administers the oath, and may thus be called on to be participant in forms of putting the oath indecorous for the dignity and gravity of the bench. But as to any such distinction in regard to divisions among Christians, as Protestants and Catholics, I know of no authority for such a doctrine, or which sanctions the notion that the law is to be accommodated to vagaries or mummeries of every sect, or of every individual—much less is it to compel Catholics to take an oath different from that taken by Protestants. I find no trace of such a doctrine in Hume; and though there is a loose expression in Burnet, it is inconsistent with the very doctrine which he himself lays down. Indeed it would be difficult to say to what length the Court might be called upon to go, if it once departed from the principle (which certainly the special Statutes seem expressly to assume), that the form of oath prescribed by the law of Scotland must be taken by all witnesses who do not fall within the admitted exceptions. Are we, in swearing a German Pandour, to adopt the notion and practice of Hayraddin Maugrabb in Quentin Durward—to face him to the east, and to swear him by the Seven Sleepers in Cologne, as the only oath which we believe likely to bind him. I own I do not see where we are to draw the line, or refuse to adopt special forms of oath when said to be obligatory on the individual, if we once adopt the notion of varying the oath for any sect or individual. But, still more, I cannot find the slightest trace of authority for the doctrine, that if parties are ready to be sworn according to the Scotch form of oath—be they Presbyterian, Episcopalian or Catholic,—it is competent to compel them to take another oath without any inquiry either as to their individual opinions, or as to the opinions of their sect. The Lord Ordinary holds that a Catholic is not duly and religiously sworn, if sworn as a Protestant is; and that, because he is a Catholic, he can be compelled to take another oath. My Lords, I own that proposition is perfectly new to my mind. That in the Justiciary of late years, a form of oath has been administered to Catholics willing to take it, I know; but that is a very different matter. The law lays down a form of oath, the great characteristic of which is, that it is tinged with no peculiar tenets, and is based simply upon a belief of an Almighty Being, and of the future accountability of man. It is framed for the purpose of being taken by all; and I do not find the slightest authority for holding that the law admits that any who take that oath are not religiously sworn, or recognises the right to refuse to administer that oath to those who are willing to take it. I apprehend that every man has a right to be sworn in the way which the law has provided. To subject him to any other oath is in itself a strong proceeding. To do so upon the imputation that he does not recognise the obligation of such an oath, and without inquiry, is a still stronger act. I would require deliberate inquiry into the opinions of such a body as the Catholics, before we, Protestants, are to hold that our Scotch oath is not binding on them. We know that the peculiar form of holding and kissing the Bible is the usual form in England and Ireland. It is even believed, that owing to the unimpressive way in which an oath is muttered over by an officer in the English courts, some natives of both countries—Episcopalians as well as Catholics—(the former probably more than the latter), imagine that if they do not kiss the book, the oath is not administered. But in giving either the option of such an oath, one is, in truth, showing questionable deference to the established and legal form in England and Ireland—not devising an oath for the supposed opinions of one set of Christians. But, while there is a separate and distinct mode of administering an oath to Catholics, by which alone they can be religiously sworn, and to fasten down upon that large class what is not attempted either in England or Ireland—the exhibition and the touching the sign of a cross as an article of their creed, without any investigation, and as a part of the oath to which they must submit,—seems to me one of the most intolerable acts of oppression which I ever heard of. I can only view it as religious persecution. And yet, farther, if a man—I must assume of respectability—known to be a householder—is called as a witness—is known to be a Catholic, and after some discussion as to how he is to be sworn, and he professes himself ready either to take the Scotch oath, or to be sworn according to the way in which the oath would be administered in Ireland—his native country,—and he is then deliberately sworn according to the laws of Scotland,—is there warrant for the notion, that an inferior magistrate (without even that inquiry as to the belief of particular sects as to oaths, which is not fitting for such tribunals, and without inquiry as to this man's faith), can turn round, and upon an expectation that the person will be guilty of perjury, order him, under pain of contempt, to take another oath in a way which, to that person's religious opinion, is an insult upon his faith? It does humbly appear to me to be at variance with every principle of law. On this part of the case, I am decidedly of opinion that there is no power to compel any person to take an oath different from that prescribed by the law of the land, unless it shall be solemnly decided after full inquiry, as in the case of Omishund and Barker (1 Atkins, 21) in England, by authoritative inquiry in the Supreme Court, that the religious tenets of some particular sect require a different form of oath; and, 2dly, that when a party, after discussion as to how he should be sworn, has been deliberately sworn according to the law of Scotland, it is incompetent—before any thing occurs in his examination to create suspicion, without inquiry into his individual opinions, or that of his sect, but upon the avowed and public imputation that he will not feel the obligation of the oath which he has taken—to order him instantly to take another oath, in a form and manner as unknown to him as it is to the law. So far from thinking his conduct, in refusing, to be contempt, I regard the act of which he complains (if I am driven now to give an opinion upon it,) to be not only illegal, but as intolerable oppression as, in a free country, can be practised. I regard it as religious persecution, or magisterial despotism. It is said he did not state the oath to be against his faith. It would be somewhat singular to require from a poor man, in such a situation, to state all, or the best defences in law open to him. He says—(See.) That was enough. The Magistrates took his risk of going wrong, if he compelled him to be sworn again. But then I return to the point, that the whole of this discussion is incompetent and premature, and can only arise before the jury—as it is only fit and proper for a jury. I had at one time intended to go through the various clauses of the Acts of 1815, 1819, 1825 and 1830; and perhaps that is not the less necessary, owing to some very contradictory judgments in the House of Lords, pronounced on a very imperfect statement of the clauses in these Statutes. But these various enactments are well known to the Court, and I shall not go through them. But it is very necessary to advert to the Judicature Act, which, singularly enough, has not been adverted to in some of the incidental notices of these matters in the House of Lords—nor the distinction between the cases appropriate for jury trial, and those not appropriate, sufficiently or at all brought out. The general principle I apprehend to be clearly this: that in the cases appropriate for trial, they can only, upon the merits, be disposed of by means of a trial. The decision in the case of Kerr establishes that point as the general rule. But further, the second section of the 1st William IV. c. 69, plainly lays that down as the principle applicable to all the appropriate causes. Exceptions there are in which it is perfectly competent to decide the appropriate causes on matters of law; but these are limited and peculiar;—limited in character, and peculiar as to the form of procedure. In the first place, the provision in the 59th Geo. III., as to raising questions of law or relevancy on the summons and defences, was repealed by the Judicature Act, § 28: and none of these provisions are now in existence. I entreat your Lordships' attention to that important point. The Judicature Act made separate and distinct provision for the exceptions. I am quite aware that of late years, since the separate Jury Court was abolished, we have been a little apt in practice, but with the consent of both parties, and without the attention of the Court being called to the point, to confound the proceedings in the Judicature Act as to the preparation of ordinary cases in the Court of Session with those cases that are appropriate to jury trial; and the regulations as to which begin with the 28th section. I beg the Court to observe, that all the prior sections relate to the cases that are not appropriate to jury trial; and in particular, the 16th section, as to the discussions of questions of law and relevancy previous to trial, under which this interlocutor is truly pronounced as if competent, relates solely to the causes not appropriate, but which may depend on fact. It has no application to the appropriate causes. There is a totally separate and distinct set of regulations for the appropriate causes, as distinct as any two matters under one Statute can be. By the 29th section they are to go to the Jury Court; and then the 33d section contains the following provision—(read section 33). This is now the only provision. It will be observed that this provision, as to the appropriate causes, admits of the determination of such questions of law and relevancy only on a completed record. No doubt the parties have sometimes been willing and anxious to get the matter decided at once; but whenever the attention of the Court has been called to it, this has been uniformly attended to, and there has been no interlocutor, when the notice of the Court was directed to the matter assuizeling, pronounced, except on the closed record.

In the case of Scott v. Curle, where a point of law was raised as to a process-caption, the record was prepared—the case retransmitted to the Court of Session roll, and this Division, on advising minutes of debate, remitted to the Lord Ordinary to close the record and sustain the defences. My attention has been directed by one of your Lordships' number to the case of Bell v. Mylne, 15th June 1838; but there there was a record. I was for the pursuer. We were most anxious to have the question of law decided. The session papers state that to be the desire of both parties. The necessity of going to a jury was never raised in this Court. There was a proper question of law for determination,—viz., whether, on the terms of the minute of appointment, the teacher was removable, and the point, that the case ought to have gone to trial, was raised in the House of Lords without ever having been stirred in this Court, and against good faith,—nay, against positive consent. It is plain that the point had not been argued on sound grounds in the House of Lords, for Lord Cottenham seems to think that it was optional to send all cases to a jury; and that a party can insist to show a prima facie case for damages. The point came to be raised in the House of Lords very obviously, in consequence of a view which had in the interval been thrown out by Lord Cottenham in the case of Montgomery v. Boswell, in which his Lordship, to whom the distinction between the cases appropriate under the Statutes, and those which the Court may remit to trial when they are found to depend on matters of fact, and prepare for trial accordingly, and which, to the last, are under their discretion, was not (so far as I see) distinctly pleaded, appears to hold that a case—not one of the appropriate causes—once remitted to the jury roll must be tried, contrary to innumerable cases with us, and universal practice. In the case of Bell v. Mylne, Lord Cottenham certainly takes a very different view; but as the distinction I have alluded to was not pressed on him, he seems to hold, that as to all cases, even those appropriate for jury trial, the Court may decide them if they choose, without a trial. If the distinction had been pleaded, then it would at once have been seen that Bell v. Mylne, as one of the appropriate causes, had been brought within the 33d section of the Judicature Act, and so was competently dealt with by the Court as it was: So, in Findlater v. Duncan, there is an incidental remark by Lord Cottenham (in which I observe that Lord Brougham does not intimate any concurrence), that the point might have been decided on the summons and defences; and I admit that the question might, in that case, have been decided on the record; for the point was a distinct and proper question of law, separate from the merits,—viz., whether an action will lie against road trustees to recover out of the trust-funds. In this case the action is disposed of as an ordinary Court of Session cause, under the first sections, under the Judicature Act. I think that it is manifestly incompetent. There must be a completed record before the party can be assuizied upon any question of law, in any of the appropriate causes. This distinction was not lightly adopted by the commission which suggested that Statute. It was done upon two broad principles: 1st, That in the appropriate causes for which a jury was the proper tribunal, questions of law and relevancy were not to be raised until the precise state of the facts was obtained by the precision and accuracy of a record, with the deliberate intention of excluding such attempts as are made here to arrest these cases, and exclude trial; and 2dly, for the purpose of having the proper separation of law or relevancy from the fact brought out by means of a record, so as to prevent the Court usurping or encroaching upon the functions of a jury, and defeating jury trial. These were wise principles. They are embodied in the Statute. I think this case, and the note of the Lord Ordinary, illustrates their value forcibly. No doubt actions of damages are often raised, which the counsel for the pursuer know had better be brought to issue as speedily as possible, and at the earliest stage. In several cases that have been before the Court, the counsel on both sides have concurred—for the pursuer as much as for the defender—in wishing to sink the distinctions under the Statute, as to the manner, and the stage of the cause in which, in the appropriate cases, questions of law and relevancy might be raised, for the laudable purpose of bringing to a speedy result a doubtful or desperate case. I have done so frequently myself, when, along with the counsel on the other side, we knew we were quite out of form. But in all these cases, the question on which the judgment of the Court was asked was a proper question of law or relevancy, separable from the facts,—not the whole merits of a mixed case, such as the present. And the determination of such questions in no degree imported the superseding the functions of a jury. In the case of Bell v. Mylne, the teacher in the Dollar Academy held his office by written appointment. His record stated, that there was no power to dismiss him under that written document, and he therefore claimed damages. There there was a question of law clear from facts. In the case of Findlater v. Road Trustees, the point might have been raised before trial, that an action did not lie against road trustees. That was a separate question of law;—or, in the class of questions which arise very conveniently in framing issues, whether the action is relevant without malice—there again is a proper and separate question of relevancy;—or in this case, if the statutory averments had been left out, and if twopence had been tendered, that the action would not lie for more might be pleaded as matter of law. Neither do I wish to say at present, that when the record is prepared, questions might not be brought out in this case, on which a proper question of law, entirely separate from fact, may not be brought out. But the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is precisely of the character of a verdict upon the merits—the mixed merits of fact and law. I have examined every case which has occurred, in which any of the appropriate cases have been disposed of on questions of law and relevancy, and I cannot find one in the least degree analogous to the sort of question raised in the present case, in which the cause is to be at once decided, not on any proper and distinct question of law or relevancy separable from the general merits of the case, but on the view which the Court may take of the merits, or probable merits of the cause, without trial and without a jury. How many cases have there been of the alleged illegal and oppressive use of diligence, or of irregular warrants, and similar actions of damages, in which it might have been very easy for the Court, upon summons and defences, to dismiss the action—and probably very much according to the law and justice of the case—upon the sort of a general view of the whole merits that is here taken. No doubt there is a practical suffocation of these cases in the Issue-Chambers, where the jury clerks, in the exercise of that superintendence which has been so highly beneficial, and been conducted with so much sagacity, refuse to give issues, and the party generally finds out, and is advised, that the nature of his case is such that he ought to acquiesce, and is not likely to take much by an appeal to the Court: and when the case comes the length of issues, it will be open to contend, after a full statement of the facts, that there is no issuable matter. But what I object to as utterly incompetent under the Statute—as perfectly new in a disputed case—and as most dangerous, is, first, the decision of the matter in the present stage of the cause; and secondly, the confounding a general view of the merits of the whole case with a proper distinct question of law and relevancy, separated for the Court from any matters of fact, or any estimate of, and opinion on, the effect of the facts averred. I must conclude with declaring, that to the disposal of this case I look with the greatest anxiety. I have seen as much of vexatious actions of damages as any man, and I know how much the system of jury trial has suffered from this evil, peculiarly incident to the first introduction to such a system. But these are small matters when weighed against the general principles on which the system is based. The cognizance of cases of oppression and wrong by a jury, is a most invaluable part of the administration of justice. Judges are not the best fitted for estimating rightly the motives in which wrong originates, or the character of the acts in which it consists. We are apt to lean too much to the side of authority. We are apt to judge of the probable merits of a case too much from previous experience of other similar cases. We are the better of the aid, and concurrence, and check of a jury in disposing of such cases. Our function is best discharged in stating the law for them, in the first instance, to apply; and if, in the outset of such causes against Magistrates, before even we have the benefit of the statutory check of a completed record, we constitute ourselves the Judges of what was oppressive or not, and of the general merits of the action of damages, I fear that one of the greatest uses of jury trial, and one of the best safeguards for the liberties of the subject, would be soon defeated. In the present case—where there is a certain, and very great protection given to inferior magistrates, but where the party, in terms of the Statute, undertakes to prove that the act was not only illegal but oppressive, malicious, and without reasonable or probable cause,—I hold it to be entirely beyond the power of the Court to intercept the case from trial, on its own view of the facts and general merits of the action. I see no question of law or relevancy separable from the estimate which the Court take of the propriety and character of the acts done, in which the oppression is stated to consist.

Lord Moncreiff.—This appeared to me to be a short and very simple case, but the opinion now delivered renders it one of vital importance to the law. I thought we were to judge on the facts set forth in the summons; and the question is not, what is the proper form in which an oath is to be administered to Roman Catholics, or whether the Magistrates exercised a sound discretion in the manner in which they acted here; but the question is, whether magistrates, sitting as Judges, and pronouncing judgment, must, in every case where a party avers malice, go before a jury? If it appear expedient to the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Medwyn, I am willing to go to the whole Court for their opinion on the matter. After the cases of Duncan and Bell, I entertain no doubt that it is not only competent to, but is the bounden duty of the Court, where no case is stated on record that ought to go to a jury, to give judgment without allowing it to go farther. In Duncan's case it was held by Lord Cottenham that the Court ought to have disposed of the case on the summons and defences; and he reversed the interlocutor, remitting the cause to a jury, holding that no relevant case was set forth in the summons. I don't know whether he proceeded accurately upon the Statutes, but it is evident he considered them carefully, and so decided. In the case of Duncan, the wrong was committed by servants, and it not being averred that it was done through the fault of the trustees, the action was held to be irrelevant. Here it is attempted to make Judges liable for what was done in the judicial seat. In the case of Bell, Lord Cottenham repeats his law, that it is within the competency of the Court to take cognizance of the relevancy of the action on the summons and defences. In Forbes v. Allison, 1823, it was said there was no relevancy in the action, and it was so found. This was done upon the issues; and according to the uniform practice, the record is not closed till the issues be settled. Having these authorities, I am not called upon, nor entitled to go into the terms of the Statutes. Holding that it is within our competency to decide upon the relevancy, I hold that there is no case against the Magistrates which can be sent to a jury. They were sitting as Judges, and the thing complained of is, that they ordained the pursuer to be imprisoned for contempt of Court; that is, that they pronounced a judgment against which the pursuer complains. But there must be some specific statement of wilful illegality. The Magistrates cannot be liable for error of judgment. There must be illegality in the thing done; and it won't do to say the Judges decided maliciously,—otherwise, every party who loses his cause might drag Judges before a jury in an action of damages. It is easy to put in the word maliciously; and if a party were to say a legal sentence was pronounced maliciously, would that suffice? Illegality must first be established, and so clearly, that Judges could not have so acted in bona fide. I think the thing complained of here was injudicious, but it was not illegal. How can I say that it was, when it is in accordance with an established practice, not of yesterday, and frequently resorted to? It occurred in the noted trial of Burke, where a witness was sworn in the ordinary way; but it having turned out that he was a Roman Catholic, he was asked if he wished to take the oath a second time in another form? He said he did not know; but he was afterwards sworn in the form here complained of. It is the general practice to swear Catholics on a representation of the cross; and the clerks of Justiciary carry with them Bibles marked for that purpose. Now, I am not going into the question whether this be a right practice or not. It is not needful for the determination of this case; and it is not stated in the summons that no such practice obtains. If Hare, in the case referred to, had refused to take the oath a second time in the form proposed, it would have furnished an additional reason for insisting upon his compliance; and had he refused, he would have been committed.

If it had not been insisted in, how would the matter have stood before the jury? It has been the practice since, and must have been in observance before; and it is not spoken of as a novelty. It may be wrong, and founded on a mistake, as to its not being contrary to the Roman Catholic creed. But the Judges only propose an oath in the form recognised by practice, and the witness refuses. It is said that it was suggested in insulting terms, but the case against Lawson is reserved. The Procurator-fiscal moves the Court to administer the oath in a different form; and the Justices require Mone to take it; he refuses, and it is said the requisition was insulting to his feelings. But suppose it were, where is the illegality in the Magistrates having ordered his imprisonment? It may be he has a right to refuse, and henceforth, it may be proper to say to Justices, you shall not enforce the taking of this form of oath; but meanwhile, how can I say that it was illegal? He does not say that it was contrary to his conscience, but merely that he had been already sworn. Nothing is averred to bring it within a case of malice. On the summons and defences there is no relevancy; and, according to the case of Duncan, we are not only entitled, but bound to dismiss it.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Adhere to the interlocutor complained of; refuse the desire of the note, and of new find expenses due; allow the account to be given in, and remit the same, when lodged, to the auditor to tax and report."

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

NO. 143.—WILLIAM MURRAY, Pursuer, v. MISS ANNE MATILDA MURRAY and OTHERS, Defendants.

Entail—Fetters—Resolutive Clause.—Held that a power of sale was effectually excluded by an entail, which, after prohibiting "to sell, alienate or dispose," resolved the right of the party doing any thing "in the contrary of the said provisions, either by alienating or disposing," without mentioning selling,—and irritated "the debts, deeds, crimes, and delicts" of the party doing any thing "in the contrary of the said provisions, either by alienating or disposing," "or contracting debts," or by committing the crime of treason, or any species thereof, or any other crime or delict, or doing any other deed, civil or criminal.

In 1825, William Murray of Polmaise, the heir in possession of the entailed estate of Pitlochrie, obtained an Act of Parliament empowering him to sell that estate, and apply the price in the purchase of the estate of Cockspow belonging to himself in fee-simple, of which he was bound to execute an entail at the sight of the Court of Session, "containing all clauses needful in favour of the heirs called to the succession by the aforesaid entail of the estate of Pitlochrie, and according to the same series and substitution, and under all the provisions and conditions, declarations, and clauses prohibitory, irritant and resolutive, that are contained in the said deed of entail; and which entail shall bind the institute as well as the substitute, so that the said lands and estate of Cockspow, and others so to be conveyed, may be enjoyed by the same persons who would, under the said deed of entail of Pitlochrie, have enjoyed the said entailed estate, to be sold as aforesaid." When this Act was obtained, it was believed that the entail was perfectly valid; but Mr Murray, having been advised that it was defective in the resolutive and irritant clauses, brought the present action of declarator, in which, subsuming that the fetters did not apply to sales, he concluded to have it found and declared that he has "full and undoubted right and power to sell the said lands," and that certain missives of sale, entered into between him and John Murray, merchant in Liverpool, "constituted a valid sale;" and further, that he "has sole and exclusive right" to the price, and that the same is his "absolute property." At the same time with the declarator an adjudication in implement was brought by John Murray the purchaser.

The fetters of the entail are as follows:—It is "provided and declared, and shall be so declared by the infeftments to follow hereupon, and by the services, retours, precepts, and instruments of sasine, of me, or of the succeeding heirs of tailzie in all time coming, that it shall be nowise leisome nor lawful to, nor in the power of me or the heirs, male or female, of my body, nor of the other heirs of tailzie above written, nor the descendants of their bodies, to sell, alienate, or dispose the lands and others before rehearsed, or any part or portion thereof, either irredeemably or under reversion, or to grant wadsets or infeftments of annualrent furth of the same, or to burden the said lands with any servitude or other burdens whatsoever; nor to set nor grant any tacks of the same above the space of ten years, and not under the ordinary rent; neither shall it be lawful to them, nor in the power of them or any of them, to contract any debt whatsoever, nor to commit any crime of whatsoever kind, and particularly the crime of treason, or any species of it, or to do or commit any other fact or deed, civil or criminal, whereby the lands and others before mentioned, or any part thereof, may be apprized or adjudged, or any other manner of way evicted, forfeited, or become caducary, or the order of succession hereby set down anywise altered, innovate, or infringed, in prejudice of this present tailzie, or of those who shall succeed in virtue thereof; and if I or any of the heirs of tailzie, of whatsoever sex, that shall happen to succeed by virtue of these presents in time coming, or my or their descendants, shall do anything in the contrary of the said provisions, either by alienating or disposing the lands and others before written, or any part thereof, or contracting debts, either real or personal, or by committing the crime of treason, or any species thereof, or any other crime or delict, or doing any other deed, civil or criminal, the said debts, deeds, crimes, and delicts, and all and every one of them, shall not only ipso facto become null and void, in so far as concerns the lands and others before written, so that they shall be nowise affected or burdened therewith, in prejudice of the succeeding heirs of tailzie and provision; but also, the contraveners shall not only forfeit, amit, and tye their right to, and interest in the lands and others before specified, but likewise to the mails, duties, rents, profits, and casualties thereof, and the same shall be nowise affectable by the contravener's creditors, nor shall they be affectable by them, nor fall under their single or liferent escheats, and the said hail lands, and mails and duties thereof, shall ipso facto, from and after the respective deeds of contravention, be devolved upon, and pertain and belong to the person that shall be next and have right to succeed by virtue hereof, free from all debts, deeds, crimes, and delicts done, contracted, and committed by the contraveners, and it shall be lawful to the person having right to succeed, to use any legal or formal method for establishing the right of the said lands in their person, in respect the contravener's right will be resolved and extinct from the time of the contravention, as if he were naturally dead."

The substitute heirs pleaded in defence—1. That the entail of the lands of Cockspow contains an effectual prohibition against the heir in possession selling the estate, and that consequently the pursuer, in entering into the missive of sale libelled on, acted beyond his powers, and in contravention of the entail: 2. That, at all events, the pursuer is not entitled to have it declared against the defenders, that he has right to grant dispositions of the entailed lands: 3. That the pursuer is barred, personali exceptione, from violating the prohibition of the deed of entail executed by himself. 4. Even if the sale of the lands were found good, the pursuer is bound to reinvest the price for the benefit of the substitute heirs.

The Lord Ordinary, in reporting the cause on cases, issued the following note:

"The present question relates to the validity or sufficiency of the resolute and irritant clauses of a tailzie. The Lord Ordinary is inclined to think that the leading plea of the pursuer is well founded; but as the case is not precisely similar to any that have recently occurred, though it turns on the same principles of nice construction which have ruled many other cases of tailzie during the last half century, while there is one decision of this Court (not carried to appeal) adverse to the first plea of the pursuer, it is thought most suitable in every view to report the cause to the Court.

"1. The resolute clause is objected to on this ground, that while the prohibitions of the tailzie are so conceived as to prevent the heirs, in express terms, 'to sell, alienate or dispose' the said lands, the resolute clause only takes effect if the heirs 'shall do anything in the contrary of the said provisions, either by alienating or disposing the lands and others before written, or any part thereof, or contracting debts, either real or personal, or by committing the crime of treason,' &c. As the resolute clause is thus framed, not simply by a general reference to the prohibitions, but by a repetition of particulars in which 'selling' is omitted, it is argued that sales are not rescinded. To this it is answered, that 'sales' are synonymous with alienations and dispositions, and as these latter acts are specially resolved, the clause is sufficient to include sales.

"Now, if this be held as an open point, the Lord Ordinary must own that he does not consider the answer sufficient. It humbly appears to him the words 'sell, annailzie or dispo,' are neither synonymous and exchangeable terms in themselves, —nor does the Act 1685 authorise them to be so treated. For the Act carefully sets forth the three words successively; and it is difficult to hold that any party can make the restraint complete without using the whole words of the Statute. Take the case that a proprietor, in framing a tailzie, limited the prohibitory clause to the case of 'selling' only, would that reach a free gift by disposition inter vivos? It is thought that it would not, though, of course, a prohibition against disposing would effectually apply to such a case. Again, if a prohibitory clause were directed against sales only, would it reach an alienation by feu-contract? The Lord Ordinary is inclined to think that it would not.

"It is hardly thought that this question is determined by the cases of Queensberry (1 Bligh, 339), and of Stirling (Fac. Col., 20th February 1821); in both of which a prohibition against 'disposing' was held to strike against long leases, and even stated to be equivalent to a prohibition against alienations. Though 'disposition' and 'alienation' may be equivalent terms, it would not necessarily follow that sales, and dispositions, and alienations are also synonymous. A sale may notoriously be effected by minute, or by articles of roup, or by an obligation to sell, on which adjudication in implement may be pursued by the purchaser without the heir himself executing the direct act of alienation or disposition.

"Still the question remains, whether the point be open? In the case of Humbie, in 1758 (Dict. p. 15,510), it was certainly found by this Court that the prohibition to annailzie and dispo in an entail, 'implied a prohibition to sell;' but when the case was carried to appeal, their Lordships waived deciding that point, and affirmed the judgment of this Court, on the ground that an entail without a resolute clause, was not protected by the Act 1685, which rendered it unnecessary to consider any other ground of reduction.

"But undoubtedly the very question which here arises, occurred in 1803 in the case of Stobbs, (Dict., p. 15,542,) —it seems then to have undergone an elaborate discussion by the first counsel at the bar; and the Court found that an entail containing a distinct prohibition against selling, while the resolute clause was directed against disposing only, was nevertheless effectual. That case, however, was not carried to appeal, and under the literal rules as to the construction of tailzies, which have been more fully recognised since 1803 than they were previously understood, the Lord Ordinary greatly doubts if the single decision now referred to, ought to be held as settling the law upon an entail expressed in its different clauses as that now before the Court has been framed.

"II. The next objection urged against the tailzie, is founded on a supposed defect or insufficiency in the irritant clause. It is contended that this clause, as expressed, is incomplete, as it cannot be held in strict construction to irritate the right even of a party alienating and disposing.

"This is evidently a point of nicety and difficulty. The irritant clause, as expressed, declares, that 'the said lands, &c., shall ipso facto, from and after the respective deeds of contravention, be devolved upon, and pertain and belong to the person that shall be next, and have right to succeed by virtue hereof, free from all debts, deeds, and delicts done, contracted, and committed,' &c. And the pursuer argues that the word 'deeds' must be construed, as it was in the cases of Adam and of Lang, to mean only deeds of feudal delinquency.

"But there are terms used in the irritant clause here, which create some distinction between the present case and those referred to. For example, in the outset of it, the forfeiture is declared to commence 'from and after the respective deeds of contravention,' which certainly is a very comprehensive term, and may and probably must be construed to apply to all acts of contravention struck at by the prohibitory clause. If so, when the clause goes on to declare that the next heir shall have right to the succession, 'free from all debts, deeds, and delicts done, contracted and committed,' it may perhaps be justly inferred that the deeds here struck at were part of the same deeds as those comprehended in the preceding line of the same clause. Indeed, had there been a slight transposition of a single word —in particular, if it had been said that the next heir should succeed 'free from all deeds, debts, and delicts done, contracted, and committed,' &c., the case would have come very near indeed to the case of Finzean, very lately decided by this Court, (17th June 1840.) See 2 D. B. and M. Reports, p. 1162.

"At the same time, the clause as it stands, certainly does bear a very remarkable similarity to the irritant clause in the case of Lang, and still more to that of Blairadam, in both of which the irritancies were held by the House of Lords to have been imperfectly expressed. But there is a difference here which it is of great importance for the Court to keep in view, so as to make the determination of the present case perfectly reconcilable with those in the cases of Finzean, Auchindoir, &c., which have been recently before the Court.

"In conclusion, it may be proper to observe, that there is one branch of the defenders' argument founded on the validity and efficacy of destinations inter hæredes, when accompanied by prohibitory clauses, but unprotected by effectual irritant clauses, to which no answer is made in the pursuer's revised case. But if the resolute or irritant clause be held defective, the pursuer has a legal power to sell the estate in the meantime; and he cannot be bound (as found in Ascog) to reinvest the price during his own life. If, however, the sale shall be only colourable, and if any competition as to the estate, or possibly, in certain circumstances, even as to its price, shall arise between the heirs of entail and the pursuer's heirs as gratuitous disponees under mortis causa deeds, it is thought that such questions should be reserved. The entail here is at least equivalent to a destination fortified with a prohibitory clause; and the doctrine of all the institutional writers on the law of Scotland—(See Erskine, B. III. t. 8, sec. 23, and Bell's Principles, No. 1717), has not been abrogated, declaring that a party possessing on such a right, cannot alienate the estate by gratuitous deeds to take effect after his own death inter hæredes. On the contrary, in the late case of Strathbrock, this was declared by the House of Lords to be still an open point (See 1 Robinson's Reports, p. 908.) From the very general and comprehensive terms of the conclusions of the supplementary action in the present instance, it is apprehended that the power of the pursuer as to the sale of the estate, and disposal of the price, should be limited to onerous or gratuitous deeds, to take effect during his own life; reserving all questions inter heredes, if any such should ever occur."

When the cause came to be advised, the Court ordered it to be laid, for consultation, before all the Judges.

The following opinions were returned:

Lord Moncreiff, concurred in by Lords Meadowbank, Medwyn, Jeffrey, Cockburn and Murray:

"The object of this action is to have it found and declared, that the pursuer has power to make an effectual sale of the lands of Cockspow and others, in which he stands invested under a disposition and deed of entail executed by himself, in obedience to the express provisions of an Act of Parliament of the 57th Geo. III. The summons sets forth, by a recital of the terms of that entail, that the pursuer had succeeded to the lands of Pitlochrie and others, as an heir-substitute of entail, under a deed executed by Patrick Murray in 1727; and that, having become proprietor of the lands of Cockspow and others in fee-simple, he had obtained an Act of Parliament for enabling him to sell the said lands of Pitlochrie and others, at the sight of this Court, on condition that the price should be applied in the purchase of the lands of Cockspow and others, and that these lands should be entailed on the same series of heirs,—he being bound to execute, at the sight of the Court, a deed of entail, 'containing all clauses needful, in favour of the heirs called to the succession by the aforesaid entail of the estate of Pitlochrie, and according to the same series and substitution, and under all the provisions and conditions, declarations, and clauses prohibitory, irritant and resolute, that are contained in the said deed of entail, and which entail shall bind the institute as well as the substitutes,' &c. It is further set forth, that the sale took place, and that the entail of Cockspow was executed in terms of the Statute, on which the pursuer was infest. Then the summons states, that the pursuer has entered into an onerous contract for the sale of these lands of Cockspow and others, and proceeds to conclude to have it found and declared—1st, 'That the pursuer has full and undoubted right and power to sell the said lands of Cockspow,' &c., 'in any way he may think proper, at a fair price or other onerous consideration;' and 2d, 'that the foresaid mis-sives of sale, entered into between him and the said John Murray as aforesaid, constitute a good and valid sale, and binding on the said pursuer,' &c.

"It certainly presents a remarkable peculiarity in this case, that the pursuer, after having found it necessary, with the consent, it may be presumed, of the substitute heirs of entail, to obtain an Act of Parliament for enabling him to sell the lands of Pitlochrie which he held under an entail said to have contained precisely the same clauses which, in terms of that Act, were made to constitute the conditions of the entail of Cockspow, should now bring an action to have it found by this Court that, notwithstanding those clauses, he has power to sell the lands of Cockspow absolutely and unconditionally. The meaning of this, however, is plain enough. It must be supposed, either that the pursuer has now discovered some essential defect in the entail, which was not observed while he held the lands of Pitlochrie, or otherwise, that the law and the principle of judgment in such cases have been changed since the time when the Act of Parliament was obtained, and the new entail was executed under the authority of this Court. Whatever may have been the decisions pronounced in particular cases, and however it may be thought that there is difficulty in this as in other branches of law, in reconciling all the decisions, I cannot assent to the proposition, that the law, or the principle of judgment in the application of it, has undergone any change. But it is a possible thing that the discussion of other cases may have disclosed a legal defect in this entail, which had not before occurred to the party or his advisers: And if it be so, it is perfectly fair for the pursuer to try the question concerning the extent of his power with reference to onerous deeds of sale.

"It seems to be very clear, on the one hand, that the pursuer can be in no better situation, as the heir in possession under the entail of Cockspow, than he was as the entailed proprietor of Pitlochrie. All the restraining clauses being, as the Act of Parliament required, expressly applied to him as institute, he can have no power which he would not have had as the substitute heir under the entail of Pitlochrie; and it is impossible that, by the change of the lands, effected only at his own desire with the consent of the heirs of entail, and by the force of a Statute, all being completed in due form and in compliance with the Act 1685, he can have obtained any advantage against the heirs of entail which he did not possess before in regard to the lands Pitlochrie. But, on the other hand, it does not appear to me that he can be in a worse situation with regard to any question of power, according to the legal import of the entail. For although the Act of Parliament was no doubt applied for, and obtained, in the belief that the entail of Pitlochrie contained effectual restraining clauses against all sales and alienations, yet, if it should appear that it was not de facto and de jure effectual for that purpose, it must then be held, that the pursuer might have sold Pitlochrie without asking for any Act of Parliament, and might still have possessed Cockspow in fee-simple. And it does not appear to me, that the mere circumstance of the entail of Cockspow having been necessarily executed by the pursuer himself under the Act of Parliament, can have any effect in the question concerning the legal construction of the entailing clauses as they stand. I do not think, therefore, that the plea last insisted on in the case for the defenders (the 3d plea in law in the record), could be available against the second declaratory conclusion of the summons, if that conclusion should be found to be in itself well founded. Every thing must depend on what the legal effect of the entail really is.

"The question then is, whether this entail is effectual to prevent a sale of the estate? The pursuer takes two points—1st, That there is a defect in the resolutive clause; and 2d, That the irritant clause is also insufficient.

"1. The objection to the resolutive clause is no new discovery. It is, that whereas the prohibitory clause prohibits the heirs to sell, alienate, or dispose the lands, the resolutive clause, which is combined with the irritant, only declares that the heirs shall forfeit if they 'shall do any thing contrary to the said provisions, either by alienating or disposing the lands,' &c., the word selling not being repeated. If this objection were well founded, it probably would apply to both the clauses. But as the very point has occurred, and has been decided both by this Court and in the House of Lords, even with reference to a more doubtful case, and as there is yet no decision whatever to the contrary, I am of opinion that the plea cannot be sustained.

"It appears to me that the present case must be ruled by the two judgments in the case of Elliot of Stobbs, the one in 1803, and the other by the House of Lords in 1821; and that it is too late to argue this question as a matter of abstract law. The question in the case of Elliot, May 19, 1803, was identical with the point raised in the present case, with only the important difference, that, in the resolutive clause of the Stobbs entail, the word alienate did not occur. The prohibitory clause prohibited the heirs 'to sell, annailzie, wadset, dispose, dilapidate, and put away.' The resolutive bore only the words 'or who, whether male or female, and I, shall dispose the said lands and estate,' &c. Sir William Elliot had entered into a minute of sale, as the pursuer has done. The purchaser suspended, on the ground that Sir William had no power to sell; and Sir William brought a declarator to have it found that the entail was not effectual to prevent a sale. The Court sustained the defences, holding the entail to be good. I can see no difference between that case and the present, except a difference which is very strong against the pursuer, that here the word 'alienating' is in the resolutive clause. I am not aware that it has ever been doubted that sales are comprehended under the word alienating. But in Elliot's case the term dispose alone was held sufficient.

"The discussion on that entail was renewed in 1818, in relation to the validity of a long lease. This proceeded on the notion that, however the word dispos might be sufficient to cover sales, it was not equivalent to the term alienate, under which the Court had found in the Queensberry case that long leases were effectually prohibited. This argument prevailed in this Court at the time. But the case having been appealed, the Lord Chancellor Eldon, on very deliberate consideration, reversed the judgment, and found in terminis, 'that, according to the true construction of the deed of entail of the estate, the prohibition to dispose extends to the lease in question, and that the irritant and resolutive clauses do so refer to the specific prohibition to dispose, as to render the same effectual against third parties.' (1 Shaw's App. p. 17, 14th March 1821.) It is impossible not to see that this judgment was a great deal stronger than the decision in 1803. It had long before been decided in the case of Humbie, that a clause prohibiting to dispose was sufficient as a prohibition against sales; and the judgment in 1803 simply held the same term to be sufficient in the resolutive clause to cover sales. Lord Eldon's judgment, again, in express words declares the irritant and resolutive clauses, expressed by the term dispose, to be sufficient, by relation to the same term in the prohibitory clause, to secure the entail against third parties. But it was evidently going a step farther to hold that, under an entail which prohibited to sell, annaizie, wadset, dispone, &c., the term dispose alone, in the resolutive clause, was sufficient to cover the case of a long lease. Yet there would have been no question there, if the term alienate, as well as dispose, had been in the resolutive clause as it is in the entail of Cockspow. It is, however, also of the greatest importance that the Lord Chancellor, in pronouncing that judgment, referred expressly to the numerous previous decisions on the effect of the word dispose; and though, among those quoted to him, the case on the same entail in 1803 was very prominently presented, there is no trace of his having expressed the least doubt concerning the soundness of the judgment pronounced in it. There is, besides, another case, in which all the same doctrine concerning the import of the term dispose was in express terms confirmed. Stirling v. Dun, House of Lords, 22d June 1829. W. and S. III. p. 462.

"Holding, therefore, that the answer to the pursuer's objection in the present case follows a fortiori from the decisions; and, being farther of opinion, that, even independent of them, the terms of the resolutive clause in the entail of Cockspow are sufficient, I think that this plea on the part of the pursuer must be rejected.

"2. The special objection taken to the validity of the irritant clause is of a different nature, and may admit of more doubt. It seems to have been suggested by the late decision in the House of Lords in the case of Lang against Lang. But, as it appears to me that the terms employed in the present case are of a very precise and determinate nature, and that there is an important difference between it and the case of Lang, I am not able to come to the opinion, that the irritant clause is not sufficient to protect the estate and the heirs against a sale or alienation.

"After the prohibitory clause, the entail proceeds to provide, that if I or any of the heirs of tailzie, &c., 'shall do any thing in the contrary of the said provisions, either by alienating or disposing the lands and others before written, or any part thereof, or contracting debts, either real or personal, or by committing the crime of treason, or any species thereof, or any other crime or delict, or doing any other deed, civil or criminal, the said debts, deeds, crimes, and delicts shall not only ipso facto become null and void in so far as concerns the lands and others before written,' &c., but also the contravener shall forfeit the whole lands, which shall ipso facto, 'from and after the respective deeds of contravention,' devolve upon the next heir who shall have right to succeed, 'free from all debts, deeds, crimes, and delicts, done, contracted, and committed by the contraveners,' &c.

"There can be no doubt concerning the obvious meaning of these clauses. But I fully agree in the statement, that in such a question of construction, the mere intention to be discovered, from a comparison of the different clauses of the deed, is not sufficient. It is quite unnecessary to go into any detail of the authorities in this matter. I only think it necessary again to observe, that I cannot entertain the idea, that any of the later decisions which have been pronounced in this Court, or in the House of Lords, have made any change on the rule or principle of the law for the construction of such deeds, as being strictissimi juris. The application of the principle to particular cases is often a matter of great difficulty; and in reviewing such cases, it may be thought by individual lawyers, that in some of them it has not received full effect, and in others has been carried too far. But the principle itself is fully recognised throughout them all, and in truth has never been disputed in any one of them, though parties may have contended, and Judges may have thought, that it was sometimes strained to excess, and sometimes did not receive the effect due to it. And it appears to me, that any of the late decisions, which are supposed to have altered the principle of judgment, are no more than exemplifications of the application of the principle of strict construction, always acknowledged, according to the view taken of the special case before the Court.

"Waiving any further discussion on this subject, let it be observed, that the passage of the entail from which the above excerpts have been made, constitutes one unbroken sentence, embracing both the irritant and resolutive clauses, and that the full legal import of it cannot be seen without taking into view the whole parts of it. It is all governed by the hypothesis with which the clause begins—'If I or any of the heirs,' &c., 'shall do any thing in the contrary of the said provisions,' &c. This is no doubt followed by an enumeration of particulars, which, according to the rule established at least since the case of Tillicoultry, does and must qualify the general term. But, unlike the clause in Tillicoultry, the special acts here enumerated do comprehend the case of sales. Not to go back on the point already considered, the words are express, that if the pursuer, or any of the heirs, shall do any thing in the contrary of the provisions, 'either by alienating or disposing the lands,' &c., which words, even in an irritant and resolutive clause of an entail, which in the prohibitory clause has the word 'sell,' must be held to be sufficient to comprehend sales. The second case in the hypothesis is—'or contracting debts.' There is a third case, that of committing treason or any other crime. And then there is a fourth more general and comprehensive supposition, viz., by 'doing any other deed, civil or criminal'—that is, any other deed contrary to the provisions. It is of very great importance that all these cases or supposed acts of contravention are alike under the form of the first words—'If I or any of the heirs' shall do any thing contrary to the provisions, either by selling,' &c. The clause, being so far made special by the enumeration, must be so regarded and dealt with; and all the cases are covered alike by the words 'If,' &c. Now it must certainly be supposed, in giving effect to such an express provision as this, that 'something is to follow in all and each of the cases stated, and more especially in those which are specific and definite—'alienating or disposing'—'or contracting debts.' The sentence is not completed till that consequence is laid down. It is possible, no doubt, that by confusion or inadvertency, the words employed may be insufficient. But the question is, whether they are so or not? If they are in their nature and import sufficient for the natural purpose of covering the supposed acts of contravention, and so completing the sentence with reference to all of them, there is here no confusion or cause of ambiguity, to make it the duty of the Court to refuse effect to them in any particular case. The consequence, then, is thus laid down,—'the said debts, deeds, crimes and delicts, and all and every one of them, shall not only ipso facto become null and void,' &c. That the word deeds is in itself technically sufficient to comprehend all deeds of alienation or disposition, and so to cover the special case in the first part of the hypothesis put, which again is equivalent to sales, will not admit of any serious doubt. For many entails, which have been sifted to the uttermost, had no other word to protect them against sales; as in the Roxburgh entail, in which the irritant clause was simply 'all whilk deeds so to be done,' &c. Neither in the present case is there any room for the construction, which has been applied in some other cases, that the words have reference only to the last member of the enumeration—'or doing any other deed, civil or criminal.' The whole structure of the sentence forbids this. But it is also excluded by the circumstance, that debts and crimes, which stand before that clause, are clearly and expressly included in the declaration of nullity. The word 'debts' is not in the general clause; and the specification of them may have seemed to be necessary with reference to the contracting of personal debts, as to which no deed or writing of any kind may be executed.

"But it is to be observed that this declaration of nullity does not terminate the sentence. Other consequences are to follow, which all hang upon the same hypothesis, and are also evidently dependent on the nullity of the deeds. The clause goes on—'but also the contraveners shall not only forfeit' all right to the estate, but likewise to the rents, &c.; and the lands and mills, &c., 'shall ipso facto, from and after the respective deeds of contravention, be devolved on and pertain,' &c., to the next heir, free 'from all debts, deeds, crimes and delicts, done, contracted, and committed by the contraveners,'—that is, applicando singula singulis, deeds done, debts contracted, or crimes committed; and it shall be lawful for the next heir to establish his right as if the contravener were naturally dead. This completes the sentence; and it will be observed, that all the last words are perfectly general, and cannot by possibility be confined in their application to any particular part of the hypothetical cases of contravention stated in the first part of it. They evidently do and must apply equally to them all. Yet they only follow, and are dependent on the irritancy or nullity first declared, proceeding on the entire hypothesis in the first part of the sentence.

"From the peculiar structure, therefore, of the whole clause in this entail, it seems to me to be impossible, on any construction, however strict, to hold that there is not a complete and express irritant clause applying to all deeds of alienation or disposition, wherein sales are necessarily comprehended.

"The case which apparently gives the most probable support to the pursuer's argument is that of Lang v. Lang, 23d November 1838, as decided in the House of Lords. I am bound to hold that case to have been rightly decided, though the judgment of the Court here was different; and I do so hold it. But there is the most marked difference between it and the present case. The clause is constructed in an entirely different manner from that followed in the entail of Overtown. In general, the safest form for making an effectual irritant or resolute clause, is to rest on a general assumption of any contravention of the conditions or provisions before laid down; because, in any special enumeration, there is always a danger of some important article in the prohibitory clause being omitted, which no general words prefixed or added to the enumeration will in that case legally supply. But there is a different danger in the other form. If care be not taken, in the position and terms of the general clause of irritancy, to make it expressly and necessarily apply to all the parts of the prohibitory clause, and to exclude any more limited application, the principle of strict construction may make it necessary to understand it in a more limited sense in favour of freedom, because the words admit of such an interpretation. This seems to be the principle of the case of Lang, as it was of that of Adam v. Robertson Barclay. The entailor had confined himself to general words immediately following the last part of the prohibitory clause—'and if they do in the contrary, it is declared,' &c. The question was, whether these general words, in connection with the special consequences laid down, necessarily applied to everything within the prohibitory clause, or might be construed as being confined to the last member of that clause, with which they stood in immediate juxtaposition. It was held, as I understand the case in this point of it, that they did admit of this last construction, and that the words 'if they do in the contrary,' all such debts and deeds shall be intrinsically void and null,' were to be taken as limited in their application to the immediately preceding substantive prohibition—'nor to contract debts, nor do any other deed, whereby' the lands might be evicted, &c.

"Whatever opinion shall be formed of the present case, it cannot, in my apprehension, stand on the same ground with that of Lang. Even if the entailor had here rested on the general words in the beginning of the irritant clause, they are such that it would have been difficult or impossible to confine their application in the same way as the simple words 'do in the contrary' were confined in Lang's case. For they are, if I or any heir 'shall do any thing in the contrary of the said provisions,'—words which plainly relate to the whole limitations laid down. But the irritant clause itself here contains an enumeration of the cases to which these general terms were expressly meant to apply;—and the very first is that of 'alienating or disposing.' The declaration of irritancy is express, that if the party shall act 'contrary to the provisions, by alienating or disposing,'—in that precise case the consequence declared shall take effect. It is very true, that if the words in which that consequence is expressed were not in themselves sufficient to comprehend deeds of alienation or disposition, there might be a failure from the want of apt and proper terms. But this would be quite different from the result obtained in the case of Lang, and must be rested on a different principle. And if, on the other hand, the words, or any of them, are in themselves sufficient for the case of alienation or disposition, which I apprehend they clearly are, it cannot in this case require or warrant a more limited construction of them, that the term deeds is necessarily connected with debts and crimes, in whatever order, with reference to the other cases of contravention in the enumeration; or that there is in that enumeration a general clause added to the contraction of debts, of doing any other deed, civil or criminal. The entailor has expressly said, that the consequence shall follow in all or any of the cases hypothetically assumed; and therefore, holding it to be clear law, that acts of alienation or disposition are comprehended under the term deeds, I cannot, without rejecting what appears to me to be the plain declaration of the entailor, come to the conclusion that this irritant clause does not effectually reach any act of alienation or sale.

"In truth, the point as to the effect of the irritant clause in Lang's case could only have become of any importance, if the other point which occurred in that case, as to the want of a substantive clause against altering the order of succession, had been determined differently from the judgment regarding it. When it was decided that there was no such effectual clause, and consequently that the heir in possession could at once extinguish the interest of all the substitutes, by a gratuitous act of alteration, the effect of the irritant clause ceased to be of any practical consequence. Still the point was solemnly determined: and I have so considered it.

"The case of Adam was of the same nature with that of Lang. But it appears to me to have been a stronger case in favour of the judgment; the general words—'all which debts, deeds, and contractions'—plainly admitting of a fair application to the special class of debts or deeds immediately before mentioned, viz., debts or deeds before the heir's succession. There was, altogether in that entail, an inaccurate disorder in the clauses, which fairly unbings the entail on sound principles.

"On the whole, I am of opinion that the conclusions of the summons cannot be acceded to, and that the defences ought to be sustained."

Lord Cuninghame :

"I am now satisfied, on the grounds stated by Lord Moncreiff, that the doubt which I expressed in a former stage of the present case, as to sales being included in a prohibition 'to dispose,' is not now an open question; and therefore upon that, as well as on other points of the case, I concur with Lord Moncreiff."

Lord Ivory :

"I had at first some difficulty in this case, looking to the very severe application of the principle of strict construction, of which the judgments on the Blairadam and Overtown entails are illustrations. But I have at last come to be satisfied that the present case is distinguishable.

"The question is, whether the irritant clause, in so far as it declares 'the said debts, deeds, crimes, and delicts, and all and every one of them,' to be null and void, is to be construed as exclusively confining the operation of these words to the special cases mentioned in the LATTER BRANCH of that portion of the clause which immediately precedes, viz., to the 'contracting debts, either real or personal, or committing the crime of treason, or any species thereof, or any other crime or delict, or doing any other deed, civil or criminal,'—or whether, on the contrary, it is not rather to be held as riding over and including the WHOLE preceding portion of the clause, and thus, as reaching whatever is comprehended under the leading and general enunciation (with which the clause sets out), of 'any thing done IN THE CONTRARY OF THE SAID PROVISIONS,' at least, as sufficiently doing this, to the effect of covering all the enumerated cases, which the entailor gives as exemplifications of what he himself held and intended to fall within this general enunciation, and so of comprehending the case of 'alienating and dis-poning the lands before written, or any part thereof,' not less than the other cases of 'contracting debt,' &c. If the first construction were to be adopted, the principle of Blairadam, Overtown, &c., would directly apply, and a corresponding judgment would fall to be here pronounced. If the second, there is no room for the objection which ruled these cases, and an opposite judgment would be the result.

"I am now of opinion that the latter is the sound alternative. Looking to the irritant clause in its whole context, and having regard also to the phraseology of the resolute clause, into which, without interruption of the sense, or any proper break of the sentence, the irritant runs, I am satisfied, that without any departure from the principle of a strict construction, and without resorting to any mere implication or inference in order to get at the meaning, there is clear ground, within the four corners of the entire sentence, for holding that the entail, in levelling his irritancy against 'the said debts, deeds, crimes and delicts, and all and every one of them,' used the words, not as restricted in their operation to any one, but as extending to, and comprehending within their scope, all the previously enumerated examples of those acts of contravention which he had begun the clause by more generally describing as 'any thing done in the contrary of the provisions;' in short, as being in this respect synonymous with the words 'deeds of contravention,' and again, 'all debts, deeds, crimes, and delicts, done, contracted, and committed by the contraveners,' as these expressions are afterwards introduced and applied in subsequent passages of the same continuous sentence. The reasoning of Lord Moncreiff's opinion appears to me to this effect conclusive.

"On the other branches of the case, as disposed of by that opinion, I have never entertained hesitation, and entirely concur with his Lordship."

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor :

"Sustain the defences; dismiss the action and supplementary action of declarator, and also the action of adjudication in implement; assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the said actions, and decern."

Lord Ordinary, Cuninghame. — Act. Solicitor-General (McNeill), J. Moncreiff; Alexander J. Russel, Agent. — Alt. Moir; John Archibald Campbell, Agent. — B. Clerk. — [H.B.]

2d March 1842.

FIRST DIVISION. — (H.B.)

No. 144. — ALEXANDER DINGWALL, Pursuer, v. ALEXANDER DINGWALL, Junior, and CURATORS, Defendants.

Entail — Fetters — An entail prohibited, inter alia, "to sell, alienate, impignorate or dispose," — resolved the right of the party contravening "the before-written provisions, conditions, restrictions, limitations, and others herein contained," — and further declared, that "in case any adjudication, apprising, or other legal diligence" shall be used against the estate "upon any debts or deeds" of the institute or substitutes, "not only shall such debts or deeds, with the adjudications, apprisings, or other legal diligence, be void and null," but the contravener "shall ipso facto forfeit his or her right" to the estate — Held that the entail effectually excluded sales.

The lands of Rannieston and others were entailed in 1778 by a deed, of which the fettering clauses are as follows:

"It shall not be lawful to, nor in the power of the said Arthur Dingwall" (the institute), "or any of the heirs of tailzie and substitutes called to this succession, to alter, innovate or change this present tailzie, or the order of succession before prescribed, or to do or grant any fact or deed that may import or infer any alteration, innovation or change of the same, directly or indirectly: And with this further limitation and restriction, that it shall not be in the power of the said Arthur Dingwall, nor of any of the heirs of tailzie or substitutes, to sell, alienate, impignorate or dispose the said lands and estate, or any part thereof, either irredeemably or under reversion, nor to burden the same, in whole or in part, with debts or sums of money, infestments of annualrent, or any other servitudes or burdens whatsoever (except as hereinafter excepted), nor to do any other act or deed, civil or criminal, directly or indirectly, in any sort, whereby the said lands and estate, or any part thereof, may be affected, apprised or adjudged, forfeited or become escheated or confiscated, or any otherwise evicted from the heirs of tailzie, or this present entail, or the order of succession herein contained prejudged, hurt or changed: And with and under this condition and provision, that it shall not be in the power of the said Arthur Dingwall, or the heirs of tailzie and substitutes before mentioned, or any of them, to set tacks of all or any part or portion of the said lands for a longer space than nineteen years, and the lifetime of the grantor, or for the space of thirty years certain, from the commencement," &c.: "And further, with and under the conditions, and under these irritancies, that in case the said Arthur Dingwall, or any of the substitutes or heirs of entail, shall contravene the before-written provisions, conditions, restrictions, limitations and others herein contained; that is, shall fail and neglect to obey, fulfil or perform the said conditions and provisions, or any one of them, or shall act contrary thereto; then and in any of these cases the person or persons so contravening, failing to perform, or acting contrary as said is, shall, for him or herself only, ipso facto amit, lose and forfeit all right, title and interest he, she, or they have to the said lands and estate," &c.: "And with and under this irritancy, as it is hereby provided and declared, that in case any adjudication, apprising or other legal diligence, shall happen to be obtained or used for or against the fee or property of the said lands and estate, or any part thereof, upon any debts or deeds of the said Arthur Dingwall, or for any debts or deeds of any of the other substitutes or heirs of entail, done or contracted before or after their succession to the said lands and estate, not only shall such debts and deeds, with the adjudications, apprisings or other legal diligence, be void and null in so far as they may affect the said lands and estate, or any part thereof: But also the said Arthur Dingwall, and the whole substitutes and heirs of entail respectively, upon whose debts or deeds done or contracted as aforesaid such diligence has proceeded, shall ipso facto forfeit his or her right to the said lands and estate, and the same shall devolve, fall and accrete to the next heir of tailzie, in the same manner as if the contractor of such debts, or the grantor of such deeds, were naturally dead, and that free and disburdened of such debts and deeds, adjudications, apprisings or other diligence led or deduced thereupon: And with and under this farther irritancy" (that any of the heirs of entail committing treason should forfeit): "But with and under this exception from the whole of the said irritant and resolute clauses, that the said Arthur Dingwall," &c. (should have power to grant liferent infestments by way of provisions for wives and husbands to the extent fixed by the deed, the entail barring all provisions in favour of younger children): "And also with and under this provision and condition, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that upon every contravention that may happen by and through the said Arthur Dingwall, or any of the substitutes and heirs of entail their failing to perform all and each of the conditions, or acting contrary to all or any of the restrictions, it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that not only shall the said lands and estate not be burdened and liable to any of the debts and deeds, acts and crimes of the said heirs of tailzie, but also all such debts, deeds and acts contracted, granted, done, or committed contrary to these conditions and restrictions, or to the true intent and meaning of these presents, shall be of no force, strength or effect, and shall be unavailable against the other substitutes and heirs of tailzie, and who, as well as the said estate, shall be nowise burdened therewith, but free therefrom, in the same manner as if such debts and deeds had not been contracted, made, granted or committed."

Alexander Dingwall, the heir in possession, having been advised that the entail did not effectually exclude sales, sold the lands to James Dingwall, merchant in Hamburg, and brought the present action of declarator, of which the leading conclusion is, that the said entail "is not a valid and effectual entail according to the law of Scotland, or according to the Act of Parliament 1685, c. 22, or at least that the prohibitions, limitations, or restrictions of the said disposition and tailzie are not duly fenced by valid and effectual irritant and resolute clauses; and in particular, that there are no clauses in said deed valid and sufficient to restrain the pursuer from selling, alienating, or disposing of the said lands and estate, or any part thereof, for onerous causes."

Defences having been lodged by Alexander Dingwall, junior (one of the substitute heirs) and his curators, the Lord Ordinary reported the cause on cases with the following note:

"The inclination of the Lord Ordinary's opinion is for the defender. But he has thought it right to report the case without a judgment, both that the parties may have the benefit of a final decision with as little delay as possible, and because it appears to him that some of the points that are raised in it are attended with considerable difficulty, and bring the question, as to the just and sound limitations of the doctrine of strict and of reasonable construction, to a more critical issue than on any former occasion.

"He is quite aware that it would be difficult entirely to reconcile all the decisions of the Court upon this most important question, or even all the recent decisions; and that the distinctions which may be attempted to be drawn between the cases, for example, of Barclay, and Lang, and Sharpe, which were decided in one way, and those of Elibank, Farquharson, Lumsden, and others, which were decided in another way, are very shadowy and unsubstantial. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that, if there be any conflict of principle in these cases, the sounder view was taken in those last mentioned; and it is very much under this impression that he would now be disposed to repel the objections to the validity of this entail, and especially that to the sufficiency of the irritant clause libelled.

"The point is no doubt a narrow one. But the Lord Ordinary thinks it was substantially fixed by the decision in the case of Farquharson; and although the words in the present case are not merely, as in that former one, 'all debts, deeds and acts contrary to the above conditions and restrictions, or to the true meaning of these presents,' but 'all such debts, deeds and acts contrary to those conditions and restrictions, or to the true intent and meaning of these presents,' he cannot persuade himself that the mere insertion or addition of the word 'such,' in such a context, should at all affect the construction; being satisfied that the true meaning of that word in the present entail, is merely all such debts, deeds or acts as shall be contrary to any of the prohibitions, or to the object and intent of the deed. In the cases of Barclay and of Lang, the words 'such debts, deeds or contractions,' stood in immediate contact and sequence with prohibitions, in which those very words were indisputably used in the limited sense of acts or deeds by which the estate might merely be burdened or exposed to diligence. But here (even more strikingly than in the case of Farquharson) the irritant clause in question is separated and disjoined by a great interval, and the interposition of many independent provisions from any clause in which these words (or any of them) occur in such a limited sense, while the irritant clause itself, which is entirely insulated and complete per se, sets out and begins with an express declaration, that it was meant to apply to every contravention which might happen 'by any of the heirs either failing to perform all and each of the said conditions, or acting contrary to all or any of the said restrictions.' When this is considered, and taken along with the words which immediately follow the mention of the debts, deeds and acts which are to be annulled, and again describe them as 'contrary to the conditions or restrictions of the entail, or to its true meaning and intent,'—to which, either in the antecedent or the subsequent part, there is nothing at all parallel in the cases of Barclay or of Lang,—it is thought that there can be no reasonable doubt that the word such in the present case has reference only to those antecedent and subsequent words in the body and substance of the irritant clause itself, and not to any mention of debts, deeds or burdens in a more limited sense, in some distant and irrelative parts of the deed.

"With regard to the only other substantial objection of the pursuer, or that which relates to the sufficiency of the resolutive clause, as virtually restrained in its operation to cases of mere omission to comply actively with the conditions or injunctions of the entail, and not extending to violations of its prohibitions, the Lord Ordinary must say, that though it is very learnedly and ably argued by the pursuer, he has not been able, for the reasons stated by the defenders, and the near analogy of the case of Farquharson, to think that it ought to be sustained. The introductory words of the clause, which expressly set forth the intention to forfeit the right of any heir who should 'contravene any of the forewritten provisions, conditions, restrictions and limitations,' and others herein contained,' sufficiently settle in what sense the shorter resumption of these things, by the name of 'conditions and provisions' only, must be understood; and the expression being that he shall forfeit, not merely if he fail or neglect to perform those conditions, but also 'if he acts contrary thereto,' it would seem impossible to give any intelligible meaning to the whole clause if the limited construction of the pursuer were to be adopted. The argument by which he attempts to show that it was very probably the actual intention of the entailer to confine the forfeiture to cases of mere non-implementation of active injunctions, though very ingeniously put, is yet more remarkable, the Lord Ordinary thinks, for extravagance than ingenuity."

The Court ordered the cause to be laid before the other Judges for consultation.

The following opinions were returned:

Lord Justice-Clerk (Hope), concurred in by Lords Meadowbank, Medwyn and Cuninghame:

"This is an action of declarator raised by the late Alexander Dingwall of Rannieston, to have it found and declared that a certain deed of entail, executed in the year 1798, and under which the pursuer's titles were made up, 'is not a valid and effectual entail according to the law of Scotland, or according to the Act of Parliament 1685, c. 22, or at least that the prohibitions, limitations or restrictions of the said disposition and tailzie are not duly fenced by valid and effectual irritant and resolute clauses; and in particular, that there are no clauses in the said deed valid and sufficient to restrain the pursuer from selling, alienating, or disposing of the said lands and estate, or any part thereof, for onerous causes.'

"The summons recites that the pursuer has accordingly entered into a minute of sale of the entailed estate, and of another estate which must be disposed to him by trustees in terms of the entail, and concludes to have it found that he has full right and power so to sell the lands; that the sale is valid; and that he is under no obligation to lay out or invest the price.

"The pursuer having died, his trustees were allowed to sist themselves, without objection, as pursuers of the declarator; and it is presumed that the minute of sale was so absolute and complete, that no objection could be taken in this case to the title of trustees to follow out this action after the death of the heir in possession.

"The objections taken to the entail are:—

"1. 'That the irritant clause cannot, by sound legal construction, be held as directed against sales.'

"2. 'That the general irritant clause is defective as regards sales, in respect of its not containing a proper declaration of nullity; and,

"3. 'That the resolute clause of the deed cannot, by sound legal construction, be held as directed against sales.'

"There are thus two objections to the irritant clause;—one to the resolute.

"As the resolute clause occurs in the deed before the irritant, it will be convenient to consider that objection in the first instance (although not the order in which the pursuer argues his case), especially as the objection to the resolute is founded upon a general view of the structure of the deed, and of the particular acceptation, in which it is contended that certain expressions, in themselves of the most comprehensive signification and import, are alleged to be used in this particular deed of entail, so as to fix upon them a special and limited meaning.

"In reference to both objections, there appears to be forced upon the Court, by the argument of the pursuer, the necessity of some explicit and general exposition of the principle of the strict construction of tailzies, and of the true import and effect of that doctrine.

"The pursuer, in order to establish the particular objections which he takes to this entail, avails himself of a variety of detached sentences in different opinions delivered in previous cases, both in this Court and in the House of Lords, with a view of rearing up a kind of judicial necessity for denying effect to the legal and ordinary import of technical expressions in the particular context in which they occur, provided that, by any possible construction, the result can be obtained of defeating the entail,—which result the pursuer maintains has been declared to be the object and governing rule of judicial construction. There are put together, accordingly, with care, a variety of detached expressions in former opinions, which are taken as intended to be general expositions of the doctrine—'as the existing canons' (as the pursuer says) 'of our law of entail.'

"Many of these detached expressions appear to be strained to an extent not intended by the Judges by whom they were used, and in all of the opinions from which they are extracted, passages will be found which plainly show that, strong as they are, they were always used with reference to the particular case then under consideration.

"The same course of argument is adopted in some other cases before the Court in different shapes, and an attempt is plainly made, by accumulating such incidental expressions, to force the Court on to an application of the doctrine of strict construction, not warranted by any principle of judicial interpretation. It seems to be this rather startling array of dicta which led the Lord Ordinary, in reporting this case, to suppose that there was a marked discrepancy between some of the recent decisions of the Court, and to doubt the soundness of his own judgment in the case of Lang, though affirmed in the House of Lords, and of some other decisions.—(See Ordinary's note). Few, if any, of the passages quoted were intended to be an exposition of the doctrine of strict construction. Holding the doctrine of strict construction to be fixed, the opinions in question bring it to bear upon the particular case, with that variety or intensity of expression which the nature of the points or of the pleas of parties, naturally prompted.

"The exposition by Mr Erskine appears to be well considered and valuable:—'Entails of this rigorous kind, as they impose an unfavourable restraint upon property, and become frequently a snare to trading people, are strictissimi juris. An heir of entail has therefore full power as far over the entailed lands to which he succeeds in every particular where he is not fettered.' Ersk. B. III. 8, § 29.

"He then gives instances in illustration of the last remarks, viz. of acts which may be done, because not expressly prohibited. He then adds:—'Upon this principle, no restraint, though evidently intended by the maker, nor any prohibition or irritancy, is to be raised against an heir of entail from implication or inference.' And he then gives a variety of instances in illustration of that part of the doctrine.

"To this statement of the principle, there may, without impropriety, be added as authoritative, the last sentence of a note in Lord Ivory's edition:—'It is enough, however, that the act prohibited be specified in such intelligible words, as to bring it substantively within the fair and obvious construction of the clause: there is no technical language, or set form of words, in which the clause must necessarily be expressed, in order to be effectual.'

"The doctrine is well stated by Lord President Blair:—'The general principle of the law of Scotland, on which the petitioner founds, is, that restrictions on the use of property are not to be extended by implication,—a principle which never has been, and never will be altered. But although restrictions are not to be created or extended by implication, or presumed will, de casu in casum, yet, where limitations exist, these are to be construed according to the usual and legal import of the words. Upon this ground, a lease for more than the usual length was construed as coming under a prohibition to alienate.—Duke of Queensberry v. Earl of Wemyss, 17th November 1807.' Fac. Col. Gordon v. Gordon of Ellon, 24th January 1811.

"And again, there is an important passage in the opinion of the consulted Judges in the case of Hope Vere, which bears to be an exposition of the meaning and import of the principle of strict construction:—'There is no doubt that in this question the pursuer is entitled to a strict construction. For though there is a declarator inter hæredes only, the question relates to the imposition of fetters or restraints upon the right of property; and in all such questions a strict interpretation must be given. We understand the principle, as established by the authorities and decided cases, to mean, not merely that without direct words such limitations cannot be imposed from presumed or implied intention, but that, even where there are words within the deed having a certain tendency to indicate the intention of the grantor, they may, under the strict construction of the law of entail, fail of effect, either from want of technical precision, or from error in the form and manner in which they are introduced.' Hope Vere v. Hope, 6th March 1833; 11 Shaw, p. 525.

"The opinion from which the above is quoted, after stating the general doctrine, gives at the same time a variety of illustrations of the necessity of attention to that particular construction which the context requires.

"The expressions, which are quoted from other opinions, for the purpose of proving that if any particular terms are susceptible of two meanings, one supporting, the other defeating the tailzie, such terms must, by a fixed and inflexible canon, be interpreted in the way which will defeat the tailzie, do not warrant any such deduction. It is not to be presumed that there was any intention in these opinions to alter or enlarge the doctrine of strict construction of entails. On the contrary, the opinions refer to the doctrine as one established early, and firmly rooted in the law. The expressions quoted are used manifestly with reference to the manner in which the particular terms under consideration were introduced in the context in which they occurred, and to the construction reasonably open for adoption without any violence or injustice to that context. Accordingly, in one of the passages from Lord Brougham's opinion in the case of Lang, which is much founded on, in order to support that sweeping rule of interpretation, (viz.—'That whenever terms are susceptible of two meanings, the Court is bound to adopt the meaning which will defeat the tailzie')—what his Lordship says is introduced with the guarded and significant condition—'If there are two constructions open,'—thereby denoting most distinctly, that on an attentive consideration of the context in the particular deed, the Court is first to be satisfied that two constructions of the terms employed are open for their adoption;—and then Lord Brougham states the effect, in that case, of the doctrine of strict interpretation (for he is in truth stating the effect, and not professing to give a general exposition of the principle), in terms exactly in conformity with all prior authorities, when justice is thus given to his opinion.

"In every case the context, in which the expressions or the clause to be construed, occur, must be carefully attended to, and a forced and strained construction is not to be given to that context, because the particular terms or clause might, in other places or other deeds, and when detached from or interpreted without connection with the context, bear one interpretation as much as another. The sense in which terms, particularly of known legal effect, are used in the context in which they occur, is one leading and most necessary rule of interpretation. And it is in truth on that very rule that a limited meaning has been attached, in the case of Lang and others, to terms which, though capable in themselves of a larger meaning, were so fairly connected in the context with the antecedent which immediately preceded them, as to lead (on the doctrine of strict construction) to the interpretation which held them to refer only to that antecedent, and not to a variety of other antecedents, to which a general view of the party's intention might, in other deeds than a tailzie, have warranted the Court to hold that they did refer.

"The context is the leading matter attended to in those cases,—such as the Tillicoultry case,—in which general words of reference, though combined with an enumeration of particular prohibitions, have not been held to have reference to other and different prohibitions than those specially enumerated. On this point reference may be made to the opinions of Lord Moncreiff, in Lockhart, 20th May 1841—Fac. Col. pp. 652-3; and of Lord Fullerton, in Lumsdaine, 26th November 1840—Fac. Col. p. 73.

"After full consideration of all the authorities, it would appear that the true meaning of the doctrine of strict construction of entails may be thus stated:—That the Court is never to adopt a construction for the purpose of effectuating the general intention and object of the entail:—That if there is another construction of the words employed which,—placed as they are, in the context in which they occur,—may be adopted without any violence to, or perversion of, the import and effect of the terms such as they occur, that meaning is to be taken, since the deed is not in doubt to be interpreted so as to aid intention. But the Court are not to do violence to, or disregard the context, in which certain words are introduced, because those terms are flexible, and because, in other deeds and in a different context, they have received the limited meaning, of which they are in the abstract susceptible, as much as of a larger and more comprehensive signification. On the other hand, while taking the context as the guide for attaining the meaning of particular terms therein employed, the context is not to be used generally in order to suggest or support any implication necessary to enforce the prohibitions or the irritancies,—because the Court is not to arrive at restraints constructively. The Court are not to aid the entail, by supplying, by implication however plain, what is imperfect,—by solving, however easily, in favour of the fetters, what is ambiguous,—or by explaining, by reference to plain intention, however readily it may be done, what is doubtful in the language and expressions which he chooses to employ, and also to employ in a particular way and order and collocation. The Court are not so to aid him in order to carry out his purpose, because no fetters are to be imposed by any implication. Hence, if in his deed words are employed, which, in the place where they occur, and consistently with the context, may be construed in either of two senses, the Court are then to take what he has not made plain, in the sense which is limited and in favour of freedom, and not in the larger and broader sense which a general view of the maker's objects and intentions would more readily suggest; for the latter view would proceed on the notion of effectuating his intention by taking one instead of the other of the two constructions. The true meaning of the doctrine of strict construction is best brought out by this statement,—that the Court is not to construe in any case for the purpose of effectuating intention, but to construe in favour of freedom, consistently with the context, with the known import of words, and with grammatical rules.

"To the resolutive clause the pursuer objects.—'That in sound legal construction it cannot be held as directed against sales.'

"The resolutive clause is in the following terms:—"And farther, with and under the conditions, and under these irritancies, that in case the said Arthur Dingwall, or any of the substitutes or heirs of entail, shall contravene the before-written provisions, conditions, restrictions, limitations, and others herein contained,—that is, shall fail and neglect to obey, fulfil, or perform the said conditions and provisions, or any one of them, or shall act contrary thereto, then and in any of these cases, the person or persons so contravening, failing to perform, or acting contrary as said is, shall, for him or herself only, ipso facto amitt, lose, and forfeit all right, title, and interest he, she, or they have to the said lands and estate, and the same shall devolve, accresce, and belong to the next heir of tailzie appointed to succeed, albeit descended of the contravener's own body, in the same manner as if the contravener was naturally dead."

"Taking this clause by itself, it is not supposed that the reading of it could suggest the slightest doubt.

"But the pursuer says that the dispositive, prohibitory, and irritant clauses speak of the 'conditions, provisions, restrictions and limitations';—that the resolutive drops this full enumeration—is directed against 'conditions and provisions' alone,—that, 'according to the formula or technical vocabulary' of this deed, 'conditions and provisions' mean something different from 'restrictions and limitations';—that the prohibition against sale is called in this deed, in the prior place where it is introduced, a 'restriction or limitation,'—not a 'condition or provision';—and hence, that as the resolutive clause does not apply to 'restrictions and limitations, sale is not prevented.

"(1.) It is not a sound construction of the resolutive clause to hold that this full enumeration is really dropped, even assuming that the repetition of tautological and superabundant substantives in each sentence, and each clause of the same sentence, had added any thing in point of meaning. When the resolutive here says, in its second clause, 'that is, shall fail or neglect, &c., to perform any of the said conditions and provisions,' it is plain that this relates to the mode of contravention, and that the terms, 'the said conditions and provisions,' are applicable to all the declarations or fetters referred to before the words 'that is,' whatever other terms are used to denote them.

"(2.) This deed, exactly as is done in the style of an entail furnished as a model in the last edition of the Juridical Styles, varies and changes the terms descriptive of the conditions, in every instance in which reference is made to them. In the dispositive clause they are described by a string of expletives. A very few lines further on, in the obligation to infest, the expressions are varied. And so on. Sometimes 'clauses irritant and resolutive' are omitted, and 'irritancies' are introduced: Sometimes 'reservations' are introduced, and others omitted: Sometimes, and in an important passage, 'restrictions' is left out: Sometimes in the same, and that too a very short sentence, as in the obligation to insert the conditions of the tailzie in the titles, the substantives are varied. And the result plainly is, that so far from the deed having laid down an inflexible 'technical vocabulary' for itself, which gives a special fixed and peculiar meaning to the terms 'restrictions and limitations,' as essentially different from 'conditions and provisions,' the deed uses all these expressions as exactly of the same import and meaning, varying in the most unnecessary manner the terms employed, but in a way which leads to a conclusion the very opposite from that which the pursuer urges.

"(3.) But this objection proceeds on a very serious error as to the legal meaning and import of the terms 'conditions and provisions.'

"The Act 1685 declares, that it shall be lawful for the lieges to tailzie their lands in favour of substitutes, 'with such provisions and conditions as they shall think fit, and to affect the said tailzies with irritant and resolutive clauses.'

"Whatever fetters, restrictions, or limitations are introduced into an entail, are the 'provisions and conditions' of the tailzie. If there can be supposed to be a restriction or limitation which is not a condition or provision, it would not be lawful. But call them what the maker chooses, all prohibitions or restrictions are the conditions and provisions under which he makes his grant: These conditions are enforced by irritant and resolutive clauses which are to affect the tailzie.

"The redundancy of the language employed in many deeds, and the useless variation of expressions in the same deed, leads to (the selection it cannot be called, but) the accumulation of a number of terms descriptive of the conditions and provisions: But whatever declaration or prohibition or limitation is introduced, must under the Statute be, and in law is, a condition or provision of the grant. The proper legal terms in an entail to describe these restrictions and declarations, are 'conditions and provisions.' Hence, when these terms are used, they do denote and include by force of the meaning which the Statute has annexed to them, and by reason of the thing (for restrictions are conditions), all the restrictions, limitations, prohibitions, burdens, fetters, declarations, reservations, and obligations previously mentioned, however great the variety of expressions employed to describe them.

"It is possible that a deed may be so framed, that a certain fixed meaning in that deed may be given to many of these terms; and it is true that all restrictions are not reservations, and that obligations to do certain things may not be limitations, and so forth. But all these are 'conditions and provisions.' And no instance has ever occurred in which these general and statutory terms (appropriately used in the Act 1685 to denote the conditions of the grant), have, when employed in a general clause in a deed, been held from reference to other particular passages in that deed to bear not their technical, and statutory, and obvious meaning, but to be applicable only to some, and not to all of the conditions of the tailzie.

"II. To the irritant clause the pursuer objects—

"1. That it is not directed against sales.

"2. That at all events it is defective, so far as it does not, in regard to sales, contain a declaration of nullity of the acts done in contravention of the prohibition against sales.

"It is necessary to observe how the irritant clause in this entail is introduced.

"After the resolute, there occur very full special irritant and resolute clauses, each applicable to the special case of diligence done on debts, and to debts themselves—declaring and providing, that in the event of adjudication or any legal diligence being obtained or used against the fee or property of the lands and estate, or any part thereof, upon any debts or deeds of the institute or substitutes, whether contracted before or after their succession, not only such debts and deeds (the relative such having there clear grammatical reference to the antecedent of the debts and deeds in the immediately preceding clause of the sentence on which diligence might follow) shall be void and null, but also that the institute and heirs on whose debts and deeds the diligence has proceeded, shall ipso facto forfeit right to the lands which shall devolve on the next heir of tailzie, free from all such debts and deeds, &c.

"Now, here it is to be observed.—1. That this clause completely satisfies the object and purpose both of an irritant and resolute clause for the case of debts; and it is not a warrantable inference to hold, that if in an after part of the deed, an irritant clause is introduced apparently general, it is to be regarded as directed only against debts which had been specially provided for before. And, 2. That the expression such debts and deeds, when used in a limited meaning of the term deeds, has clear reference to an antecedent which fixes, upon the term deeds in that context, the meaning of 'deeds' on which diligence may follow.

"Then there is introduced a special resolute clause applicable to the case of treason.

"Then there are introduced certain provisions declared to be exceptions from the whole of the said irritant and resolute clauses, allowing liferent infeftments of specified amount in favour of wives and husbands, with a variety of declarations as to the same. Then further on, there is a long explanation of the grantor's peculiar views as to the expediency and moral effect of provisions for younger sons, and of the reasons why he wishes his heirs of tailzie to make their younger sons imitate his own example, and earn their fortunes, as he did, out of nothing. Then there is a declaration as to arrears of non-entry, &c.

"And then, after two pages of these special provisions, at a great distance, and quite disjoined from the general irritant clause, and also at a distance and disjoined equally from the special irritant and resolute clause as to debts, occurs as a substantive distinct independent clause, not connected with, or having reference to, any particular antecedent, and in no connection whatever, either in expression, meaning, substance, or grammatical reference, with the clauses which immediately precede it,—the general irritant clause commencing with the most comprehensive expressions, 'and also with and under this provision and condition, as it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that upon any contravention that may happen by and through the said Arthur Dingwall, or any of the substitutes and heirs of entail their failing to perform all and each of the conditions, or acting contrary to all or any of the restrictions, it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that not only the said lands and estate shall not be burthened and liable to any of the debts and deeds, acts and crimes of the said heirs of tailzie, but also all such debts, deeds, and acts contracted, granted, done, or committed contrary to these conditions and restrictions, or to the true intent and meaning of these presents, shall be of no force, strength, or effect, and shall be unavailable against the other substitutes and heirs of tailzie, and who as well as the said estate shall be nowise burthened therewith, but free therefrom in the same manner as if such debts or deeds had not been contracted, made, granted, or committed.' Then follows a clause which is of importance as a part of the context, and as a sequel or supplement to the above,—'And with and under this provision and declaration, that it shall be free and lawful to every heir of tailzie, though a minor or pupil at the time, who shall have a title by and through any contravention or irritancy incurred by a former heir, and whether descended of the contravener's body or not (except in the case of treason as aforesaid), to sue and obtain declarator upon the contravention, and upon the irritancy of the contravener's right, or to serve heir to the person who died last vest and seized in the said lands and estate preceding the contravener, and thereby, or by adjudication, or any other formal or legal way or method, to establish in his or her person the right and title of, and to the foresaid lands and estate, and that without being subjected to the debts or deeds of the person contravening or irritating their right, and without regard to any alterations made or intended, acts done or deeds granted by the contravener, contrary to the conditions and restrictions before written; and all the heirs and substitutes succeeding upon any contravention, and the heirs succeeding to them, shall be subject and liable to the same conditions, restrictions and irritancies throughout the whole course of succession for ever.'

"This irritant clause, then, stands out by itself as a substantive and distinct and general clause, introduced as such, and which cannot, either by reason of the place in which it occurs, or of the antecedent which goes before, or of the expressions with which it commences, be restrained and confined to any special and limited object, unless it shall be found that in the course of it the phraseology is inapplicable to a general irritant clause. With the antecedent which goes before, it has no connection whatever.

"That the expressions with which it opens are quite general—comprehending, and making apt, clear, and complete reference to all the conditions of the tailzie—and that the introduction (one of the most significant parts of such a clause) is applicable to 'any contravention,' as it expressly states, is matter too clear to admit of illustration.

"Is then the object of a general clause subsequently departed from? And is the subsequent phraseology of such special meaning as to warrant the inference, that the terms employed fall short of the entailor's declared object, so that, unless a construction, founded on the principle of effectuating intention, is resorted to, the remainder of the clause cannot extend to, and cover the consequences of 'any contravention' of all and each of the conditions' of the tailzie referred to.

"The clause goes on to provide.—1. That the lands shall not be burdened or liable to any of the debts, deeds, acts, or crimes.

"It is contended, in the first place, that the words 'burdened or liable to' are not apt, and proper, and adequate terms to reach sales; and in support of this remark, some observations are founded on, which Lord Brougham is said to have used in the Hoddam case, as to what would have been the legal construction of the clause in that entail, if it had been complete as a sentence. But it would not be fair, in any case, to hold a mere illustration in argument, not absolutely essential to the support of the judgment, as a deliberate and final expression of the opinion of any Judge. Still less ought that to be held in reference to the case founded on, as the honourable and learned Lord took occasion, in a subsequent case, to mention an inaccuracy which had per incuriam crept into the phraseology of the judgment in that very case of Hoddam.—See Monypenny v. Campbell, 16th August 1839, (M'Lean and Robinson, p. 908), while in the more important case of Warrender, his Lordship has complained of great inaccuracy in the report.

"The term burden is often used in Scotch conveyancing in a much wider sense than its ordinary vernacular meaning. There are many entails in which the prohibitions are called burdens; and when it is said that an estate shall not be burdened with any of the deeds of the contravening heir, reference is really made in the use of the word burden, to the passing of the estate from the contravener to the next heir, entire, such as it was entailed. It does not follow that, in using the term burdened, distinction is intended to be drawn between the character of some acts as incumbrances or debts remaining on the estate, and other acts carrying off parts or the whole of it. No doubt, in many contexts the term 'burdened' will be found used in reference to debts and incumbrances. But the context of each must be the rule of construction.

VOL. XIV.—No. XX.

"The term LIABLE appears clearly to include the effect or operation of any species of deed on the estate. It is quite correct to say, that the lands shall not be liable to a deed of sale,—the expression being used in reference to the power of the heir to grant such deeds, and to the liability of the estate to be so dealt with.

"Then the clause goes on (secondly).—'but also all such debts, deeds, and acts contracted, granted, done, or committed contrary to these conditions and restrictions, and to the true intent and meaning of these presents, shall be of no force, strength, or effect,' &c., as above.

"On this clause it is contended, that all such 'debts, deeds, and acts,' must mean simply debts and deeds of that character, on which diligence may follow, and does not refer to deeds generally done in contravention of all the prohibitions.

"But, 1. There is no antecedent in the preceding sentence to which this general expression can have such reference.

"2. The context declares expressly that the debts, deeds and acts spoken of, are those done 'contrary to these conditions and restrictions'—which conditions and restrictions are in the context of the same sentence shown to be all and each of the conditions and restrictions of the tailzie, and occurring on any contravention that may happen. The context then appears to demonstrate that the terms, all such debts, deeds, and acts, are used in a general sense, so as to fix down that sense necessarily on these terms. And there is no warrant for any other construction whatever.

"3. 'All such,' &c. In this context there seems to be no doubt that the relative such applies to the debts or deeds done in contravention of the provisions of the tailzie. That is the sense in which, in this case, 'such' is used. No doubt there are many cases in which the irritant and resolute clause so follows, and resumes (as it were) exactly a prohibition against debts immediately preceding it, that the expression 'debts or deeds' comes to have reference, or in ambiguity may warrantably be taken to have reference, to the prohibition against debts; and then the relative such fixes the matter. But each context must be looked to: And there is no such ground for that view of this clause.

"4. In many other deeds, nay in some clauses of this tailzie, debts is followed by deeds in such a way as to denote that the deeds then in view are only one limited class of deeds, viz., those on which diligence for debts proceed. But this is not the appropriate or natural sense of the term deeds. It receives it in such cases by force and reason of a context, which shows that it is there used in that, a perfectly correct, though limited, application of the term.

"5. Farther, all in this context refers to the antecedents, 'any contravention,' and 'all and each of the conditions and restrictions.' Again, what is referred to by all, are things done contrary to 'these conditions and restrictions.' Here 'all' is used in its widest sense. The import of 'such' has been already noticed.

"6. Then of what consequence is it that in this context, so unqualified, so general, and comprehensive, after 'all such,' the word debts comes first before deeds and acts? Suppose it had run, all such deeds, debts, and acts, the pursuer does not seem to say that he had a case. But surely it would be most unjudicial, in construing this context in such a clause, to allow the mind to be biased by the fact, that in other passages or in other tailzies, 'debts' are introduced before deeds, when the object in these cases is to refer only to those deeds which are obligations for debts. In itself, and apart from the context in which it may happen, the mere mention of 'debts' before 'deeds' and acts cannot be of any importance.

"The clause which follows, as to making up titles on contravention, may be referred to, not to solve doubts on terms warranting two interpretations, but (being a sequel of the irritant) to show the deliberation with which the terms in the irritant were used for general objects, e. g. the expressions—'subjected to the debts or deeds,' 'without regard to the alterations made or intended, or acts done or deeds granted contrary to the conditions and restrictions.'

"The other objection to the irritant clause,—viz., that it does not contain a declaration of nullity against acts or deeds of sales,—proceeds in truth on the assumption that the former objection is good, and that the declaration of nullity which actually occurs, must be read on the view that deeds does not include sales. It seems unnecessary therefore to add more on this point.

"On the whole, I am of opinion that judgment must be given for the defender, sustaining the plea in law stated in the defences."

Lords Moncreiff and Murray :

"We concur in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk, that in this case both the irritant and the resolute clauses of the entail are ample, substantive, and sufficient; and that they cannot, by any application of the principle of strict interpretation, be so construed as to prevent their direct and specific force to secure the estate and the heirs of entail against all or any of the things, including sales, to the prevention of which the prohibitory clause is directed."

Lord Cockburn :

"I am of opinion with Lord Moncreiff, that the objections both to the irritant and resolute clauses are bad. In arriving at this conclusion, I acknowledge, and employ, the principle of strict construction, as it has hitherto been understood in our law; but in applying this construction to the words of this entail, I think that these words effectually prevent that from being done which the pursuers wish to do."

Lord Ivory :

"I concur generally with the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Moncreiff in holding that there is no solidity in the objections either to the irritant or resolute clause of this entail, and therefore that judgment should be given for the defender.

"I have however to observe, in regard to the irritant clause, that if the words 'the said lands and estate shall not be burthened and liable to any of the debts and deeds, acts and crimes, of the said heirs of tailzie,' were to be construed as applicable only to debts and deeds of insumbrance—(See Marquis of Breadalbane, as decided in the House of Lords, 2 Robinson, 109)—it might indeed seem difficult at first sight, consistently with the judgments pronounced in Blairadam, Overtown, &c., to withhold the same limited construction from the words which immediately follow, viz., 'all such debts, deeds, and acts,' &c. At least it would have been so, supposing these latter words to have stood by themselves.

"But 1st, They do not stand by themselves. For the sentence runs on—'all such debts, deeds, and acts contracted, granted, done, or committed CONTRARY TO THESE CONDITIONS AND RESTRICTIONS, OR TO THE TRUE INTENT AND MEANING OF THESE PRESENTS.' And, therefore, the second branch of the sentence, as thus conceived in its entire tenor, being wholly incompatible with the use of the words 'debts, deeds,' &c., as restricted merely to deeds of incumbrance, it must be received as in truth explanatory of the real sense of the first branch;—so that, the two standing together in the immediate connection of relative and antecedent, it is no more possible to interpret, in the restricted sense, the words as they occur in the first, than the same words as they are repeated in the second;—and hence, in both alike, the words must have extended to them the larger and more natural sense—of deeds of general contravention,—which of course would include sales, &c., no less than debts.

"2d, Looking to the whole context of the clause, I am of opinion that, even had the case stood upon the words employed in the first branch of the sentence alone, without the co-relative explanation which they derive from the mode of their repetition in the second branch, it would be impossible, according to any rational principle of interpretation—(not meaning by this that the rules of strict construction are at all to be departed from, or that mere inference or implication is to be received as a guide in such questions)—to construe, consistently with what has been decided in other cases, the words 'burthened and liable,' as confining 'the debts, deeds,' &c., referred to, to deeds of incumbrance exclusively."

(Lord Jeffrey absent from indisposition.)

On advising the cause the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Find the objections stated to the validity and effect of the entail in question unfounded and groundless; therefore, dismiss the action of declarator, assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions thereof, and decern: Find the pursuer liable in expenses to the defender, and remit the account," &c.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 145.—GEORGE MARQUIS OF TWEEDDALE, Pursuer, v. ALEXANDER BEATSON and OTHERS, Defenders.

Superior and Vassal.—Feu-Duties.—Interest.—Interest on feu-duties is not exigible previous to a judicial demand.

Sequel of case (ante, p. 83). The pursuer claimed interest on the arrears of feu-duties from 1801, on the ground that they had then been rendered litigious by an action which had been then raised in the lifetime of his predecessor, or at least from 1834 and 1836, the dates of the present and supplementary actions.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"3d February 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties on the interest of the arrears, and considered the process, finds the defenders liable in legal interest on their arrears respectively, from and after the 18th of March 1841.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary proceeds on the principle (in which all parties concurred at the debate) that interest is not due on arrears of feu-duties unless it be contracted for, or judicially demanded. Now, there was no contract here, and the judicial demand was only made against Mrs Wemyss in 1836, and against the other defenders in 1834. For the Lord Ordinary cannot act on the alleged process said to have been raised against Mrs Wemyss of Cuttlehill in 1802, and wakened in 1804 and 1812, partly because there is no evidence of the applicability of that action to the particular lands and arrears now in dispute, and partly because there was no judicial demand against those who purchased from that person. And the institution of the existing action in 1834 and 1836 cannot be taken as the period for the commencement of the interest; because even these summonses make no specific demand, and did not put the defenders in mora, by enabling them to know what they ought to pay. They only conclude for unascertained proportions of cumulo duties, the proportions of which had not been fixed. Each vassal's debt only became clear by the accountant's report, from the date of which (1st March 1841) the true mora began."

The pursuer reclaimed, in so far as the interlocutor found the defenders liable in interest only from March 1841,—and prayed to have them found liable "on their respective arrears of feu-duties simpliciter."

At advising,

Lord President.—The impression which I had when the case was formerly before us is now confirmed. I cannot see how the parties to the present action can be connected with the action of 1801, so as to warrant a decision against them for the interest of these feu-duties, on the ground that it was then judicially demanded. Had the action of 1801 been generally for the right of the Marquis of Tweeddale as heritable baillie of Dunfermline, and directed as such against all his vassals, there might have been some ground for regarding it as a judicial demand inferring general liability. That, however, was not the case. Neither, I am afraid, can the wakening of the action afterwards in 1804 and 1812 be made available. I do not see, however, why the interest on the arrears should be restricted to the date of the accountant's report. The demand was judicially made against Mrs Aytoun in 1834, and against Mrs Wemyss in 1836; and though a long litigation ensued, that cannot prevent the demand from taking effect from its date. On this point I have no difficulty. My only doubt is, whether Mrs Aytoun should not be held to have been a party to the process of 1812. There is certainly great reason to presume that she was; but the evidence is not complete, and I am therefore not prepared to alter the interlocutor farther than to the extent now indicated.

Lord Gillies concurred.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. Whatever may be thought of the equity of the claim, the rule of law unquestionably is, that in the case of feu-duties, where interest is not stipulated, it is not due till a judicial demand be made, and that not for the feu-duties alone, but for the interest in express terms. That was not done here; and I am not satisfied, therefore, that more is due than has arisen since the dates of the present action. On the other hand, I cannot see that the liability of the vassals did not commence as soon as the demand was made, though only in cumulo. The superior was not bound to clear the proportion due by the vassals. Their duty was to pay and clear it among themselves.

Lord Fullerton.—I concur. I have no doubt that interest is due from the date of the action for the cumulo sums. However difficult the arrangement of the proportions may be, the liability for interest was fixed by the judicial demand. Were it otherwise, a superior might be kept out of his just claims for twenty years by litigation, carried on for the purpose of fixing the respective liability of the vassals. As to the claim prior to the date of the present action, I agree with your Lordship, that the evidence adduced to connect the present parties with this claim, is defective.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor;

"Alter the interlocutor reclaimed against, in so far as it finds interest not due till the date of Mr Menzies's report, and recal said interlocutor to that extent: Find the defender, Mr Wemyss, liable in interest on the feu-duties due by him, and that from and after the 25th April 1836, being the date of the supplementary action in this process; but find him liable in no prior interest: Find the whole other defenders liable in interest on the feu-duties found due by them respectively, and that from and after 10th November 1834, being the date of the original action in this process: Find Mrs Aytoun of Inchdairnie, and the trustees of Mr Greenhill, liable in no prior interest; but reserve all questions as to prior interest as regards the other defenders who have not yet appeared in this process: Quoad ultra, remit the case back to the Lord Ordinary to proceed further with the cause as to his Lordship may seem just, and reserve all questions of expenses."

3d March 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 146.—THE EDINBURGH, LEITH, and NEWHAVEN RAILWAY COMPANY, Pursuers, v. DAVID MANSON, Defender.

Partnership.—Statute 6 Will. IV.—Railway Company.—Proprietorship.—Circumstances held sufficient to establish that a party had been properly registered as proprietor, and was bound to pay the calls on his shares in a railway company.

By the Act 6th Will. IV., incorporating the Edinburgh, Leith, and Newhaven Railway Company, it is enacted, section 50, "that in any actions or suits brought by the said company, in the manner hereafter directed, against any proprietor or proprietors of any share or shares in the said company, to recover any sum or sums of money due and payable to the said company, for or by reason of any call or calls made by virtue of this Act, it shall be sufficient for the said company to declare and allege, that the defender or defenders, defendant or defendants, being a proprietor or proprietors of such or so many share or shares in the said company, is or are indebted to the said company in such sum or sums of money as the call or calls in arrear shall amount to, for such or so many sum or sums of money upon such or so many share or shares belonging to the said defender or defenders, defendant or defendants, as the case may happen to be, whereby a right of action or suit hath accrued to the said company by virtue of this Act, without setting forth the special matter; and in such action or suit it shall only be necessary to prove that the defender or defenders, defendant or defendants, at the time of making such call or calls, was or were a proprietor or proprietors of some share or shares in the said company, and that such call or calls was or were in fact made, and that such notice thereof was given as is directed by this Act."

Sect. 53, "That the said company shall, and they are hereby required to cause the names, designations and places of abode, of the several persons who shall be entitled to shares in the said company, with the number of shares, and also the proper number by which every share shall be distinguished, to be fairly and distinctly entered in a book or books, to be named the register-book or list of proprietors, to be kept by the secretary or other officer, person or persons, appointed by the directors, and after such entry to cause the same to be signed by the chairman or deputy-chairman; and they shall also cause a certificate, so signed by the chairman or deputy-chairman and secretary, or other officer, person or persons appointed by the directors, and with the common seal of the company affixed, to be delivered to every proprietor on demand, specifying the share or shares to which he, she, or they, is or are entitled in the said company; and such certificate shall be admitted in all courts of law and equity whatsoever, as evidence of the title of such proprietor."

Sect. 54, "That it shall be lawful for the several proprietors, and his, her or their respective heirs, successors, executors, administrators and assignees, to sell and dispose of, or gratuitously to transfer any share or shares to which he, she or they may be entitled therein, subject to the rules and conditions herein mentioned: But it shall, for the purpose of regularity, and the more perfect security of the said company, belong exclusively to the secretary or such other officer, person or persons, as the directors may appoint, to prepare and make out all voluntary transferences and conveyances inter vivos to such share or shares." "And in any such sale, the said transference and conveyance (being executed by the seller or sellers, and purchaser or purchasers of such share or shares) shall be indorsed by two of the said directors, and shall be kept by the said purchaser or purchasers, for his, her, or their security, after the secretary, or other officer, or person or persons appointed by the directors of the company, shall have entered into a proper book or books, to be kept for that purpose, a copy of such transference and conveyance, for the use of the said company, and have testified or indorsed a certificate of the entry of such copy on the said transference and conveyance; for which entry no more than five shillings shall be paid; and the said secretary, or other officer, or person or persons appointed as aforesaid, is, and are hereby required to make such entry immediately without any undue delay, and until such transference and conveyance, indorsement and certificate, shall have been made and entered as above directed, such purchaser or purchasers shall have no right to draw any share or shares of the profits of the said company, nor to have any vote as a proprietor or proprietors of the said company."

Sect. 55, "That all and every person or persons, body or bodies politic, corporate or collegiate, or company, whose name or names shall at any time hereafter stand in the said register-book, or list of proprietors, either as a proprietor or proprietors of one or more share or shares in the said company, or as heirs, successors, executors or administrators, or assignees of such proprietor or proprietors, shall be deemed and taken to be the proprietor or proprietors of the several share or shares standing in the said book in their respective names, or in the names of those whom they may represent, and shall be subject and liable to the payment of every call or calls, made and to be made thereon, and to all actions, suits, forfeitures and penalties, to which original proprietors of shares in the said company are made subject and liable by this Act; and all notices thereof required to be given previous to the forfeiture of shares to the proprietors thereof, shall, if given to the person or persons appearing by the register-book or list of proprietors to be such proprietor or proprietors, or to their heirs, successors, executors, administrators or assignees, or left at, or sent through the post-office to his, her, or their place or places of abode last mentioned in the said register-book or list of proprietors, be in all respects good, sufficient and conclusive; and all payments of dividends due and to become due on such share or shares, shall be made to such person or persons, as by the said register-book or list of proprietors, shall so appear to be proprietor or proprietors thereof; and no transference and conveyance, bargain or sale, of any share or shares, or other instrument proving a title to any share or shares, which shall not have been enrolled or registered, as directed by this Act, shall be admitted as evidence, either to defeat any action or suit, brought or to be brought by the said company, to recover the said calls, or to enable any person or persons to recover any share or shares forfeited to the said company, or to make the said company liable to the payment of the dividends to any other person or persons than such as appear in the said register-book or list of proprietors to be the proprietor or proprietors of the said share or shares; but that in all cases the said register-book or list of proprietors shall be considered as evidence of proprietorship of the said share or shares."

Founding on the powers conferred by the Act, the company sued David Manson, S.S.C., for the sum of £300, as the amount due by him upon calls on twenty-five shares of stock.

The defender was not an original subscriber to the company, but when examined as a haver, deposed, that he "has trafficked in what is called scrip-shares of the said company, and has bought from stock-brokers and sold to them scrip-shares of the said company; and he got from stock-brokers several notes of sales of scrip-shares, and he now produces three of these documents, which are marked by the deponent, commissioner and clerk, as relative hereto; and when the deponent sold shares, he gave the scrip certificates to the brokers; and with regard to the other scrip-shares, the subject of the present action, so far as he recollects, he gave them to Mr Stodart, then the secretary of the company, before the general meeting held on the 31st October 1836, at which the deponent was present, but he does not know what became of the said scrip shares afterwards."

The pursuers pleaded—1. That holders of scrip, after the Act of incorporation was passed, were entitled to be registered as original proprietors in making up the book of registry, whether they were original subscribers to the parliamentary contract or not. And every scrip-holder who produced his scrip to the secretary for registration, being so registered according to the form and practice in all such cases, was entitled to the privileges, and incurred the liabilities of a partner in the undertaking. 2. The book of registry, made up in terms of the Act, is the only authentic evidence of proprietorship. And no regular deed of transference is required until after registry was so completed under the Act. 3. The defender having been registered as a scrip-holder, and having attended a general meeting of the proprietors, and taken a part at such public meeting, is bound to make payment of the calls made by the directors, in terms of the powers given them by the Statute of incorporation.

The defender pleaded—1. The defender neither being an original subscriber to the said company, nor having obtained any legal transference, is not liable to the conclusions of this action. 2. The pursuers have produced no legal evidence that the defender is a partner of the said company. 3. The register-book referred to by the pursuers, not being prepared and kept in terms of the Act of Parliament, and being inaccurate, cannot be founded on by the pursuers in support of this action. 4. The proceedings of the pursuers not being in conformity with the Statute, the calls pursued for not having been made, and the present action not having been raised in terms of the Statute, the defender ought to be assolvied, with expenses.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"9th November 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators, repels the defences, and decerns in terms of the conclusions of the libel; finds expenses due, allows an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits to the auditor to tax the same, and to report.

"Note.—The register in which Mr Manson's name is inserted is prima facie evidence that he is a partner, and liable in terms of the Statute, §§ 50, 53, 54, 55.

"The defender has assumed that there was no regular transference of the scrip to him from the person who held the scrip, and that without such regular transference he could not be regularly registered, and liable to take calls. The Lord Ordinary does not find any authority for that in the Statute incorporating the company. The register is made the rule. If the defender showed that another person was registered for these shares, and continued the proprietor of these shares, his defence would stand on very different grounds. The defender has argued that he is not bound by the registration of his shares, and that it was not authorised by him; but the prima facie evidence of the register is confirmed by the minutes, and his own evidence as a baver, and that of Mr Stodart; and there has been no offer made to prove that the register is false, or ground shown for rejecting it."

The defender reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Gillies.—I did not see any difficulty in the case till it was somewhat perplexed by the ingenuity of the defender's counsel. The rule as to transfers applies only after the register was made up. The Act of Parliament declares that the names of the proprietors shall be entered distinctly in a book, and that those so entered "shall be" held to be the proprietors. Now, who are those to whom this "shall be" applies? Why, just those who produce papers like those which were given in by the defender, viz., "the holder of this voucher." After the names were thus inserted in the register, the case was entirely changed. Then—but not till then—it became necessary to have a regular transference. For greater regularity, a particular mode of transference is pointed out; but it is clear that this cannot apply to the case of scrip before the Act was obtained. Till then there was no register, and of course the regulations as to the register could not apply. This is a complete answer to the defender's argument as to the necessity of a regular transference; and that argument being thus untenable, there is no more difficulty in the case. The defender has chosen to invest his property in this form. He has been registered as a proprietor, and, as a proprietor, is bound to pay the calls. He also acted as proprietor by attending a meeting, and taking part in the business. Suppose he had acted in the same manner for half-a-dozen of years, and pocketed ten per cent. profit, and when the concern became unprofitable, had endeavoured to back out by such pretexts as he now uses—could he have done so? He was just as much a proprietor by attending one meeting, as by continuing to attend for a longer period. I do not, however, go on this, but on the Act. I am clear for adhering to the interlocutor.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. There are here two totally distinct questions; but the defender's counsel has blended them together, and so made complex what is otherwise plain. The first question is, whether it was possible, by any form of conveyance, to make an effectual transfer of scrip? The other question is, whether, supposing scrip to be transferable, the particular shares here in dispute were properly transferred? As to the first of these questions, the plea is perfectly intelligible, that when scrip has been acquired by subscription, it is absolutely impossible to transfer it. According to this plea, if the transference, instead of being made loosely, had been made in the most exact and formal manner known either in Scotch or English law, it would not have been worth one farthing. This is the length to which the plea must go; and though, as I have said, it is perfectly intelligible, I cannot say that I think it tenable. Were it tenable, it would make scrip differ from all other kinds of property which are transmissible. This at first sight is not likely to be true; and on looking at the Statute, I see no traces of any thing of the kind. On the contrary, I see provisions which evidently imply, that transferences of scrip had taken place, and were perfectly lawful. It was not necessary, indeed, for the Statute to make any distinct provision to this effect, unless proprietors of scrip had been expressly barred from transferring it by other rules of law; but it seems to me impossible to interpret the Statute fairly, without perceiving that transferences of scrip, instead of being excluded, are clearly recognised. This being the case, the only question here is, were these shares effectually transferred? I think enough has been established to make the denial of this impossible. The defender being thus a proprietor of shares, is answerable as partner, in terms of the libel.

Lord Fullerton.—I concur in the opinions which have been expressed. It is clear that the direction as to transfers could only apply after the Act was passed. Till then, none of its machinery was in force. One of the provisions is, that the transfers were to be indorsed by the directors or secretary. But neither directors nor secretary had any existence before the passing of the Act. Therefore, unless it can be shown that there is an intrinsic illegality in the transfer of shares before the Act was passed, or that the Act itself contains an express prohibition against such transfer, the defender's plea is altogether untenable. I know of no such intrinsic illegality; and I see nothing like a prohibition in the Statute. On the contrary, as Lord Mackenzie has observed, the Act obviously implies, that between the applying for it and the passing of it, transferences of scrip might have taken place. No doubt the defender has founded on a declaration made by the directors, that they would not recognise any transfers of shares till the Act was passed. I do not think this declaration conclusive against them. In the first place, it was merely a declaration made by the company for their own convenience, and which, if they saw fit, they might pass from; and in the second place, it does not bear the construction which the defender has put upon it. The directors say they won't recognise transfers before the passing of the Act, but they don't say that after the passing of it, they won't give effect to transfers made before; and this, accordingly, is the way in which these transfers were dealt with. After the Statute was passed, notice was given to parties to come forward to have their names registered. It is impossible to deny that the defender took steps for this purpose. He says, indeed, he does not know from whom he got his shares. It should be easy for him to ascertain the fact, but it has nothing to do with the case. He held the shares. He put them into the hands of the secretary; and this he could have done for no other purpose but to get his name inserted in the register. In these circumstances, how can we listen to the argument that it was the duty of the directors to insert any other name than his? They were to insert the names of the "holders of vouchers," who could only mean the holders of scrip. There is a clear distinction between the present case and that of Sprot. Sprot had signed the parliamentary engagement. He admitted he had been proprietor, but said he ought not to have had his name inserted in the register, as he had intimated his having parted with them, though without telling to whom. Here the holder of the shares was known, for he came forward himself and asked to be put on the register. In these circumstances, it was unnecessary to make any inquiry after the original subscriber; for though he had been known, the directors must still have inserted the name of the holder who was actually claiming. I am clear, therefore, that the defender is liable, and that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be sustained. I not only think that there is nothing in the Statute which the directors have not fully complied with, but I am inclined to go a step farther. I have the greatest doubt if all the detailed provisions in the Act can be strictly pleaded against the company. It is evident, from the nature of them, that they were inserted in the Act for the convenience and security of the company, who are consequently entitled to plead them against others, but might, as it appears to me, dispense with them if so disposed. Take the case that a party, without observing all the details of the Act, goes to the company, and the company consent to receive him as a proprietor without indorsing his shares, and enter his name in the registry,—would not that entry subject him to the provisions of the 55th section? I apprehend it would. He would be a proprietor to all intents and purposes; and I think that neither party could afterwards void the transaction by pleading that the provisions of the Act had not been complied with. In the present case, the only thing that could avail the defender would be, to plead that the company chose to put his name into the register without his consent. But how can that be pleaded here, in the face of the admission that he himself put his shares into the hands of the secretary?

Lord President.—I also have arrived at the conclusion, that the defences cannot be sustained. I think there is a great deal of force in the observations of Lord Fullerton on the 55th section; but it is not necessary to go on that narrow ground. It is quite clear that there is nothing in the Act like an indication that all transfers of scrip made previous to the passing of it were illegal, but that the contrary, if not expressed, is clearly implied. The persons to be registered were the holders of the vouchers; and it is evident from the deposition of the defender, that he came forward in that capacity and gave his scrip to the secretary, obviously for the purpose of being registered. I concur in the view taken by your Lordships, and am clear that, looking both at the steps taken by the defender, and at the spirit and meaning of the Statute, the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

The Court adhered, with additional expenses.

3d March 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J.W.)

No. 147.—ANDREW ZUILL, Suspender, v. M'MURCHY, RALSTON AND COMPANY, Chargers.

Process—Parties—Citation—Joint Obligation—Liquid and Illiquid.—A summons was raised against a company, against the individual partners thereof, and against another party, obligants upon a bill, for recovery of a small balance due upon the bill, and also for expenses of diligence which had been used thereon. The summons set forth that all the defenders were conjunctly and severally liable, and the conclusions were so directed against them, but no execution of citation was returned against J. and R. S., the company, and individual partners thereof—Held, in the circumstances, that the execution was defective, and process sisted till these defenders were called.

Process—Execution—Statute 1672, c. 6.—An execution, two lines of which only were written upon the summons, and bearing simply that the messenger had cited the therein designed A, defender, sustained; but expenses refused in relation to an objection to it.

Process—Suspension—Caution.—A remit, in a suspension, to the Sheriff to sist process until all the defenders set forth in the summons are called, exhausts the suspension.

On 7th January 1836, the suspender, along with Robert and James Stewart, by promissory-note of that date, promised jointly and severally to pay to the chargers, by two equal instalments of four and eight months after date, the sum of £40 value received. On the 10th of May, when the first instalment fell due, no payment was made by any of the parties jointly and severally liable. The note was accordingly protested of that date, but the protest was not recorded nor diligence done; and on 6th June the suspender paid to account £10, for which he received credit.

The balance of this instalment forms part of the sum sued for in the Inferior Court, in the action now under discussion. The second instalment having fallen due on the 10th of September, the promissory-note was again protested, and on the 15th of December, horning was raised against the suspender, and the other parties to the note, for payment. A suspension was presented on the 22d December, which was refused with expenses, after a reference of the whole matters in dispute to the oath of the chargers. The principal sum in this diligence being £20, was paid to the chargers on the 18th of February 1837; but the chargers were obliged to extract the Bill-Chamber decree for the expenses of the suspension, amounting, with the dues of extract, to £24. 19. 8. Diligence was raised upon this, but a charge was given to the suspender only, and caption was raised against him, when the amount was paid on 1st February 1838. No part, however, of the expenses of diligence, either on the second instalment or on the Bill-Chamber decree, was paid. For these sums, along with the balance of £10 of the first instalment, an action was raised on the 6th of February 1838 against the suspender, before the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, in which Robert and James Stewart were also included as defenders. The summons set forth, that the whole defenders were conjunctly and severally liable for the sums sued for, and contained relative conclusions.

Besides his defences on the merits the suspender stated two preliminary pleas—1. That the execution, excepting to the extent of about a couple of lines written at the bottom of the last page of the summons, is on a paper apart stitched to the summons, and does not, in terms of the Act 1672, c. 6, contain the names and designations of the parties, pursuers and defenders; and, 2. (which is the third reason of suspension), that although upon the face of the summons the said Robert and James Stewart are set forth as defenders, and as jointly liable for the alleged debt, and the conclusions of the action are directed against them, they are not called as parties to this action, and no execution of citation is returned against them.

On advising the case upon the chargers' replies, the Sheriff-substitute pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Glasgow, 28th March 1838.—Having considered this process, in respect the execution is partly written upon the summons, and in respect the defender is liable, both jointly and severally, with the other parties in the sums sued for, repels the dilatory defences."

Against this interlocutor the complainer appealed to the Sheriff-depute, who, on the 23d of May, pronounced as follows:

"Having considered the interlocutor appealed from, and reviewed the process,—in respect the last page, on which the execution is written, is obviously part of the summons, with the indorsement of the title of the summons written thereon in the same hand as the summons itself, repels the first objection; and in respect the parties are liable under the obligation libelled on singuli in solidum, and thus no one can plead as a preliminary defence, that all having an interest have not been called; and in respect the other parties, Robert and James Stewart, cannot be affected by any thing contained in this process, which is res inter alios as to them, dismisses the appeal, and adheres to the interlocutor submitted to review."

Condescendence and answers having followed, and been revised, and the record having been thereupon closed, the Sheriff-substitute, on the 25th of July 1838, pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Having considered the revised condescendence, revised answers, productions, and whole process, finds that the sole question at issue in this process is, whether or not the pursuers are onerous and bona fide holders of the promissory-note libelled on: Finds that this question has been discussed in the suspension process narrated in the revised condescendence, in which suspension a reference to the chargers' oath was made and sustained, and the bill of suspension refused by the Lord Ordinary on advising the deposition; Therefore, repels the defences; decerns against the defender for £22. 6s., with interest from 7th February 1838, being the date of citation to this action, till paid; and finds the defender liable in expenses; remits to the auditor to tax the account thereof, and also of the expenses of diligence sued for, and to report."

This interlocutor became final. The decree was extracted, and against the charge which followed on it the present suspension was brought.

Pleaded for the suspender—1. The Sheriff ought to have sustained the objection of no process, in respect that all proper parties were not cited. 2. It is not relevant, in order to elide this objection, to urge that one party to a liquid obligation, imposing joint and several liability, may be separately sued, seeing that the action sought to constitute two several debts for which decree had not been obtained, or a liquid obligation granted; and the reply is otherwise irrelevant. 3. The execution of the summons was defective, and expressly in contradiction to the terms of the Act 1672, in respect that it did not contain the names of all the defenders, in particular the names of James and Robert Stewart, who were expressly made defenders in the summons, as well as on its partibus when called in Court. 4. The execution was separatim null, in respect that, in violation of the said Act, it did not contain the designation of the parties, pursuers and defenders, and that it was written upon a sheet separate from the summons.

Pleaded for the chargers—1. The parties to the promissory-note libelled, being liable jointly and severally, both for the sum contained in the note, and for the other sums concluded for in the Sheriff-court process, no objection lies on the ground that they were not all cited;—more particularly when, owing to the circumstances of the case, it was out of the chargers' power to do so. 2. The other parties to the promissory-note being included in the summons along with the suspender, did not make it incumbent on the chargers to cite them, if otherwise it was not incumbent on them to do so: Clason v. Campbell, 21st December 1838. 3. The chargers being under no necessity of citing the other parties mentioned in the summons, it is no objection to the execution of citation that these parties are not included in it. 4. No defence having been pleaded in the Inferior Court to the effect that the execution should have contained the names of Robert and James Stewart, in respect of their names appearing as defenders in the summons, although this would have been a preliminary defence to the action, it cannot now competently be pleaded in this process. 5. The execution of citation being written upon the summons itself, or in any view, at least, partly upon the summons, and partly on the sheet containing the indorsement of the summons, and other markings, it was not necessary that the designations of the parties should appear in it, nor that it should contain any other names than those of the chargers and the suspender. 6. The onerosity of the promissory-note libelled on, being already established in a competent process between the parties, was res judicata in a subsequent action between them.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"10th December 1839.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel on the reasons of suspension, and thereafter considered the record in the Inferior Court, and whole process, repels the second reason of suspension, founded on the alleged informality of the execution annexed to the summons: Sustains the third reason of suspension, and suspends the letters in hoc statu, but remits the case to the Sheriff, to sist process till the other defenders, set forth on the face of the summons, are called; with power to the Sheriff to give such judgment as to the expenses in the Inferior Court as to him shall seem just on the conclusion of the cause; and decerns: Finds the suspender entitled to his expenses in this Court, and remits the account thereof when lodged, to the auditor to tax and report.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary still entertains the opinion expressed in his former note, that when correi are cited in an action for the constitution of open and illiquid claims, the pursuer is bound to make them all parties, before the action can proceed as to any of them, and he should think it very embarrassing in practice if a different rule were now laid down, after the express decisions of both Divisions in the cases of Hopkirk and Dewar, as distinguished from that of Lady Saltoun and M'Tavish, 2d February 1821,—all referred to in the former note.

"Had the claim related solely to the balance of the bill, a suit or charge against any one of the obligants might have been sustained on the precedent in Lady Saltoun's case; but nearly one-half of the sums claimed here are illiquid, and thus the case falls within the rule applied to the cases of Hopkirk and Dewar.

"To these cases reference may be added to those of Reid and Moffat in 1828 (6 Shaw, 570), Johnstone against Arnot (8 Shaw, 383), and Hamilton (8 Shaw, 709), cited at the debate, which, as the Lord Ordinary conceives, all support the rule in the later practice of the Court, that in the constitution of an illiquid claim, all the alleged correi must be cited. The foundation of the rule is plain. When an action of constitution is pursued, the whole conjunct obligants must be called, first, because some may deny their liability, or be able to show that the claim is in whole or in part extinguished; secondly, because any socius paying the debt is entitled to have an assignation to the pursuer's debt, and a decree against the other correi, to operate his relief. But when a claim is wholly liquid, as in Lady Saltoun's case, the possession of the bond, bill, or decree, affords of itself a proof that the debt is unpaid; and the creditors can in such cases instantly assign any one obligant paying the debt into the parata executio which he holds.

"The chargers pleaded, that the cases cited all related to the debts of dissolved companies, between the partners of which there is said to be a certain vinculum not applicable to claims against ordinary conjunct and several obligants. But while sundry of the cases did not arise against mercantile copartners, the distinction suggested seems to rest on no legal or intelligible principle. When a company is dissolved, the partners are in the precise situation of ordinary correi. Though they subsist as a company to the effect of realising their funds, a constitution can no longer be taken out against the partners under the social firm, but they must be all cited, just as other parties alleged to be jointly and severally bound.

"The cases also relied upon by the chargers, instead of being opposed to the preceding doctrine, strongly confirm it. Thus, reference was made to the case of Walker in 1805, to show that when the deceased Mr William Walker sued the Scots distillers, he brought his action against a few only, and not against the whole parties liable for his account. But it is material to observe, that no dilatory plea seems to have been urged there, and it would not have been consistent or safe for the defenders so to shape their case. Their main plea was, that there was no conjunct liability, but that each distiller was only liable pro rata. Hence they had no right or interest to demand that the other employers of Walker should be called; so that the grounds on which correi are entitled to urge a dilatory defence, obviously did not apply to that case. The defenders stated the plea on which they relied as a defence on the merits. The case of Reid and Moffat, again, though founded on by the respondents, is truly a precedent for the suspender, as the report bears that all the creditors ranked, who alone authorised the flax to be purchased, were there cited by the pursuer.

"With regard to the objection to the execution, the Lord Ordinary, on hearing the case more fully explained at the bar, has come to be of opinion that the execution may be sustained. But as only two lines of the execution are written on the sheet which contains the principal summons, the case on this point is sufficiently narrow, and the mode of extending the execution being new, or at least very loose, no expenses are allowed in relation to this point."

The chargers reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Medwyn.—Strong effect is given to joint obligations. Each obligant in a bill is liable for the whole, and each may be sued: Dict. 14,725, Rutherford. The pursuer who claims from one alone must assign; but he can't be asked to do more. The partners of a company must all be called. Even when dissolved, the company subsists to the effect of winding up the affairs. But I never understood it was necessary to call all the correi debendi where they were so only in one transaction: nor in such a case do I think it necessary that the expenses following on the obligation should be liquidated. It is said that one of the correi might have a defence unknown to the others; but correi are bound to look after one another; and this exception would apply as much to liquid as to illiquid obligations. Though the summons concludes against all, I do not think the pursuers were bound to call all. The parties called will receive an assignation on making payment.

Lord Moncreiff.—On the specialties of the case, there is no avoiding the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. It is said that the parties were all conjunctly and severally liable; but the pursuer knew that he must first obtain decree before he could state that they were so. There is the bill on which the diligence was done; but the expenses of execution were never constituted against any; and no decree either fixes the amount, or whether all are conjunctly and severally liable or not. From the cases in More's Notes, it appears that it does not follow that, though parties may be liable conjunctly and severally in an obligation, they are also so liable in expenses consequent upon it. It must appear, by decree or otherwise, that they are liable for the last; and here the summons is raised against the two Stewarts—against Zuill, and against Robert and James Stewart as individual partners. Thus it appears upon the summons, that the debt is partly a company debt; and having so laid it in the summons, the pursuers execute it only against Zuill, and not against the Stewarts. In that situation, Zuill instantly objects that all parties are not called. The Stewarts are parties to the conclusion in the summons, by which the pursuers seek to find all conjunctly and severally liable, and thus to constitute the debt against all. It is said the Stewarts could not be found; but the messenger's execution ought to have shown this. Upon these specialties, I cannot but acquiesce in the interlocutor, and am not bound to go farther. When all are conjunctly and severally liable, a party may proceed against any one of them; but the debt must be liquid or constituted. In Douglas, 1814, Fac. Coll. (report not correct), it was the case of two companies—one in Glasgow and another in the West Indies; and it was said the partners were the same. A party brought an action against the partners resident in Glasgow. The defence was—constitute the debt against the company, and in the proper domicile of the company. Answered—the partners are the same. When it came into Court, the Lords said, there being no liquid debt, it is the debt of the company and of the whole partners, and when constituted, all shall be liable; but you cannot lay hold of one or more without first constituting;—get decree against all, and then charge any one. In the case also of a bill, it has been held that the holder might charge any of the partners wherever found. Where the parties are mere ordinary correi debendi, alleged to be conjunctly and severally liable, it remains to be shown that they are so by regular decree. The magistrates of a burgh are liable for loss arising from the escape of a prisoner for debt; and an action having been brought against the bailie, the Court said—call all the magistrates in order to constitute the debt against them, and then each will be liable. In the present case, it is said the pursuers were not bound, as in the case of a company, to call all the obligants; but they were. They might charge upon the bill; and it may be also for the expenses of diligence; but that must be established. It might happen that one of the parties had paid the bill; and although the presumption is against payment where the document is held by others, the expenses incurred upon it are in a very different situation. On the specialties and the form of the summons, I agree with the interlocutor.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I proceed upon the specialties, and not upon general principle; but if I were, I would rather concur with Lord Medwyn. I give no opinion whether, upon the merits, all are conjunctly and severally liable for the expenses of diligence; but it is clear they may or they may not. With this cause or ground of action, the summons subsumes that they are conjunctly and severally liable, and then concludes that they ought to be so found, and asks and obtains warrant to cite all these parties to hear and see the same, or allege reasonable cause to the contrary. This is the summons which the pursuers take out; and they are not warranted, without the execution of the messenger against all, to go on against one. With this execution they would have been entitled to ask decree in absence against the defenders, or against any one of them. But taking out such a summons, the pursuers were not entitled to go on without an execution against all. The summons is a writ of the greatest strictness, which the parties themselves cannot alter. That must be done by the Court, upon proof that the parties could not be found, and on consideration whether all are conjunctly and severally liable. The defence here is good, that all the parties interested were not called. This might have been cured; but it was not. On this special and limited ground alone, I am of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is well founded in sustaining the third reason of suspension. I would only add, that I am not prepared at present to concur with the general views expressed by the Lord Ordinary in his note.

Lord Medwyn.—I am glad that the Court proposes to decide upon the specialties of this case. I do not dissent from the greater part of the observations of Lord Moncreiff. There is a distinction as to companies; and I would not have held that a citation against one of the Stewarts would have bound the company of Robert and James Stewart.

The Court adhered.

4th March 1842.

The chargers stated, that if we go back to the Inferior Court, and call all the parties set forth in the summons, we are still in this suspension, and entitled to caution de futuro. When the Court remits under a suspension, it is merely a continuation of the proceedings.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The judgment settles and exhausts all that could be done in this suspension. It is not a remit to do any thing in the cause or on the merits; but the action is to begin de novo.

Lord Moncreiff.—If parties are called and don't appear, and if the Sheriff pronounce a judgment against Zuill, and he bring a second suspension, that would not be the same cause.

Lord Medwyn.—If parties are called, and wish to enter appearance, they would enter—not in the suspension, but in the original action.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court, in consideration that the suspension was brought on a mere matter of form, and in consideration of the whole circumstances, modified the expenses to one-half.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

No. 148.—ROBERT GLASGOW, Pursuer, v. WILLIAM SCOTT MONCRIEFF (Wishart's Trustee), Defender.

Process.—Record, Opening up.—Production of Writs.—Circumstances in which, of consent, a record was allowed to be opened up and a document produced, on payment of the expenses incurred subsequently to the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

This was an action on a bill, resisted principally on the plea of prescription. According to the statement made in the pursuer's minute of debate,—in 1827, Mr Patrick Wishart's affairs became so much embarrassed that he found it necessary to enter into some arrangement with his creditors, and on 7th April 1828 he executed a trust-deed in favour of the defender. This deed was prepared with reference to certain states of his affairs, in which the promissory-note is enumerated as a debt due by him to the pursuer; and in the trust-deed itself the pursuer is named as a creditor in the promissory-note, and for a small balance due on an open account. A relative deed of accession was at the same time prepared, and was signed by the acceding creditors, among others by Mr Alexander Robertson, the pursuer's commissioner and law-agent, in the name of the pursuer, who was at that time abroad.

In reference to this statement the defender replied,—If any thing had followed upon the trust-deed within the six years, of the nature of accession by the pursuer, and of acknowledgment of the pursuer's claim by the trustee and creditors, whereby a supersedere of action and diligence might have been held as agreed to, on the footing that the claim was sufficiently instructed, the case would have presented a totally different aspect, and would have admitted of a different line of argument. But here nothing whatever followed upon the trust-deed, either within or beyond the six years, on which the pursuer can pretend to found as acquiescence in, or acknowledgment of, his claim by the trustee and creditors, or as superseding the necessity on his part of duly and timeously constituting his debt. The pursuer did not accede to the trust-deed. He did not so much as make a claim on the estate within the six years, or for a long period thereafter.

The pursuer had not averred upon the record that he had acceded to the trust by signing the deed of accession, and he now craved a diligence against the defender to exhibit the deed, in order to meet his denial of that fact.

It was objected, that the summons and the record proceeded upon the assumption that there had been no accession, and that it was now too late to plead it, or to call upon the defender for exhibition of the deed of accession.

Replied.—If it was thought, for the satisfaction of the Court, that a document should be produced, they were entitled to order it ex proprio motu: Cuthill, 21st February 1828. In various cases the Court have allowed not only productions after the record was closed, but also the record itself to be amended: Smeaton v. Taylor, 4th February 1832. It is not in this instance averred in express words that the pursuer acceded; but it is a trust, and there is a party claiming under it. He signed the deed of accession, and that being in the keeping of the defender, it was natural enough that he should say nothing about it; but then at last the trustee denies accession, and the pursuer says it is bad faith in the defender to make such an averment, having the deed in his own possession. The production of the deed itself will only be the clearing up of what is implied and assumed in the record.

Answered.—One thing is clear, if the deed is to be produced, the record must be opened up. No accession hitherto has been pleaded, and the defender was entitled to say that there was none, and to argue on that assumption. The fact is not res noviter: Wilson, 3d March 1827. Syme v. Charles, 11th February 1829, F. C. Thomson, 18th November 1836. Wright, 10th December 1836. Officers of State v. Humphreys, 9th July 1839.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—This is a very special case, and I should not like to consider it as a precedent. The denial on the part of the defender is very strong, and more than is called for by the pursuer's observation in the way of argument. I think a minute before answer ought to be allowed to the pursuer.

Lord Medwyn.—Neither of the cases referred to by the pursuer apply. My difficulty is solely upon the want of averment of accession on the record; and the party ought to have known of his accession.

Lord Moncreiff.—I agree with the Lord Justice-Clerk, and don't wish to go into the state of the record; but can this defender be heard to plead in the face of his own title?

Deas.—I have no objection to consent to open up the record on payment of the expenses subsequent to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor; after that date the pleadings must be entirely altered.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

The Court accordingly, of consent, allowed the record to be opened up—granted diligence, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H.B.)

No. 149.—THE EARL OF HOPETOUN, Pursuer, v. THOMAS HORNER AND OTHERS, Defenders.

Process.—Mandate.—A foreigner, against whom judgment by default had been pronounced for having failed to find a mandatory, was reponed on making personal appearance. Having again failed to find a sufficient mandatory, he offered to find security to the amount of £50 for his presence at all diets of the Court.—Held that, in the circumstances, the amount was sufficient.

The defender in this action, being an Englishman, required a mandatory. At first he failed to find one, and decree having been pronounced against him by default, he presented a reclaiming note, and, by appearing personally in Court, succeeded in being reponed—(vide ante, Vol. XIII. p. 567.) He afterwards produced a mandatory, whom the Lord Ordinary, and afterwards the Court, found to be insufficient. He then offered to come under an engagement to be personally present in Court on all occasions when his presence should be required. The Court, considering the circumstances, judged it necessary that he should give security to this effect. At first, the only security he offered was an obligation by his agent that he would be present, or, in case of absence, would allow decree to go out against him. The Court regarded this as a mere evasion, and ordered him to give in a minute stating the amount for which he was willing to give security for his personal attendance. He accordingly gave in the minute, offering security, as required, to the amount of £50. The pursuer objected to the amount as altogether insufficient, as the expenses of process already amounted to above a hundred pounds.

Lord President.—We have nothing to do with the expenses of process. All we require is security for his appearance at the diets of Court; and I am inclined to think the amount offered is sufficient.

Lord Gillies.—I think it is. In strict law his presence here is sufficient; and it is only on account of the peculiar circumstances that we have thought it necessary to demand security.

Lord Fullerton.—The only question undoubtedly is the amount of caution; but as the security now offered is something like a bond of presentation, which always has reference to the amount of the debt,—ought not the security to have some reference to the amount of the expenses?

Lord Mackenzie.—Our object in demanding security is to prevent the defender from playing fast and loose. And I think the penalty of £50 will check that. The amount is not large; but he will not find it easy to be going back and forward, paying £50 at every turn.

The Court remitted to the Lord Ordinary to repon the defender, on lodging a sufficient bond for the specific amount.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 150.—DONALD LINDSAY (Marquis of Huntly's Trustee), Pursuer, v. EARL OF ABOYNE, Defender.

Entail—Fetters—Contraction of Debt.—A prohibition to "burden or affect" the estate, "in whole or in part, with debts or sums of money," &c., held sufficient to prohibit the contraction of debt.

Entail—Registration.—A supplementary deed of entail referring in general terms to the fetters of the original deed, but not mentioning them specifically, held not to be duly recorded, in terms of the Statute, in the Register of Tailries.

The estates of the Marquis of Huntly having been sequestrated under the Bankrupt Act, Donald Lindsay, the trustee, brought the present action of declarator, concluding to have it found that the estates were open to the diligence of the creditors, inasmuch as the principal and supplementary deeds of entail, under which the Marquis held them, were defective,—the former not containing a specific prohibition against the contraction of debt, and the latter, from not containing a general reference to the fetters of the original deed, not being duly recorded in terms of the Statute 1685.

The fettering clauses of the principal deed of entail are as follows:

"With and under this condition always, as it is hereby expressly provided, that the said George Lord Strathaven, my son (the institute in the deed), and the heirs-male of his body, and whole other heirs-male called to the succession of my said lands and estate, and having a right to the title of Earl of Aboyne, shall be obliged constantly to use, bear, and retain, in all time after their succession, the surname of Gordon," &c.

"As also, with and under these conditions, that the said George Lord Strathaven, my son, and the whole other heirs of tailie succeeding to the lands and estate before disposed, shall be obliged to possess and enjoy the same by virtue of these presents, nomination, or other writ to be granted by me, and the infeftments, rights, and conveyances to follow hereupon, and by no other right or title whatever: As also to cause engross, and verbatim insert, the whole foresaid course and order of succession, and any farther or other order of succession to be appointed by me, and the several conditions, provisions, limitations, restrictions, clauses irritant and resolute, declarations and exceptions contained herein, or to be contained in any other writ hereafter to be granted by me relative hereto, and that in the instruments of resignation, charters and infeftments to follow hereupon, and in all the subsequent procuratories and instruments of resignation, charters, special retoured services, instruments of seisin, and other transmissions and investitures of the said lands and estate: And also to purge and redeem, and procure renounced and discharged, in manner after mentioned, all adjudications, appraisings, and other legal diligence and execution whatever, which may happen to be obtained of, or against the said lands and estate, or any part thereof, for payment or performance of any debt or deed payable or prestable by me or my ancestors, or of any real, legal, or public burdens, or other claim or demand whatever, to which the said lands and estate, or any part thereof, are now, or may hereafter happen by law to be subjected or made liable; and with and under the restrictions and limitations after written, as it is hereby expressly conditioned and provided, that the wives and husbands of the several heirs succeeding to the said lands and estate hereby resigned, are, and shall be debarred and excluded from all right of terce or courtesy to or upon the same, or any part thereof, any law or custom to the contrary notwithstanding; and that it shall not be lawful to, nor in the power of the said George Lord Strathaven, my son, nor of any of the said heirs, to alter this present tailie, or the nomination, or other deed to be granted by me, or order of succession now prescribed or to be prescribed thereby, or do or grant any act or deed which may import or infer any innovation or change thereof, directly or indirectly; but with this exception always, that in case any apparent or presumptive heirs, who might succeed to the said lands and estate, shall be forfeited or attainted of treason, or misprison of treason, or be under any other legal incapacity, which may exclude or disable them from taking, holding, or enjoying the said lands and estate, then, and in that case, it shall be in the power of any of the heirs who has succeeded to the said lands and estate, and shall be in the fee thereof for the time, so oft as such case shall happen, in all time coming, by a deed under his or her hand, to renew this my entail in favour of him or herself, and the other heirs called after them to the succession, according to the order before written, and nomination to be granted by me, who shall be capable to succeed, leaving out, or passing by such apparent or presumptive heir, so rendered incapable of taking and holding the said lands and estate in the same manner as if such heirs were naturally dead, and to settle the said estate and succession thereupon themselves and the other substitutes who are under no legal incapacity, but with and under the whole conditions, restrictions, exceptions, and irritancies herein contained: And with and under this restriction and limitation also, as it is hereby expressly conditioned and provided, that it shall not be in the power of the said George Lord Strathaven, my son, nor of any of the other heirs succeeding to the said lands and estate hereby resigned, to sell, alienate, wadset, impignorate, or dispoise the same or any part thereof, either irrevocably or under reversion, or to burden or affect the same, in whole or in part, with debts or sums of money, infeftments of annualrent, or any other servitude or burden whatever; but excepting and reserving always full power and liberty to the said George Lord Strathaven," &c., to grant provisions in favour of wives, husbands, and children, of certain limited amounts, to be secured over the estate, but that only in the manner specified in the deed. "And with and under this restriction and limitation also, that the said George Lord Strathaven, my son, and all the other heirs succeeding to the said lands and estate, are and shall be hereby limited and restrained from doing any act, and granting any deed, directly or indirectly, whereby the lands and estate before disposed, or any part thereof, may be affected, appraised, adjudged, forfeited, confiscated, or be any manner of way evicted from the said George Lord Strathaven, or any other of the said heirs, or this tailie, or nomination, or other writ to be granted by me, or the order of succession there or hereby established, be prejudged, hurt, or changed, excepting as in the cases before excepted: And with and under this restriction and limitation, that it shall not be in the power of any of the heirs succeeding to the lands and estate before disposed, to set tacks or rentals of the same, or any part thereof, for any longer space than two nineteen years, or for nineteen years and the lifetime thereafter of the tenant in possession at the expiry of the said nineteen years, or to set any tack or rental with a diminution of the former rent, except the same be set without collusion, and by way of public roup to the highest bidder thereat, by reason that a tenant cannot be found at the time who will give the former rent; and providing always, that it shall not be in the power of any of the said heirs to set any tack or rental of the Manor Place or Castle of Aboyne, or office-houses, gardens, plantations, and three hundred acres of enclosed grounds contiguous to the said Castle." (And after certain provisions as to exchanging): "And with and under this restriction and limitation also, as it is hereby expressly conditioned and provided, that the lands and estate before disposed, shall not be affected or burdened with, or be subjected or liable to be adjudged, appraised, or any other way evicted, either in whole or in part, for, or by the deeds or debts, legal or voluntary, contracted or granted by the said George Lord Strathaven, or any of the heirs succeeding thereto, whether before or after their succession to, or attaining possession of, the said lands and estate, or with, for, or by the omissions, acts or deeds committed or done by them, or any of them, prior or posterior to their succession."

These prohibitory clauses are immediately followed up by the following irritant and resolute clauses:

"And with and under these irritancies following, as it is hereby expressly conditioned and provided, that in case any adjudication, apprising, or other legal diligence and execution, shall happen to be obtained of or used against the fee or property of the lands and estate before disposed, or any part thereof, for not payment or performance of any debt or deed payable or prestable by me, or my ancestors whom I represent, or of any real, legal, or public burden, or other claim or demand to which the said lands and estate, or any part thereof, are now or may hereafter happen by law to be subjected or made liable, then and in that case, the said George Lord Strathaven, or any other heir in possession of the said lands and estate for the time, shall be bound and obliged to redeem, or otherwise purge such adjudications, apprisings, or other legal diligence, within three years, if he be within Scotland, and if he shall be forth thereof, within four years at most after the same shall happen to be led and deduced, and final decret therein pronounced;—and in case of his or her failure to redeem and purge the same accordingly, then he or she, though dying or becoming legally disabled to hold and enjoy the said lands and estate within the space of three or four years, shall forfeit and lose his or her right and title to the lands and estate hereby disposed, and the same, and right of redemption thereof, shall fall and devolve to the next heir capable to take and hold the same," &c. (Here follow the various provisions as to the effect of contravention by not purging adjudications.) "And provided also, that the heirs so redeeming, and all the heirs succeeding to them, shall be liable to the same conditions, restrictions, and irritancies to which the heirs contravening or failing were liable: And with and under this irritancy, as it is hereby conditioned and provided, that in case the said George Lord Strathaven, my son, or any of the other heirs succeeding to the lands and estate before disposed, shall contravene the before-written conditions, provisions, restrictions, and limitations herein contained, or any of them; that is, shall fail or neglect to obey or perform the said other conditions and provisions, and each of them, or shall act contrary to the said other restrictions and limitations, or any of them, or shall contravene any other conditions and restrictions to be hereafter added and appointed by me, excepting as is before excepted, that then and in any of these cases, the person or persons so contravening shall, for him or herself only, ipso facto amitt, lose, and forfeit all right, title, and interest which he or she hath to the lands and estate before disposed; and as such right shall become void and extinct, so the said lands and estate shall devolve and accresce and belong to the next heir appointed to succeed, albeit descended of the contraveener's own body, in the same manner as if the contraveener were naturally dead, and had died before the contravention: And upon every contravention which may happen by and through the said George Lord Strathaven, my son, or any of the other heirs succeeding to the said lands and estate their failing to perform all and each of the conditions, or acting contrary to all or any of the restrictions before written, it is hereby expressly provided and declared, not only that the lands and estate before disposed shall not be burdened with or liable to the debts, deeds, or acts of the said George Lord Strathaven, or any other of the heirs contravening, as is already herein provided; but also all debts contracted, deeds granted, and facts done contrary to the conditions and restrictions appointed by me, or to the true intent and meaning hereof, shall be of no force, strength, nor effect, and be ineffectual and unavailable against the other heirs called to succeed, and who, as well as the said lands and estate, shall nowise be burdened therewith, but free therefrom, in the same manner as if such debts or deeds had never been contracted or granted, or such acts or omissions had never been done or happened."

The Lord Ordinary reported the cause on cases, with the following note:

"The Lord Ordinary reports this case without a judgment, that it may be decided with the least possible delay. There are points of nicety in it: But, on the whole, he is inclined to sustain the defences.

"Upon the leading question, as to the sufficiency of the prohibition against debts, he sees no reason for departing from the authority of the cases of Gala, in 1722, Sheuchan in 1820, and Newhall and Cappedrae, both in 1823; and he cannot consider these cases as at all discredited by the later judgment in the case of Carleton, in 1830; both because there is no mention whatever of debts in the leading clauses of that entail, but a prohibition merely against 'burdening with infeftments of annualrent, or any other servitude or burden,'—and because there was, in fact, no decision, or room indeed for deciding, whether even these words might not amount to an effectual prohibition of debts; inasmuch as the case was disposed of on the ground that there had in reality been no debt contracted; and that it was consequently unnecessary to determine what would have been the effect if there had. In any question upon the construction of so succinct and imperfectly expressed a Statute as that of 1685, it would be most hazardous to disturb or depart from such a series of decisions; but if the question were open, the Lord Ordinary conceives that effect would now be given to the views on which these judgments proceeded. The very basis of the pursuer's argument appears to him to be unsound. He necessarily assumes that it was really intended by the Statute to prohibit the contraction of personal debt; that in strictness of law, every heir who signs a bill or personal bond, or who owes an account to his tailor, has truly incurred an irritancy; and that there is nothing but the want of interest in the succeeding heirs that prevents it from being enforced. Now, the succeeding heirs have as little interest in one-half of the irritancies which occur in some entails, as in this of contracting personal debt. But take the most usual and common provisions of irritancy, as by not taking the name and arms, or forfeiting on succeeding to a peerage, or to another estate: What possible interest have the succeeding heirs in the enforcement of these, or of more capricious conditions, which do not in the least affect the integrity or value of the estate, or in any way shake the security of its descent through the whole course of the destination? Yet all these are enforced daily; and are indeed among the most common cases of actual forfeiture. The decisions, therefore, which have settled that no irritancy is incurred by the mere contraction of personal debt, could not have proceeded on the ground of want of interest to enforce it: there being always the solid and sufficient interest to bring the succession nearer to the substitutes who might challenge. And it is plain, indeed, both from the reason of the thing and the reports, that they did proceed upon the more fundamental ground, that it was not the true meaning of the Statute to prohibit such contractions, but only their being allowed to affect or become burdens on the estate. They are truly decisions, therefore, not on the import of clauses in the deeds under consideration, but on the construction of the Act: and to the Lord Ordinary they appear most sound decisions. The Act itself does not, even in terms, prohibit the contraction of debt generally or absolutely; but only the contraction of debt 'whereby the lands may be adjudged, appraised, or evicted—may, obviously meaning shall actually be, (or rather be attempted to be) so adjudged or affected; since, on any other view, these most important words would have no meaning or effect whatever; all lawful debts being capable of being made the means of attaching the property. The very best and most accurate formula therefore, for following out this provision of the Statute, would seem to be that adopted (and found sufficient) in the case of M'Kenzie (Newhall), of a prohibition 'to contract debts on the property,' which, in the succeeding case of Cappedrae, was justly thought to be synonymous with 'burdening the property with debts.'

"It is to be observed too, that if these be substantially decisions on the true import and meaning of the Statute, the principle of strict construction (so much pressed by the pursuer), is quite as applicable to a Statute limiting the rights of property, as to any private instrument executed under its authority, and is wholly against the interpretation for which he now contends,—it being plainly a far greater infringement of common law rights, and far more penal and odious in itself, to subject a proprietor to forfeiture merely for contracting personal debts, than to reserve that penalty for making them burdens on a privileged or protected property.

"These views are probably sufficient for the decision of the present question. But the Lord Ordinary has a strong impression that the reasoning of the pursuer rests on a still more fundamental fallacy. What he chiefly relies on, is an alleged defect in the prohibitory clause; and, pretty nearly admitting that the irritant and resolute clauses are sufficient, he puts the case distinctly (bottom of page 26,) on the proposition that a prohibitory clause is essential; and that no form of expression in the other operative clauses can supply its want or imperfection. Now, the Lord Ordinary demurs to the whole of this doctrine. The Statute requires no prohibitory clause, and makes no mention of any such clause; and accordingly the Lord Ordinary cannot now bring to his recollection that he has ever seen an entail in which words of proper prohibition or interdiction occur. The most common form of the introductory enumeration of the things to be irritated is, that 'it shall not be lawful' to the institute and heirs to do so and so; or, as happens to be the case in the present instance, that 'it shall not be in the power' of the said parties (see printed deed, p. 9, C) to do so and so. But these, it is thought, are in substance not prohibitory, but general and preparatory irritant clauses. That 'it shall not be lawful' to do certain acts, means only that these acts shall not be effectual in law; and that the heirs 'shall not have power' to do them, can import nothing else (since the physical or actual power undoubtedly remains), but that they shall not do them with effect; or, in other words, that they shall be null, in respect of the declaration of irritancy, to which this statement is but introductory. The Lord Ordinary's notion, in short, is, that the clauses called prohibitory are truly in all cases but preambles to the only really operative clauses, the irritant and resolute; and preambles, too, which might be very safely omitted. For he is of opinion farther, that there is no need, either under the Statute, or in the nature of the thing, for any such introductory specification; and that a perfectly valid entail might be made by proper irritant and resolute clauses alone, without any thing in the nature of that previous enumeration, which the pursuer calls prohibitory, and maintains to be essential. If the maker of such a deed, for example, immediately after disposing the lands to a certain series of persons, under the conditions, provisions, and limitations after written, were merely to proceed in some such words as these: 'That is to say, that if any of the said persons shall sell, alienate, or dispo-ne the said lands, or shall burden, or allow them to be burdened with debt, or shall alter the order of succession, &c., then, not only shall all such acts and deeds be null and of no effect against the said lands, but every person so acting shall forfeit all right thereto,' &c.; would not this be altogether as good and effectual a deed, as if these irritant and resolute clauses had been introduced by a declaration that it should not be lawful to (or in the power of) the said persons to sell, burden with debt, or alter the order of succession? Now, even assuming that the introductory provision in the present case, that it shall not be in the power of the institute or heirs to burden the lands with debt, would not be sufficient to protect them from adjudication at the instance of creditors, the Lord Ordinary thinks there is enough in the irritant clauses which ensue to effect this purpose.

"First of all, however, there is (at p. 12, E, of the print) a distinct obligation laid on the heirs to purge, within three years of their date, any adjudications which may be deduced, not merely for debts or obligations of the entailor himself, or his ancestors (though these are first mentioned), but 'for any legal or public burden, or any claim or demand to which the said lands, or any part thereof, may hereafter happen to be subjected or made liable.' Now, if this is to be read as supplementary to, or exegetic of, the previous provision that there should be no power to burden with debt, it would seem to leave no doubt as to the fact that burdening, and allowing to be burdened, were expressly placed and brought under the same category by the entailor.

"But at all events, there is (at p. 12, D) a distinct and independent clause, providing 'that the lands above disposed shall not be affected or burdened with, or be liable to be adjudged, appraised, or evicted (in whole or in part) for or by the debts or deeds, whether legal or voluntary, of the said George (the institute), or any of the heirs succeeding, or by any omissions or acts committed or done by them, either prior or posterior to their succession.' Now, the Lord Ordinary considers this as a proper and specific, or special irritant clause, importing in direct terms, that all such debts and deeds shall be null, and of no effect in regard to the said property. And, as it bears no reference to any previous prohibition, or declaration of want of power, he does not see why it should not be admitted to its full effect, exactly as if there had been in the deed no such previous declaration; and then, the only question as to the complete validity of the provision must depend upon its being sufficiently covered by the terms of the resolutive clause. That clause, however, which immediately follows the two which have been last referred to, is of the most general and comprehensive description; and purports (p. 13, E) 'That if any of the persons so called to the succession shall contravene any of the said provisions or limitations, or shall fail or neglect to obey or perform the whole said conditions and provisions, or any of them, they shall amit, lose, and forfeit all right to the lands, &c. Now, as it cannot be disputed that both the injunction to purge all adjudications, and the provision that no debts or deeds of the heirs should be allowed to affect or burden the lands, are among 'the provisions, conditions, and limitations' of the deed, it seems necessarily to follow, that any heir who should allow the lands to be affected or adjudged for his debts or deeds, must be held to have 'failed or neglected to perform the whole of the said conditions and provisions;' and consequently to have incurred the full penalties of the resolute clause.

"The whole is wound up by an anxious and comprehensive iteration of the irritant clause; declaring, 'not only that the lands shall not be burdened or affected by the debts or deeds of the said George (the institute), or the heirs succeeding, as is already provided, but that all debts contracted, deeds granted, and facts done, contrary (not to any previous prohibitions but generally) to the conditions or provisions appointed by me, or the true meaning thereof, shall be of no force, strength, or effect, and ineffectual and unavailable against the other heirs and the estate, which shall nowise be burdened therewith, but free therefrom, as if such debts or deeds had never been contracted or granted, or any such acts or omissions had never been done or happened.' The cavil of the pursuer as to the want of the words 'null and void,' in this most elaborate irritant clause, seems entitled to no consideration; any more than that as to the introduction of the word 'other' in the preamble to the resolutive clause, which manifestly refers, and can only refer to the immediately preceding provision about purging adjudications, and cannot possibly refer merely to future contemplated provisions; inasmuch as the leading words are—'the said other provisions and restrictions, or any of them;' after which it is added, as a separate and alternative provision, 'or any other conditions and restrictions to be hereafter added and appointed by me.'

"The defender's answer to the seventh and eighth pleas of the pursuer is also satisfactory to the Lord Ordinary. He is inclined to hold, however, that the limitation of the power of leasing is not so expressed as to affect the institute; but the plea upon this point seems not to be within the libel, and indeed, to be inconsistent with the only conclusion in the summons with regard to it.

"With regard to the supplementary entail of Drumnaichie, the Lord Ordinary is satisfied, on the whole, with the authorities and explanations of the actual state of the titles furnished or referred to by the defender. He thinks it material, however, to observe, that the only decision which is reported in the case of Broomfield (or Paterson of Eccles), mainly relied on by the pursuer, as of June 1784, was not, in fact, the ultimate decision in that cause, having been recalled by the House of Lords, when the case, in consequence of an appeal against that decision, was remitted for the consideration of this Court; upon which remit appearance was, for the first time, made for the heirs who had been omitted in the second entail, and the ultimate judgment of the Court against its validity was then (March 1786,) specially rested on the ground of that omission; the ultimate finding being, 'that in respect of the alterations in the last deed, and in particular, that certain heirs called in the entail of 1743 are omitted in the disposition of 1758, the said disposition is to be held as a new settlement of the estate, and not being insert in the Register of Tailzies, is not effectual against creditors.' The present Lord Ordinary had occasion to consider the particulars of that case in deciding that of Turnbull and Hay Newton, in June 1836; and his account of it will be found in a note to p. 1033, &c. of the 14th volume of Mr Shaw's Reports. Not having again looked back to the appeal cases, he cannot say positively whether the separate finding in the first judgment of June 1784, on which the pursuer relies (as to the limitations of the one deed being only referred to in the other), was repeated in the ultimate judgment of 1786, which was affirmed simpliciter upon a second appeal. But his impression is that it was not. The parties, however, can easily satisfy themselves as to this (if thought material), before the case comes on for judgment."

The Court ordered the cause to be submitted to the other Judges for consultation.

The following opinions were returned:

Lord Moncreiff, concurred in by Lords Meadowbank, Medwyn, Cockburn, Cuninghame, Murray and Ivory:

"I. The first question raised in this case by the record and the revised cases is, whether there is a sufficient prohibition in the original entail of 1782 against the contraction of debt?

"I do not entertain the least doubt that a direct prohibition to this effect is indispensable to the validity of every entail, in so far as debts may be contracted to third parties, by which the estate may be affected. Every one understands what is meant by the prohibitory clause. It is the clause which in direct terms prohibits, or declares it not to be lawful for, the heirs to alter the order of succession, to sell or alienate the estate, or to contract debts. It is so described by Mr Erskine, B.III. t. 8, § 23; and I have always understood it to be settled law (as it has been expressed in emphatic words), that the prohibitory clause is the key-stone of the entail. All the cases of Argaty, Roxburgh, Lochbuy, Eastfield, &c., entirely depended on this assumption, and on the question, whether there was or was not a substantive prohibition against altering the order of succession in that which all the lawyers held to be the prohibitory clause; and the same has been the basis of innumerable questions on the sufficiency of the words to constitute prohibitions against sales, against leases, against contracting debts, &c. I could not, therefore, assent to some of the propositions in the Lord Ordinary's note in the present cause, if I rightly understand them. I could not hold, either that the usual clause which has been so denominated is not a prohibitory clause, or that, without such a clause applying to the three distinct classes of deeds, any entail would be effectual to its purpose. More particularly, I could not think that a deed containing merely irritant and resolutive clauses could be effectual as an entail under the Act 1685, if there was no prohibitory clause to which the forfeitures and irritancies declared could be applied. The example of such a thing suggested hypothetically would not, in my humble apprehension, constitute a valid entail.

"In expressing my opinion, therefore, in the present case, I assume the necessity of a prohibitory clause applying specifically to the case of debts contracted. But when this is granted, I am of opinion that there is a sufficient prohibition against debts in the entail now before the Court.

"If this question had occurred for the first time, I might have thought it to be attended with great doubt. But as the matter stands, I think that the point is ruled by decisions to which I see no answer; and being of opinion that there has been no change of the law since those decisions were pronounced, I cannot discover any ground on which the Court can now depart from them. The material words in this entail are, that it shall not be in the power of the heirs to sell, alienate, &c., 'or to burden or affect the same in whole or in part with debts or sums of money, infeftments of annualrent, or any other servitude or burden whatever.' Now, in the case of Haggart v. Vans Agnew, December 19, 1820, the words were, 'or to burden the same in whole or in part with debts, sums of money, infeftments of annualrent, or any other security or burden whatever.' It is evident that the words in the two cases are the very same. But in the case of Agnew, the Court were clearly and unanimously of opinion 'that the clause in question was quite effectual to free the estate from the claims of Robert Vans Agnew's creditors.' It does not appear that any appeal was taken against that judgment; and it is impossible to deny that it is directly in point to the present question.

"The case of Mackenzie, May 23, 1823, was not exactly the same,—the words being, 'or to contract debts thereon, or grant infeftments of annualrent,' &c. But it was held to stand on the same principle; and the Court adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, which found that 'the deed of entail libelled is sufficient to protect the estate against being affected, burdened or adjudged by the debts in question.' But the subsequent case of Nibbett against Sir David Moncreiff, &c., June 10, 1823, is again identical with the present case, the words of prohibition being, 'nor to burden the same, in whole or in part, with debts or sums of money,' &c., whereby the lands might be affected or adjudged,—which the Court found to be sufficient to prevent the estate from being attached for a personal debt.

"The ground of doubt in these cases was, that as there was not a direct prohibition against contracting debts simply, as the Act 1685 might be thought to point out, but only a prohibition to burden the estate with debt, it might be held that the clause was not direct or explicit against the contraction of personal debts on which adjudication might follow. But the answer was thought satisfactory, that the object being only to protect the estate and the heirs of tailzie against being burdened with the debts of any heir, the words were sufficient for that purpose. The argument of the pursuer in the present case, however ably conducted, is the very same which was employed unsuccessfully in those cases. And the point having been thus deliberately discussed and determined in two if not in three cases, I think it impossible for the Court now to depart from the law so laid down.

"The pursuer refers to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary in the case of Cathcart, February 12, 1830. This is in reality no judgment; because, although the Court adhered to the interlocutor in the material part of it, they expressly recalled the findings on which the pursuer founded, and refused to pronounce any judgment on the question whether there was a sufficient prohibition against debts or not. But, in reality, the words of the clause in that case were essentially different from these which occur in the present entail, or which occurred in those of Sheuchan, Newhall, or Moncrieff. For there was nothing there but general words added to the prohibition against alienation, 'nor yet to wadset or burden with infestment of annual-rent, nor any other servitude or burden.' These words are quite general. They occur in almost every entail, quite distinct from the prohibition to contract debt. They are in the present entail; and similar words were in the entail of Sheuchan. But the question here does not depend on any such vague words. The terms relied upon as a prohibition, as they were relied upon in Sheuchan and Moncrieff, are—'or to burden or affect the same in whole or in part with debts or sums of money.' This is a very different clause from the more general terms which occurred in the entail of Carleton. And after all, there was no judgment on the effect of it. Whatever I may have thought on that point, I hold the case now before the Court to be essentially different, and to be ruled by the positive decisions in the other cases.

"II. The second question is, Whether, assuming that there is a sufficient prohibition against debts, the resolutive clause is so expressed as to be effectual to protect the estate against creditors? I am of opinion that it is sufficient.

"The pursuer's argument against the efficacy of the resolutive clause really comes to a very narrow point. The maker of the entail has in some degree perplexed his deed by the anxious introduction of injunctions on the heir to purge the estate of all adjudications which might be led for entailor's debts, or for legal burdens affecting the lands, and a very special and minute resolutive clause directed against any failure in that point. It is after that long and particular clause that the general resolutive and irritant clauses, in plain terms directed to the fortification of the general prohibitory clause, are introduced. That this is the nature of them is manifest from the introductory words: 'And with and under this irritancy, as it is hereby conditioned and provided, that in case the said George Lord Strathaven, my son, or any of the other heirs succeeding to the lands and estate before disposed, shall contravene the before-written conditions, provisions, restrictions and limitations HEREIN CONTAINED, or any of them.' It seems to be granted by the pursuer, and is too clear for argument, that these words are sufficient to cover the whole prohibitions, and that if the clause had gone on directly to the operative part of it without further explanation, there could have been no doubt of its sufficiency. But he maintains that the words which follow are to be taken as explanatory, and that they limit the forfeiture declared in some way which cannot be defined, and really is not easily understood. If, indeed, the clause had gone on to a special enumeration of particulars, and in that enumeration had omitted any of the essential cases, such as sales or the contraction of debts, there would be very good ground for maintaining, that the general words were to be taken as qualified by the special definition, and that the clause could not apply to the omitted case. But in this entail there is no such thing. The object of the explanatory words is merely to distinguish between acts of omission or disobedience of things enjoined, and positive acts in violation of direct prohibitions; and it is only by laying hold of a single word, the meaning and effect of which are perfectly clear, that any appearance of difficulty can be raised. The words are—'That is, shall fail or neglect to obey or perform the said other conditions and provisions, and each of them, or shall act contrary to the said other restrictions and limitations, or any of them.' Some words are added which seem to me to be immaterial—'or shall contravene any other conditions or restrictions to be hereafter added and appointed by me.' Whatever may be the effect of these last words, they can have no influence to hurt the efficacy of the preceding words: And, laying them aside, the clause goes on—'That then and in any of these cases,' the person contravening shall forfeit all right to the estate in the most ample terms. Now there is really nothing to be said against this clause as importing any limitation of the general words in the beginning of the sentence, but that the word other has been introduced into it. But it is very evident to me, that that word, though unnecessary, rather tends to give precision and definite application to the clause, as relating to the various limitations expressed in the general prohibitory clause. The object and the effect of the word are, to disconnect the clause from the special matters to which the immediately preceding particular resolutive clause relates. It tends to prevent that very ambiguity which has occurred in other cases, by which a clause of this nature has been held or maintained to be restricted to the sort of acts or deeds against which the immediately preceding clauses were directed. But if any doubt could exist about this matter, it would be removed by the words immediately following, which are introductory to the irritant clause; that upon any contravention 'by and through the said George Lord Strathaven,' &c., or any of the heirs their FAILING TO PERFORM all and each of the conditions, or ACTING CONTRARY to all or any of the restrictions BEFORE WRITTEN.' These are plain words; and they define precisely what the contravention is which is expressed in the preceding resolutive or forfeiting clause.

"I cannot, therefore, see any reasonable ground for doubt that the resolutive clause is sufficient.

"III. A separate objection is taken to the irritant clause, viz., that it does not bear, in so many words, that the acts or deeds done in contravention shall be null and void.

"There is no doubt that these words constitute the most common form, and certainly the best style of an irritant clause. They are used in the Statute, perhaps descriptively. But as it is quite settled that the Statute does not prescribe any precise form of any of the clauses, the question must always be, whether the terms actually employed in any particular entail are sufficient to express clearly the thing contemplated in such a clause. Now, the provision here is, that on every contravention, as above quoted, not only the estate 'shall not be burdened with, or liable to the debts, deeds or acts of the said George,' &c., 'but also all debts contracted, deeds granted and facts done, contrary to the conditions and restrictions appointed by me, or to the true intent and meaning hereof, shall be of no force, strength nor effect,' &c. The clause goes on with other words amplifying the provision—'and be ineffectual and unavailable against the other heirs,' &c., who 'as well as the estate shall be free therefrom, in the same manner as if such debts or deeds had never been contracted or granted, or such acts or omissions had never been done or happened.'

"Thinking that there is nothing in the connection of this clause which can at all limit its operation to any thing less than the infringement of any of the general limitations of the entail, and that the words are sufficient to cover any such contravention, I am of opinion that the words 'shall be of no force, strength nor effect,' must be considered as equivalent to the declaration of nullity contemplated by the Statute and in the principle of such a clause. It is certainly true, that in very many entails the same words occur in connection with the words 'shall be null and void.' But as it is in the nature of such deeds that many terms having the same legal effect may be employed, the question still is, what is the legal import of the words actually employed? and as the meaning of such a declaration of nullity can never be to make an absolute nullity of onerous transactions, but only to render the deeds of no legal force or effect in regard to the estate entailed, I think that the terms here employed must be held sufficient.

"I do not find in any reported case, except the late case of Sharpe, that the words of the entail in this part of the irritant clause were exactly the same as they are here, though I have an impression that a similar clause had been found to be sufficient. In the case of Sharpe (3d July 1832), the same words, 'shall be of no force, strength nor effect,' &c., occurred. But there was a defect in the grammar of the clause,—the nominative, which should have applied to the words 'shall be,' having been altogether omitted. That created the only doubt in this Court; and a very serious ground of doubt it certainly was. It does not appear to have been thought at all doubtful that the words otherwise were sufficient. Another difficulty, certainly, occurred in the House of Lords, arising from the connection of the previous words in that case, and from the mixture of debts, deeds, crimes and acts. The judgment of the Court was reversed—not, as I understand the decision, upon any idea that the words 'shall be of no force, strength nor effect,' would not have been sufficient, if the clause had been otherwise perfect, but on the principle, that in a question of strict entail, it is inadmissible to supply any words, and that the most favourable construction must be given of which the words in connection with which they stand will admit. But indeed it was afterwards explained, that the judgment in that case was incorrectly drawn up, and that there was no intention to do more than to find that there was no irritant clause in that entail valent quantum: Maclean and Robinson, Vol. I. p. 308.

"On the whole, therefore, though the question is not quite so clear as the points already considered appear to me to be, I think that the irritant clause also, in the present case, is sufficient.

"IV. There is a fourth question of a different nature. That question is, Whether certain special lands, called Drumniachie, have been effectually brought under the fetters of the entail?

"This part of the case appears to me to be attended with very considerable difficulty. From the nature of the titles, and the manner in which these lands were dealt with by the entailor himself, I think it impossible to hold that they were validly entailed as part and pertinent of the other lands by the mere force of the original entail. The question, therefore, is, whether the supplementary entail, by which these lands were disposed to the heirs called by the former deed under all the provisions and restrictions of that entail in general terms, without the limiting and irritant clauses being engrossed in the deed itself, was sufficient to constitute a binding entail by reference, in a question with third parties, creditors of the heir in possession.

"It appears that that supplementary deed was recorded in the Register of Tailzies; in which the original entail had also been recorded. But, from the nature of the supplementary deed, the entailing clauses did not appear in it. It is stated, however, that a Crown-charter was obtained containing the whole lands, both those in the original entail, and the lands of Drumniachie as disposed by the supplementary deed—which charter contained ad longum the whole clauses, prohibitory, irritant and resolute,—applied, as I understand, to all the lands in the charter; and that on the precept in that charter seisin followed,—all the clauses being again repeated in the instrument.

"In this state of the titles, the question seems to me to be, whether it can be held that there is an effectual entail of the lands of Drumniachie duly recorded, in terms of the Statute, in the Register of Tailzies; and whether that other provision of the Statute has been complied with, which requires that the clauses irritant and resolute shall be inserted in the procuratories of resignation, charters, precepts and instruments of seisin? The clauses are not inserted in the procuratory of resignation in the supplementary deed, and they do not, of course, appear in that deed as registered in the Register of Tailzies. It is perfectly true, as the defender argues, that where there is, in one and the same deed, a full recitation of the entailing clauses in the dispositive clause or in the procuratory of resignation, it has been held, and may be considered as settled law, that it is sufficient if, in the precept of seisin, the clauses be referred to in general terms as so before recited. This has been held ever since the case of Murray Kinninmond, 5th July 1744, as reported by Kilkerran—and also by Monboddo, Br. Suppl. V. 739. And therefore it would be no objection to the validity of this entail, that in the charter which followed upon it, the clauses were not verbatim recited in the precept of seisin of that charter. But this rule of construction in the application of the Statute is distinctly rested on the ground, that where the whole clauses are within the deed in which the precept referring to them is contained, the whole deed ought to be considered as the precept or warrant for the seisin to follow.

"There is no doubt that it has been found in various cases, that an entail may be effectually made by reference from one deed to another. It was so found in the case of Don, 5th February 1713 (M. 15,591), and in the late case of Hope Vere, 5th March 1833. But, in both these cases, the question undoubtedly was inter heredes only; so that the proper operation of the Statute, as against creditors, was not brought into discussion. For though, in the last of them, the pursuer concluded in general terms that he was entitled to hold the lands without being subject to any conditions or limitations, there was a qualification even of that conclusion, 'at least subject to no valid prohibition against altering the order of succession;' and the case was tried simply as a question inter heredes. No sale had been attempted; and it is a mistake to say, as the pursuer does, that if there be an effectual entail inter heredes, the Court will try a question concerning the possibility of a valid sale being made, where no sale has been attempted: They have repeatedly refused to do so.

"The case of Lawrie v. Spalding, 24th July 1764, (M. 15,612), is, however, materially different. For, as I read that case, it certainly did come to be a question between an heir-substitute of entail and a purchaser; and one general plea maintained for the purchaser was distinctly, that the entail of the lands of Ervies, by mere reference from one deed to another, could not be effectual against creditors and purchasers, as not being duly recorded in terms of the Act 1685. The case was perplexed in its circumstances; and there was a specialty strongly urged, which almost certainly affected the decision, that the purchaser had dealt with the heir in possession at a time when he had only a personal right to the property; in which case the general rule is, that the purchaser is affected by all the qualities of his author's title. Accordingly, I find that that case having been appealed, this was the point mainly relied on in the respondent's appeal case. Nevertheless, if there were no authority against it, I should find it difficult to extricate that case from the peculiarities of the titles which had been constituted in the vendor before the question came to be tried.

"But any judgment pronounced in so special a case cannot, I should think, in any view, be considered as sufficient to settle so important a point of law. It appears to me, that the terms of the Statute 1685 require the clauses to be inserted in the procuratories of resignation and precepts of seisin of the entails themselves, and not merely in the conveyances and charters and seisms to follow thereon. And it clearly supposes, or rather indeed peremptorily requires, that the entail, with all the clauses expressed therein, shall be recorded in the Register of Tailzies. It is not enough that the clauses are in the Register of Seisms. A special register was provided, that creditors and purchasers might with ease and certainty know what the condition of the party with whom they dealt as a proprietor in the fee was. Such a register would have been a very useless arrangement, if the Act had not required, as an essential quality of the tailzies to be allowed, that all the clauses should be engrossed in the deed to be so recorded. The words of the Act are clear and unambiguous. The clauses must be in the tailzies; but not only so—they must be in the procuratories of resignation and precepts of seisin in that deed. I have no doubt that this is necessary; and I do not think it at all inconsistent with this opinion, to hold, according to the decisions, that if the clauses be in any part of the same deed, they will be held to be in the procuratory or precept. They will still appear in the deed registered; and the creditor or purchaser, who has no occasion to look farther, will find them there.

"But how does the matter stand on such a deed as the supplementary entail here in question? The clauses of restriction are not in it at all. Let it be recorded; but when the creditor looks at it in that register, he can discover nothing specific to qualify the title of the proprietor in the fee. To refer him to another entail, or another title as to a different estate, is contrary to the Statute. He must find the entail of this estate, in regard to which he contracts, in the register, with all the necessary clauses engrossed; and he can find no such thing. There are thus two departures from the Statute—1. The clauses prohibitory, but more especially the irritant and resolute clauses, are not 'inserted in the procuratories,' &c.; and 2. There is no recorded entail with those clauses so engrossed.

"These considerations present great difficulties in the statutory principle. But the case of Broomfield v. Paterson very greatly increases the difficulty. The Lord Ordinary is perfectly right in his observation, that the case as reported (29th June 1784), is only in the first decision of it, and that having been appealed, it was afterwards remitted, and another judgment pronounced, (11th March 1786; affirmed 19th May 1786). But his recollection is wrong as to the result of that judgment. The House of Lords had been led to know that there were parties interested, substitute heirs of entail, beyond those who had first appeared, and against whom complicated grounds of personal exception were maintained; and they remitted the case, in order that these other parties might be heard. But when they did appear, what was the issue and result? There was considerable difficulty in the question, whether the deed of entail dated in 1758 should be considered as a new entail, requiring to be complete and registered under the Act 1685, to make it effectual against creditors, or was merely a renewal of the original entail referred to. That question was what constituted the whole perplexity of the case. But as soon as that was held affirmatively, the consequences were at once and decidedly declared—1. That it could not be effectual without registration in the Register of Tailzies; but 2. That registered or not, it could not have any effect against the creditors, because the clauses prohibitive, irritant, and resolute, were not contained in it. The final judgment of the Court here was, that that deed was to be considered as a new settlement, 'and not having contained the clauses prohibitive, irritant, and resolute, and not having been recorded in the Register of Entails, is not an effectual entail: Find, that in respect the clauses irritant and resolute in the entail 1743, are not particularly inserted in the disposition 1758, the same, though held as a conveyance, is not effectual against creditors,' &c. There can be nothing more precise than this. I cannot possibly understand it otherwise than as an authoritative judgment, that a new settlement which required registration as an entail, but which did not contain in itself the clauses prohibitive, irritant, and resolute, could not be effectual as an entail against creditors.

"There is no denying that the supplementary entail in the present case is a new settlement. The plea to the contrary is very faint, and evidently not tenable. It is much more decidedly a new settlement than the deed 1758 was in the case of Paterson. For it is a conveyance of lands, which were not comprehended in the original entail, and which but for it, would have stood on the fee-simple titles in the person of the entailor. And if, then, it is within the same rule with that case in the application of the Statute, it cannot be enough to say that, such as it was, it was recorded in the Register of Tailzies: For the very first ratio of the judgment in the case of Paterson is, that the deed itself did not contain the restrictive clauses—the non-registration being put as a separate ground; and then the last finding is pointed and explicit, that in respect those clauses were not inserted in the disposition 1758, the entail was not effectual against creditors. That judgment was simpliciter affirmed on the second appeal—and this, notwithstanding that the very plea now maintained on the efficacy of an entail by reference, even against creditors, was specifically stated in the third reason of appeal, and the case of Laurie and Spalding most particularly referred to in support of it.

"I am not able to resist the weight of that authority, more especially as I cannot feel at all confident that there is any authority the other way. Certainly the result in the case of Paterson appears to be the most consistent with the terms and the spirit of the Statute.

"And I am therefore of opinion,—though not without being sensible of the difficulty of the question, that the demand of the pursuer in this part of his case ought to be sustained,—that these lands of Drumnaichie are not validly entailed against creditors, and are therefore liable to the pursuer's action."

Lord Jeffrey:

"I incline, on the whole, to retain the opinion expressed in my original interlocutor and annexed note; though with increased difficulty and hesitation as to the lands of Drumnaichie."

At advising, the Judges concurred in the opinions of the consulted Judges.

The following interlocutor was pronounced:

"Repel the objections stated to the validity and effect of the entail of the lands and estate of Aboyne, rights and others therein contained; sustain the defences, and assolvie the defenders from the conclusions of the libel of declarator and of the libel of adjudication, in so far as relates to the said lands and estate, rights and others, and decern: But in respect to the lands of Drumnaichie, find that the deeds of entail in question are not effectual to save or protect those lands from the acts, debts, and deeds of the Marquis of Huntly; therefore, find and declare that the same fall under the sequestration libelled, and were adjudged in terms of the Statute passed in the second and third year of her Majesty, cap. 41, and pertain and belong to the pursuer, Donald Lindsay, as trustee on the sequestrated estates of the said Marquis of Huntly, for payment and satisfaction of the debts due by his Lordship, and decern; and find no expenses due by either party to the other."

8th March 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(J.W.)

No. 151—MRS MARY CAMPBELL or M'GIBBON, Petitioner and Respondent, v. THOMAS BAILLIE, S.S.C., Respondent and Reclaimers.

Bankrupt Act, 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41, § 40—Annuity-Bond—Valuation—The widow of a bankrupt applied to the Sheriff to value an annuity provided to her by her husband, and contained in an annuity-bond. Objections being stated to the validity of the bond, the Sheriff found that "thereby she had acquired right to an annuity of £55 Sterling, and valued the same at £55 Sterling." The Court recalled the finding, that thereby she had acquired right to the annuity, but adhered to the valuation.

The petitioner acquired right to an annuity of £55 Sterling, under an antenuptial contract of marriage entered into between her and Mr Neil M'Gibbon, dated 1st March 1781; and by a bond of annuity, executed on the 20th of April 1779, he increased the petitioner's annuity from £55 to £75 Sterling, and obliged himself to secure her in the same by infestment over his lands of Stroneskar, in virtue of which she was duly infest. By discharge and renunciation, dated the 12th of December 1812, executed by the petitioner, she renounced her security over the lands of Stroneskar; and on the sequestration of the estates of her deceased husband, presented a petition to the Sheriff of Argyllshire to have her annuity valued in terms of the 40th section of the Bankrupt Act. Objections were stated to the validity of the bond, in consequence of an imperfection in the testing clause, and farther, that being a post-nuptial deed, it could not prevail in a competition with creditors.

The Sheriff pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Inverary, 13th January 1842.—Having resumed consideration of the foregoing petition, with the several documents therein referred to, proof adduced in regard to the age of the petitioner, and having heard parties' procurators visa voce—Finds it proved that the petitioner was seventy-eight and a-half years of age at the term of Martinmas last: Finds that, by an antenuptial contract of marriage entered into between the petitioner and her deceased husband, Neil M'Gibbon, Esq., dated the 1st day of March 1781 years, the petitioner acquired right to an annuity of £55 Sterling, payable from and after her said husband's death; and finds that, by a postnuptial heritable bond of annuity, dated the 20th day of April in the year 1779, the said annuity of £55 was increased in favour of the petitioner to the sum of £75 Sterling, and that the petitioner thereby acquired right to an annuity of £20 Sterling, payable from and after the death of her said husband, in addition to the foresaid annuity of £55 Sterling: Finds that the said annuity of £55 Sterling, from the term of Martinmas last, is of the value of £353. 18. 3. Sterling, and the said additional annuity of £20 from the same term, is of the value of £128. 13. 11. Sterling, and therefore values the said several annuities due to the petitioner from the term of Martinmas last, at the sums of £353. 18. 3. Sterling, and £128. 13s. 11d. Sterling, respectively, all in terms of the Statute mentioned in the foregoing petition, and decerns accordingly."

(Signed) "J. MACLAURIN, S. S."

"Note.—The Sheriff-substitute has heard the parties' agents at great length vide voce. A variety of points have been discussed by them which do not appear in the least degree relevant to the case, and to which he need not therefore advert. He will only notice such of them as appear to be of importance.

"It has been urgently proposed by Mr Baillie that the case should be argued by written pleadings, or in other words, that a record should be made up. The Statute is by no means explicit as to the forms of procedure; but it is quite obvious if a record were made up in cases of this kind, that their object would be rendered wholly abortive, for in that event no applicant claiming under an annuity requiring to be valued could ever claim or vote at any meeting for choosing an interim factor or trustee,—a view of the matter which the terms of the Act itself plainly repudiates.

"The most important point of the case regards an objection raised by Mr Baillie to the validity of the antenuptial contract of marriage of 1781, by which the annuity of £55 is created. The surname of the writer of that bond is wanting in the first part of the testing clause, which bears that the deed was 'wrote by Donald, servitor to the said Neil M'Gibbon, &c.; at the end of the testing clause, however, the writer is again mentioned as the last of the subscribing witnesses, and is designed the said Donald BELL. Here the Christian name is supplied, and except in the case of the person designed servitor, the name of Donald does not occur in any previous part of the deed, so that the word 'said' seems to identify very plainly Donald Bell the witness, with Donald the servitor and writer of the deed. Even had this identification not taken place, the Sheriff-substitute is not prepared to say that the omission of the surname of a writer, where the designation is distinctly given, is a violation of the injunction in the Act 1593. But at all events, where an identification occurs, as in the present instance, he inclines to think that the objection is obviated.

"Another point discussed by the parties is the validity of the postnuptial bond of annuity of 1799, in a competition with creditors. Supposing the antenuptial contract to be a valid deed, as appears to the Sheriff-substitute to be the case, then the objection to the bond that it is postnuptial, can only affect the addition of £20 thereby made to the previous annuity of £55 contained in the contract. Now, there can be no doubt that at the date of the bond the petitioner's husband was not only perfectly solvent, but that he was proprietor of the estate of Glasvar, factor on the estate of Ilay, and a law practitioner in extensive business. It is thought, therefore, that the addition of £20, made in 1799, to the previous annuity of £55, was a moderate and reasonable provision at the time it was made, and such as the petitioner is fairly entitled to rank for in competition with other creditors. See the case of Lady Campbell, 26th July 1744, Mor., p. 988; Jeffrey, 24th May 1825; S. and D. M'Lachlan, 29th June 1824. Ibid.

"While the Sheriff-substitute has stated these views, in consequence of the objections referred to having been stated by the parties, he is at the same time of opinion, that it is not within his province to enter into the defects of deeds competent in a reduction before the Supreme Court. He apprehends, if a deed appears to be prima facie complete, he is bound to give effect to it.

"The values have been made according to the valuations produced by the petitioner under the hands of Mr Thomson of the Standard Office, which the Sheriff-substitute thinks is in conformity with the rates stated in the several tables which he has examined."

Mr Baillie reclaimed, and pressed his objections on the merits.

Answered—That this was premature; the Sheriff did not decide upon the claims, but only put a valuation upon them, assuming them to be good.

Lord Medwyn.—I think the section of the Act applies only to undisputed annuities.

Russell.—If the creditor go to the Sheriff and ask him to put a value on an annuity, the Sheriff's judgment cannot be reviewed by the trustee; and if we had not brought this appeal, the Sheriff's judgment would have been final on the whole matter.

SCOTTISH JURIST.

Lord Medwyn.—He could not review the valuation, but the right to the annuity itself, or to its amount, would still be open to challenge.

Lord Moncreiff.—I cannot conceive that it was the intention of the Legislature, that on such a clause as this, the Sheriff was to decide upon the validity of the bond. The trustee would not be barred from bringing a reduction of it notwithstanding the valuation of the Sheriff. Assuming that the bond stands, it amounts to this, that the trustee would only be bound by the valuation.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I think this is an application only to enable a contingent creditor to vote; and I think the view of your Lordships is the most beneficial and sound construction of the Statute.

The Court recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff, in so far as it finds that the petitioner had acquired right to an annuity, and quoad ultra adhered. No expenses.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—(W.H.D.)

No. 152.—LIEUTENANT-COLONEL JOHN GORDON, Appellant, v. JOHN and JAMES GRAHAM, Respondents.

Landlord and Tenant—Sequestration—Reparation—Damages

—Process—Jury Trial.—A tenant under a lease, which contained an obligation on the part of the landlord to put the houses and buildings in good repair, and to make the fences on the farm fencible "betwixt and the term of Whitsunday next," fell into arrears of rent, and was sequestrated; on which the tenant's agent, on 18th May, made the following tender in a letter to the landlord's agent: "Stop the roup in Gordon v. Grahams; and since we can't do better, I will advance the arrears and expenses myself, on your client granting an assignation, or giving me an obligation to grant one at my expense. My assignation not to compete with the landlord's right for the balance of the year's rent, of which the above arrears form a part." And on the 24th May he repeated the tender in another letter. The offer was at last accepted, and the sequestration withdrawn on the 28th May. The tenant then brought an action of damages, and obtained a verdict against the landlord for not duly implementing the obligation in the lease relative to buildings and fences, and also for having failed, after the aforesaid tenders of rent, timeously to withdraw the sequestration. Exceptions were taken to the charge of the presiding Judge, inter alia, because he directed the jury, that after the tenders of 18th and 24th May, the landlord was "in law responsible to the pursuer for not withdrawing the sequestration quoad the sums contained in these tenders." The Court of Session, without deciding the question of law as to the landlord's liability involved in the direction, disallowed the bill of exceptions, holding that there were sufficient grounds to support the direction, in the whole circumstances of the case.—Held (reversing the judgment of the Court of Session), that the direction was erroneous, in respect there was nothing in these tenders to raise a liability on the part of the landlord.—Observed by the Lord Chancellor, that the direction on the legal question of liability behaved to be judged of on the grounds on which it was put by the presiding Judge, and not in relation to the other circumstances of the case.

Landlord and Tenant—Hypothec, Obligation to assign—Question, Is a landlord bound, on receiving payment of rent past due, to assign his right, or is he bound only to grant a discharge?

The farm of Egypt, in the vicinity of Edinburgh, consisting of about forty-one Scotch acres, was let by the proprietor, Colonel Gordon of Cluny, to John

VOL. XIV.—No. XXI.

Graham and his son James, for the space of nineteen years from Martinmas 1832, at the rent per acre of three quarters of grain, wheat, barley, and oats respectively, payable by equal portions at Candlemas and Lammas. The lease contained the following clause :

" In respect the whole houses and buildings on the said farm are to be put into good tenantable condition, and as the fences round the farm are to be put into good order and made fencible betwixt and the term of Whitsunday first, the said John and James Graham bind and oblige themselves to be at half the expense in keeping all the fences in constant good order and repair during the currency of the lease ; as also, to keep and leave the houses in good and tenantable condition (if at any time found otherwise), upon getting a month's warning to make the necessary repairs ; if not then done, it shall be in the power of the proprietor no have the repairs made at the tenants' expense."

At the commencement of the lease certain repairs were made, but the tenants complained that they were insufficient, and that neither the houses nor fences were put into the condition for which they had stipulated in the above clause. John Graham accordingly, on 12th April 1833, wrote the following letter to Mr Roy, the factor :

" In answer to your letter of the 6th instant, I am extremely sorry that there should be occasion for this correspondence, as I wish to give you as little trouble as possible, but it is unavoidable on my part. Your letter seems to infer that you have put the houses and fences into proper tenantable and habitable order. I am quite of a contrary opinion ; for instance, the roof of the stable is rotten, and won't stand two years, and the sun shining through various apertures, and as to the fences, not a hedge have been cut, or ditch scoured (leaving aside the fences to be built of new, which I am not particularly pushing you with). I am quite willing they should be inspected now, in reference to the lease, and I will be ready any day you may appoint, and the sooner the better, as I want them finished. An early answer will oblige."

In consequence of this remonstrance additional repairs were made, but not to an extent which satisfied the tenants, who seem therefore to have proposed to take the execution of them into their own hands. This was objected to by Mr Roy, who, on 2d November 1833, wrote as follows :

" I have received your card of yesterday's date, and since I saw you I have seen Mr Robertson from Slateford, who gave in the estimates for fitting up the stable at Egypt, &c. He is against doing any thing till the beginning of the spring, as he says a much better job can be made then than can be done at present, and he does not think there is danger to be apprehended from the roof giving way at present ; and as it is likely Colonel Gordon himself or Captain Duguid will be here soon, the tradesmen can receive Colonel Gordon's own instructions, or at any rate those of Captain Duguid, and then there can be no misunderstanding on the subject ; but if you proceed to do them yourself agreeable to your own plan, most likely the job may not please Colonel Gordon, and he will probably resist the payment unless the work be done agreeable to his own instructions."

" My opinion is, therefore, that you should still delay doing any thing yourself ; for let me remark, it will be a bad omen to have any misunderstanding or dispute with your landlord at the beginning of your lease."

In August 1835, William Hunter, a builder, was employed to inspect the stable, and reported :

" As requested, I have examined the stable belonging to you at Egypt. I find the roof fallen in, floor and trevies in a state of ruin, and quite unfit to put cattle in of any kind whatever, and as there is no time for delay, the sooner it is repaired will be the better for the wall, as the scantling will press them out."

Hunter afterwards gave in an estimate of the repairs which he considered absolutely necessary, and executed them. In April 1837, he was employed to inspect the dwelling-house, and made the following report :

" Having carefully, as requested, examined the house occupied by you at Egypt, and find it in a very dangerous and unsafe state to live in, as the greater part of the joist-ends in the walls are gone, and the front wall, part of which is broke through, and from the pressure of the roof may cause the whole to come down, and the consequences will only be known when too late to remedy."

Hunter then made the following offer :

" Having examined the farm-house occupied by Mr John Graham, Egypt, and made out a specification for what I consider making it habitable, and hereby offer to finish the same, in terms of the specification, for the sum of £18. 10s. Sterling."

This offer was accepted ; and after the work was finished, John Graham, on 20th January 1837, certified :

" I hereby give it as my opinion, that the work done by Mr William Hunter, in terms of the specification, for repairs done on the house occupied by me at Egypt, is done in a complete and tradesman-like manner."

At the Candlemas preceding the date of this certificate the tenants had retained, or been unable to pay £86 of the half-year's rent. At the Lammas following another half-year's rent became due, but no offer of payment having been made by the 12th August, an application was on that day presented to the Sheriff, and the tenants were sequestered. They complained strongly of this proceeding as unnecessarily harsh and precipitate ; and on the 16th, John Graham addressed Colonel Gordon personally in the following letter :

" 16th August 1837.

" Sir,—I request your excuse for the trouble I am reluctantly compelled to give you.

" My son and I became your tenants in the farm of Egypt, at a very high rent, for nineteen years from Martinmas 1832. At our entry the lands were in the worst order, but by unceasing industry they are now in such a state as promise to repay us the sums we have expended upon them.

" We have not received any deduction from the rent we became bound to pay, yet all the arrears we owed previously to the 2d current was £86. 16. 1., about £33 less than a-half year's rent.

" On that day half a-year's rent, or £119, became due, making the whole sum due £205. 16. 4., considerably less than a year's rent.

" Notwithstanding this small arrear, and that there is a crop on the ground much more than sufficient to pay every shilling you can claim, including the rent of the present crop, and that we have a large claim against you for damages for want of fences and for repairs on the houses, which you are bound by the tack to perform, but have not performed, a sequestration of our whole crop, stocking, and furniture has been taken out, without notice being given to us of any kind, and without payment of what we are due being asked. We cannot believe that this has been done with your knowledge, far less with your approbation. We have had the happiness of living on good terms with you, and we have never done any thing to forfeit your good opinion, nor can we conceive any possible justification of measures which are destructive of our credit, and must tend to bring on our total ruin, while they are wholly unnecessary for your security or safety.

" That we have suffered very great damage by the treatment we have received, no one can doubt ; but we are unwilling to speak of damages. We hope that yet every thing between us may be amicably arranged. As your tenants, we are entitled to expect from you reasonable protection, and, if you act towards us as we think we have a right to expect, all may yet be well. If our ruin be determined on, we must resort to all our legal claims and means of defence.

"Your answer, which we beg to have in course, will determine our conduct.—I am, with all respect, Sir, your faithful obedient servant." (Signed) "JOHN GRAHAM."

Colonel Gordon's answer was as follows:

"19th August 1837.

"SIR,—To say the least of your letter of the 16th instant, I take leave to inform you that the tone and terms of it have certainly surprised me. You will please to recollect that when I was in Edinburgh last May, you refused either to pay your rent due, or to give a bill for it at three or four months' date, which left me no alternative but to secure my hypothec rent by sequestrating your effects. And I beg leave to remind you, that complaints of being over-rented come with peculiarly bad grace from my tenants, who know, on the one hand, that if they have advantageous bargains, they are secure for the entire endurance of their leases, while, on the other, I am ready to relieve them at any time, on getting six months' previous notice, provided the conditions of lease have been fulfilled in all respects. Your threatened claim for damages gives me no uneasiness whatever. Should you be so ill advised as to carry that threat into effect, I have not the least fear for the result, since you must be perfectly aware that you have not only been upwards of £20 in my debt since 1832, but have also got considerably more extensive repairs on buildings and fences than were promised. I have no desire to be on bad terms, or to quarrel with any of my tenants; but if they are disposed unnecessarily to quarrel with me, I can part with them without regret. I am," &c.

On the 23d August, Messrs M. and J. Lothian, as agents for the Grahams, made a proposal to Mr Gray, the agent of Colonel Gordon, to employ an auctioneer, whose intromissions they undertook to guarantee, "to sell off by public roup, in a way not injurious to the credit and feelings of the tenants, as much of the crop as will pay, not only the arrears, being somewhere about £205, but also the half-year's rent payable at Candlemas next."

Mr Lothian, not anticipating any objection, advertised the sale, but on the 28th August Mr Gray wrote in answer:

"Captain Duguid, factor for Colonel Gordon, came to town from Aberdeenshire on Saturday night, and he is now with me. Captain Duguid does not approve of your proposal on the part of Messrs Grahams, and he cannot consent to the sale going on as advertised. But he is quite willing to accept of your guarantee to pay the arrears of rent, on caution being also found to pay the current year's rent when due, and Colonel Gordon is quite willing to grant an assignation to the act of sequestration, either to you or to any other person who pays the rent and finds caution, and then the roup may proceed. I shall expect your answer in the course of to-day, as Captain Duguid proposes to leave town this evening."

The original proposal, with a slight modification and the express reservation of the sequestration quoad ultra, was ultimately adopted, and the auctioneer proceeded with the sale. On the 18th December 1837, Mr Gray asked the Messrs Lothian to send him the roup-roll, but did not receive it till the 26th April 1838, when it appeared that the amount of the sale was not sufficient to discharge Colonel Gordon's claims, and that a balance of £64 odds, which had become due at the Candlemas previous, remained unpaid. To obtain payment of this balance, Mr Gray, on the 11th May, lodged a minute in the sequestration, and on the 14th, the Sheriff-substitute, in respect no answers had been lodged, granted warrant to roup. The sale was advertised on the 16th to take place on the 23d, but on the 18th, Mr Lothian addressed the following letter to Mr Gray:

"Stop the roup in Gordon v. Grahams; and since we can't do better, I will advance the arrears and expenses myself, on your client granting an assignation, or giving me an obligation to grant one at my expense. My assignation not to compete with the landlord's right for the balance of the year's rent, of which the above arrears form a part."

On the 23d, Mr Gray answered:

"I mentioned to you that I had sent a copy of the state and expenses which I handed you, to Colonel Gordon; and on calling upon him, he stated that there was a larger balance of rent due than was contained in the state; for that by the lease, the tenants had become bound to pay £6 per acre, for each acre they cropped on the farm different from the stipulations in the lease, and that the tenants had miscropped several acres in the year 1837, as could be shown by a measurement of Mr Knox; and the tenants were bound by the lease to pay £6 per acre of additional rent for each of these acres; and that he also looked to the tenants for payment of all the extrajudicial expense incurred by them, and of which I handed you a copy.

"I wrote Colonel Gordon that I would make a demand upon you for the additional rent, and for payment of the extrajudicial expenses; and if refused, that it appeared to me necessary to present a supplementary petition of sequestration to the Sheriff for the foresaid additional rent, in terms of the lease, and also to claim the extrajudicial expenses from your clients. They have a double of the lease, which you can get from them. In the meanwhile, I annex a copy of the clause in the lease regarding the additional rent. I shall be glad to hear from you in answer.—Yours," &c.

"Excerpt.

"And if at any time after the fourth year of the lease any part of the farm is cropped differently, without written authority from the proprietor or his factor, then the tenants bind and oblige themselves and their forebears to pay £6 Sterling of additional rent for each acre differently cropped."

On the 24th, Mr Lothian replied:

"I have received your extraordinary letter of yesterday, and sent it to Messrs Graham for information to answer it. In the meantime I have tendered you the whole money for which you have taken warrant to roup, and you declined it, only taking my obligation to pay it. I have now to repeat that I am ready to pay that money to you, or your client Lieutenant-Colonel Gordon, on a receipt acknowledging that the money is paid by me, and binding your client to grant to me at my expense an assignation in the terms mentioned in my said obligation, of which (as I wrote it in your chambers) I have no copy. I will thank you to send me a copy of it. I have only to add, that if the money above referred to be not accepted by you, I will lodge a minute in my own name in the existing process of sequestration, and consign the money with the clerk of Court at your client's expense."

On the 28th, Colonel Gordon granted the following receipt:

"Received from Maurice Lothian, Esquire, solicitor, £64. 10s. 3d., with £1. 0. 3. of interest thereon, being the balance of rent of the farm of Egypt payable at Candlemas last, and interest thereon, for which a warrant to roup was taken against Messrs Graham, the tenants, in a process of sequestration at my instance, reserving any further claims competent to me for additional rent on account of part of the lands being, as I am informed, cropped differently from the stipulations of the lease, and for all expenses incurred by me in regard to the recovery of the rents for which said sequestration was used, and reserving to the tenants their defences against such claims; and I engage to grant to Mr Lothian, at his expense, an assignation of said sums now paid to me, and of the proceedings at my instance under the said sequestration, to the end he may operate his payment from Messrs Graham, but so as not to compete with any claims competent to me as landlord."

On referring to the measurement taken by Mr Knox, it appeared that the allegation of miscropping was incorrect.

The tenants now brought an action of damages, in which, after narrating the failure of Colonel Gordon to fulfil his obligations under the lease, and the various proceedings which had taken place in the sequestration, they concluded for a decerniture ordaining him, besides implement, to make payment to them of the sum of £500, less or more, in name of damages for the loss and injury which they had suffered in consequence both of his refusal or delay to perform the obligations incumbent upon him, and of the oppressive and unjustifiable measures which he had adopted against them.

The cause was sent to a jury on the following issues:

"It being admitted that under the lease, of which No. 3 of process is a copy, the pursuers became tenants of the farm of Egypt, the property of the defender, for the period of nineteen years from the 22d day of November 1832:

"Whether the defender wrongfully failed to put the houses and fences on said farm in tenantable and fencible condition, in terms of the said lease, to the loss, injury and damage of the pursuers?"

"Whether, on or about the 12th day of August 1837, the defender obtained from the Sheriff of Edinburgh a sequestration of all or any part of the crop and stock of the pursuers on the said farm? and Whether, on or about the 23d day of May 1838, the defender wrongfully failed to relieve the pursuers' said crop and stock from the said sequestration, to the loss, injury and damage of the pursuers?"

"Damages laid at £500."

The jury found for the pursuers, and assessed the damages at £475. The following exceptions were taken by the defender:

"First Exception, That thereafter the said Lord President, in addressing the jury, declined and omitted to direct the jury, in point of law, that the obligation on the landlord, in the clause of the lease referred to in the said issue, to put the houses and buildings in tenantable condition, did not require to be implemented within the same time as the obligation as to the fences.

"Second Exception, And that the said Lord President did direct the said jury, in point of law, as to the second issue, that tenders of the arrears of rent having been made by Mr Maurice Lothian, in terms of his letters of the 18th and 24th of May 1838, and the sequestration not having been withdrawn until the 28th of that month, the said sequestration ought to have been withdrawn after these offers, and more especially after that of the 24th of May, and that the defender was in law responsible to the pursuer for not withdrawing the sequestration quoad the sums contained in these tenders."

On advising, the Court refused the bill, with expenses. See ante, Vol. XIII. p. 213.

Colonel Gordon appealed.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, this case is comprised within a very small compass. The respondents were tenants of the appellant under a lease, which is printed in the appendix to the appellant's case. The rent having fallen into arrear, the appellant applied to the Sheriff, and obtained a sequestration of the crop and stocking of the farm. On the 18th of May 1838, Mr Lothian, the agent for the respondents, wrote this letter to Mr Gray, the agent for the appellant:—"DEAR SIR—Stop the roup in Gordon v. Grahams; and since we can't do better, I will advance the arrears and expenses myself, on your client granting me an assignation, or giving me an obligation to grant one at my expense,—my assignation not to compete with the landlord's right for the balance of the year's rent, of which the above arrears form a part." The meaning of this proposal is—not that the tenants should pay the rent, but that Lothian, the agent, should pay the amount of the rent due, and take an assignation of the sequestration for his own security. This offer was not accepted; for, on the 23d of May, the landlord's agent wrote a letter declining to accept it. Whether he was right or not in this refusal is immaterial to the disposal of the question before their Lordships, as presented by the bill of exceptions. Then comes this letter of the 24th May from Mr Lothian to Mr Gray,—"I have received your extraordinary letter of yesterday, and sent it to Messrs Graham for information to answer it. In the meantime I have tendered you the whole money for which you have taken warrant to roup, and you declined it, only taking my obligation to pay it. I have now to repeat that I am ready to pay that money to you or your client, Lieutenant-Colonel Gordon, on a receipt acknowledging that the money is paid by me, and binding your client to grant to me, at my expense, an assignation in the terms mentioned in my said obligation, of which, as I wrote it in your chambers, I have no copy. I will thank you to send me a copy of it. I have only to add, that if the money above referred to be not accepted by you, I will lodge a minute in my own name in the existing process of sequestration, and consign the money with the clerk of Court at your client's expense." It does not appear that any answer was written to this letter, but an arrangement seems to have been made by the 25th of May, on which day the money is paid, and a receipt granted by Colonel Gordon, containing an obligation to assign the sequestration to a certain effect. This having become the subject of a suit in the Court of Session by the tenants against the landlord, complaining that they ought to be relieved from the effect of the sequestration, and raising another question, which it is not necessary now to discuss, as to the repairs, the Court of Session directed two issues,—First, "Whether, on or about the 12th day of August 1837, the defender obtained from the Sheriff of Edinburgh a sequestration of all or any part of the crop and stock of the pursuers on the said farm?" And, secondly, "Whether, on or about the 23d day of May 1838, the defender wrongfully failed to relieve the pursuers' said crop and stock from the said sequestration, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?" Every one would suppose, from reading this issue, that the case set up was, that on the 23d of May the defender was under an obligation to relieve the pursuers from the effect of the sequestration. On the trial of these issues, the Lord President, who presided, as it appears from the second exception, directed the jury in these terms:—"The Lord President did direct the said jury in point of law, as to the second issue, that tenders of the arrears of rent having been made by Mr Maurice Lothian, in terms of his letters of the 18th and 24th of May 1838, and the sequestration not having been withdrawn until the 28th of that month, the said sequestration ought to have been withdrawn after these offers, and more especially after that of the 24th of May, and that the defender was in law responsible to the pursuers for not withdrawing the sequestration quoad the sums contained in these tenders." No one can mistake the effect of this language. It contains a distinct exposition of that which is intended to be laid down by the Lord President in point of law, that the tender contained in the two letters of the 18th and the 24th of May, imposed an obligation in law on the landlord to withdraw the sequestration; that the landlord having a sequestration against the tenants, on any one saying I will pay you the arrears of rent provided you will grant to me an assignation of the sequestration, the landlord was bound, by the law of Scotland, to accept that offer. If that be so, the opinion expressed by the learned Judge who presided would be correct, but if otherwise, it would not. It does not appear to me that the language of the letter is open to any ambiguity or doubt; but it proceeds to express the only terms on which the agent of the parties, Mr Lothian, required the sequestration to be withdrawn. There was no payment of rent qua rent, but an offer to pay the same sum on the sequestration being assigned. Whether the word "withdraw" had a different meaning from the word "relieve," is immaterial. With reference to the opinion delivered to the jury by the learned Judge,—for the bill of exceptions must stand or fall by the legal effect of that which was laid down at the trial,—it will not do to support the direction of the learned Judge on other grounds, or other facts; for the learned Judge tells the jury, that the effect of those two letters amounts in law to an obligation on the landlord to comply with this requirement of the letter; but when it comes to the Court of Session, that Court does not profess to support the law as propounded in that opinion. They do not say that it is right, or that it is wrong; but they find, on other parts of the case, and the evidence before the jury, grounds for supporting that opinion delivered by the learned Judge, on a consideration of the whole of the merits of the case on which the jury have come to a decision. Lord Mackenzie, followed by Lord Gillies and Lord Fullerton, founded their opinions not on those two letters which were the foundation of the Lord President's opinion delivered to the jury, but they began with the letter of the 28th of August 1837, which the learned Judge who presided at the trial had not in the slightest degree adverted to. It is unnecessary, therefore, to look at that letter to see what it contained, or whether it could amount to a contract to be carried into effect in 1838, with reference to the then state of the case. That letter is not alluded to in the summing up. The learned Judge does not put it upon that; and the question is, whether the law he lays down to the jury is correct?—not whether the conclusion might be ultimately the same or not? but whether that which he lays down in stating the grounds of his opinion is correct in point of law? I do not find that the learned Judges express any opinion in favour of that which was so laid down, which induces me to look further to see whether it can be so supported. The matter appears to have been withdrawn entirely from the consideration of the jury; they having been told by the learned Judge that, in point of law, after receiving those two letters, the landlord was bound to withdraw the sequestration, or to relieve the tenants from the effect of it; and if that was correct, the jury had nothing to do but to assess the damages. They were told that these letters had raised that responsibility, when, in my opinion, there was nothing in these letters to raise that liability. There appears evidently to have been a mistake. The matter is not disposed of by the Court upon the grounds on which it is put by the learned Judge, that those two letters so promulgated to the jury amounted to an obligation resting on those two letters alone, binding the landlord to withdraw the sequestration, or to relieve the tenants from the effect of it. The consequence of that appears to me, that the interlocutors must be reversed, and the bill of exceptions allowed, and the case must be sent back to the Court of Session to do that which is just.

The following judgment was pronounced:

"It is ordered and adjudged by the Lords spiritual and temporal in Parliament assembled, that the said interlocutors complained of in the said appeal be, and the same are hereby reversed; and it is declared that the bill of exceptions ought to be allowed in respect of the second exception stated therein: And it is further ordered, that, with this declaration, the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, to proceed further therein as shall be just and consistent with this declaration, direction, and judgment."

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 153.—JOHN GRAHAM and JAMES GRAHAM, Pursuers, v. LIEUTENANT-COLONEL JOHN GORDON, Defender.

Process.—Proof.—The copy of a lease confessedly genuine, is admissible in evidence, in the absence of the principal.

Landlord and Tenant.—Sequestration.—Assignment.—Process.—A landlord is not bound to assign his right under a sequestration to a third party, on offer of payment of the rent due by the tenant. A bill of exceptions sustained, on the ground that the presiding Judge had declined so to direct the jury.

The present was an action of damages at the instance of tenants against their landlord, and was tried by a jury (vide ante, Vol. XIII. p. 213, and immediately preceding case) on the following issues:

"It being admitted that under the lease, of which No 3 of process is a copy, the pursuers became tenants of the farm of Egypt, the property of the defender, for the period of nineteen years from the 22d day of November 1832:

"Whether the defender wrongfully failed to put the houses and fences on said farm in tenantable and fencible condition, in terms of the said lease, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?"

"Whether, on or about the 12th day of August 1837, the defender obtained from the Sheriff of Edinburgh a sequestration of all or any part of the crop and stock of the pursuers on the said farm? and Whether, on or about the 23d day of May 1838, the defender wrongfully failed to relieve the pursuers' said crop and stock from the said sequestration, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?"

"Damages laid at £500."

A verdict having been returned for the pursuers, the defender presented a bill of exceptions, which the Court refused; but on appeal to the House of Lords, this judgment was reversed. Ante, p. 321.

A new trial was accordingly granted, and the jury again returned a verdict for the pursuers—damages £493. 16s., being just the amount awarded at the former trial, with interest from its date.

The defender presented the following bill of exceptions:

First Exception.—"On the document, No. 3 of process, being tendered by the counsel for the pursuers, the counsel learned in the law for the said defender, did object that the said document, which was only a copy of the lease, was not admissible in the circumstances, in maintenance of the issues on the part of the pursuers. But the said Lord President did then and there allow the same to be produced and read to the jury on the part of the pursuers; and the same was read accordingly."

Second Exception.—"Thereafter the said Lord President, in addressing the jury in reference to the first issue, declined and omitted to direct the jury in point of law, that the obligation on the landlord, in the clause of the lease referred to in the first issue, to put the houses and buildings in tenantable condition, did not require to be implemented within the same time as the obligation as to the fences. To which the counsel for the defenders excepted, insisting that the jury should have been directed, in point of law, to the effect foresaid."

Third Exception.—"And the said Lord President, in charging the jury, in reference to the second issue, declined to direct the jury, that the defender, as landlord, was not bound in law to assign the sequestration on the tender of payment by Mr Lothian. To which the counsel for the defenders excepted."

When the bill of exceptions was advised, the defender insisted particularly on the first and third exceptions,—the second having been fully discussed on the former bill, and unanimously refused.

The following opinions were delivered:

(First exception).

Lord President.—I have great difficulty as to this proceeding under the bill of exceptions. It does appear to me that if we look—to what we certainly are entitled to look—to certain documents laid before us,—to the defender's deposition as a haver, in which he depones "that there was such a tack;" and "if the tack be still in existence," it will be either in his strong box, or in the custody of his factor, and that as "soon as he goes to Edinburgh, he is willing to search for, and make production" of such of the documents called for as he finds;—if we look also to the admission of parties, in which the agents agree "to hold all the documents produced by either party as genuine writings," I have an infinite difficulty in allowing the defender to turn round in this way, and maintain that the copy of the lease produced was not admissible. Look to the words which precede the issues,—"It being admitted that under the lease, of which No. 3 of process is a copy, the pursuers became tenants," &c. This is as much an admission by Colonel Gordon as by the other party. Then look to the issues themselves,—"whether the defender wrongfully failed, &c., in terms of the said lease." Now, will any body show an instance in which, after an admission of this nature as to the existence of a lease, and possession following upon it, the copy has not been admitted? No doubt the defender might have said—not admitted, and put the pursuers to proof. But here he expressly says, “admitted;” and the only question is, whether, “in terms of the said lease,” he wrongfully failed? The question which I have to put to myself is, whether under such circumstances, with all these admissions, and after an appeal to the House of Lords and a return of the case to this Court (all these proceedings taking place on the admission of a lease), the defender is entitled to turn round and say, “That document by which I, the owner of this estate, put my name, and bound myself to you, is good for nothing. True, you the tenant, trusting to my honour and honesty, got your copy, which is just as much the lease as the other which I retain; but now, after questions of damages have arisen, and issues have been adjusted and a trial has taken place, I am entitled to object that your copy is not duly stamped, and cannot be admitted in evidence. You must go and produce the copy which is lying in my repositories.” And why? Because, when it is produced, it will be found to be unstamped, and therefore inadmissible. I go on the clear admission that the lease existed, and that the copy of it produced was a genuine document, and I do not think the objection to its not having been stamped at the date of the trial, is, in the circumstances, worth one straw.

Lord Gillies.—This is a question of some difficulty. There are clear admissions in the record implying that the lease was complete and perfect; and if No. 3 of process were duly stamped, the copy retained by the defender is not one whit better than it is. The one is just as much the lease as the other. It is said, that by admitting the copy, we facilitate the commission of fraud against the stamp laws. I do not see any thing in this; for there seems to be the same door to fraud either way. Be this as it may, the whole objection stated in the bill of exceptions is, that the copy of the lease was tendered in evidence, and admitted. There is not one word more. At the same time, there was an admission that the copy of the lease was a genuine document. This is all which appears to have been known to the presiding Judge. It is not said that he was informed that the principal copy was lying on the table, and that, on looking at it, it would be found to be unstamped. Had this been told to the presiding Judge, he must at once have stopped the trial. He must have said—here is a fraud on the revenue, of which, ex parte judicis, I am bound to take notice. The copy now produced cannot bear faith. The fact, however, was not told, but concealed; and in this state of matters, I am clear that the direction was right. There is nothing on the face of the bill of exceptions to show that the copy was not the best possible evidence. There was no offer to produce the original; and there was a distinct admission that the copy was genuine. True, it has now been proved to us, that when the trial took place, the defender's copy was not stamped. I am not quite prepared to say what the consequence of this may be; but taking the facts as they were submitted to the presiding Judge, I am clear that his direction was right.

Lord Mackenzie.—Two questions have been raised here. The first is that which properly arises under the exception; and it is, whether the copy of the lease was admissible in evidence? Here I can have no doubt. The issue supposes that the lease could not be found; and nobody knew that it was unstamped. The assumption that it was a good lease formed the very basis of the issues; for if it was not, there was no room for any trial. In these circumstances, the admission was made that the copy was equivalent to the principal. All parties were bound by it, and the tenants were actually in possession upon it. I cannot see, therefore, how it could be inadmissible. Had the pursuers chosen to read the whole of it at the trial, it could not have been objected to. It is said it was not admissible in evidence. It was certainly unnecessary to bring it forward again as evidence. After it had been admitted, the pursuers would have acted more skilfully in resting satisfied with the admission. But superflua non nocent. It may have been a waste of time to tender it again; but the irregularity is not such as to set aside the verdict. The second question is, whether, having now ascertained that when the trial took place the principal lease was unstamped, we are not bound, ex parte judicis, to quash the verdict? This is a serious question; but I rather think there is an answer to it.

The lease is now stamped, and this, I think, relieves us from the necessity of interfering for the purpose of preventing a fraud on the stamp laws. On the whole, I am clear that the defender's objection under this first exception cannot be sustained.

Lord Fullerton.—I have a little difficulty, but the whole procedure of the defender is so contrary to justice, and the objection is so very critical, that I am inclined to concur with your Lordships. In the circumstances, I think the copy of the lease was admissible in evidence.

The Court repelled the first exception.
(Third exception).

Lord Gillies.—We have repelled the first exception. The second is not insisted in; and it now remains to decide the third. The objection contained in it is serious, and must, I am afraid, be sustained. A delay of two or three days took place in relieving the sequestration; and as it was for so very short a period, I presume the verdict of the jury was not much affected by it. Still, however, it is impossible to say what the effect would have been if the jury had been directed that the landlord was not bound to grant the assignation; and it is this which makes the objection serious. I think the presiding Judge should have directed the jury, whether or not the landlord was bound to assign to a third party. There could have been no question of damages on this head if the landlord was not so bound; and this being the main question, the defender was entitled to insist on the determination of it by the Judge. In these circumstances, I am compelled to say that I think the exception must be sustained.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am compelled to be of the same opinion. We must look to the proceedings in the House of Lords, where the material point was fixed. In the former trial, the presiding Judge directed the jury, that the defender was liable in damages for not having relieved the sequestration. Then a bill of exceptions was brought, and we, thinking that we were entitled to look at the whole circumstances of the case, found that the presiding Judge was justified in his direction. Then there was an appeal to the House of Lords, who found that we were not entitled to look beyond what was contained in the bill of exceptions. It only remained, therefore, to consider whether, looking merely to the bill of exceptions, the direction was wrong in point of law. Now, it is perfectly clear, that if the House of Lords had thought that the direction was good in law,—in other words, that a landlord, on tender of payment by a third party, was bound to assign—they would not have reversed our judgment. In reversing it, they must have held that the landlord was not so bound. The law was thus fixed, and though I had some doubts of it before, I have none now. I think the landlord is not bound to assign to a third party. The second trial then takes place, and the presiding Judge declines to direct the jury that the landlord was not bound to have relieved the sequestration. He declined, and left the jury to take the law on that point as they pleased. The question, whether or not this exception is valid, is just in other words, whether or not the law so declined to be laid down, was a material element in the cause? If it was not material, I could not think that, in not laying it down, there was any failure to direct. A Judge might be asked to lay down the law on points which had no bearing on the trial; and it never could be maintained, that if parties were so unreasonable as to ask it, he could be bound to read over all Erskine to the jury. But, on the other hand, if the law was important, and a wrong opinion of the jury with regard to it was likely to influence their verdict, I think the declinature to direct was a good exception. When the law is material to the cause, the Judge is no more entitled to decline directing than he is to direct erroneously. In the present case, I think the law was material; and I am therefore bound to hold that the exception must be sustained.

Lord Fullerton.—I am of the same opinion. In order to support the exception, it is necessary to make out that the law declined to be laid down was sound and pertinent to the cause. Now, I agree with Lord Mackenzie that the law is sound, and has been fixed by the House of Lords. Before it was so fixed, I held the same opinion. In general, when an assignation is claimed by a party paying a debt, there is merely a question of equity. The party receiving the payment has no interest to object to the assignation. He has received his money, and while the assignation cannot hurt him, it may be of essential consequence to the third party receiving it. The case of a landlord is different. He has the clearest of all interest to use sequestration for the payment of his rent; but he has, at the same time, the clearest of all interests not to allow the sequestration to be kept up against his tenant after he has received payment. On this ground I think he is entitled to decline granting an assignation. Holding, then, that the law sought to be laid down was good, the next question is, was it pertinent to the cause? It certainly was. The view which the jury took of it must have materially influenced their verdict; and therefore, I think the Judge was not entitled to decline directing with regard to it.

Lord President concurred.

The Court sustained the third exception.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 154.—JOHN KIRKWOOD, Junior, Claimant and Advocate, v. JOHN THOMAS KEELING, Claimant and Respondent.

Service—Brieves, Competing—Succession—A father having settled his property on his daughter in liferent, exclusive of the ius mariti, and his children in fee; “whom failing before majority or marriage, to the nearest lawful heir or heirs of my said daughter”—Held, on the failure of the children, that the cousin-german of the daughter was preferable to a brother of her husband.

John Little had an only daughter, Isabella Little, who was married to Thomas Kirkwood, by whom she had two daughters, Isabella Kirkwood and Janet Kirkwood. By deed of settlement, John Little conveyed to Isabella Little “in liferent, but for her liferent use alienably, during all the days and years of her lifetime, secluding the ius mariti or right of administration of her present husband, or any future husband she may have, and after her death (exclusive as therein before and after mentioned), to and in favour of the said Isabella Kirkwood and Janet Kirkwood, as also such other child or children as may be procreated between the said Thomas Kirkwood and my said daughter, without distinction of sex, equally among them, or share and share alike; whom all failing the said children before majority or marriage, to the nearest lawful heir or heirs of Isabella Little, my said daughter, in fee and heritage, heritably and irredeemably, all and sundry lands, heritages, tenements, tacks, and whole other heritable subjects pertaining or belonging, or that may pertain and belong to me at the time of my death, except the liferent provision granted by me in favour of my wife as after specially provided, and particularly without prejudices to the generality,” the several subjects therein specially described.

After John Little's death, his daughter Isabella Little or Kirkwood, and granddaughters Isabella and Janet Kirkwood, were infeft in the heritable subjects conveyed by the settlement for their respective rights of liferent and fee.

Isabella Little or Kirkwood died in 1831,—her daughters, Isabella and Janet, in 1837 and 1838 respectively, in minority and unmarried, and shortly after, her husband Thomas Kirkwood.

With the view of taking up John Little's property, as conveyed by his settlement, competing brieves were taken out by John Kirkwood, junior, the only brother of Thomas Kirkwood, and by John Thomas Keeling, a nephew of John Little by his only sister Jane Little.

The brieves having been advocated from the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, Kirkwood pleaded—1. The claimant, John Kirkwood, junior, as the heir-at-law of Isabella and Janet Kirkwood, is alone in that character entitled to the subjects in question, and to expedite a special service for the purpose of taking them up. 2. The claimant, John Thomas Keeling, not being in fact the nearest lawful heir of Isabella Little, the mother of Isabella and Janet Kirkwood, has no right to the subjects in question, even supposing his construction of John Little's deed of settlement were sound, and is not entitled to oppose the service of the present claimant. 3. Even assuming that the propinquity of the claimant, John Thomas Keeling, were capable of being instructed, he has no right to the subjects in question. By the true conception and meaning of John Little's deed of settlement, the spes successionis constituted in favour of Isabella Little's heirs, was made to depend on the condition that her daughters, Isabella and Janet Kirkwood, should fail before majority or marriage; but as these parties did not fail before majority or marriage, but, on the contrary, took up, and died vest and seised in the subjects in question, the subsequent destination in favour of Isabella Little's heirs was evacuated, and came entirely to an end.

Keeling pleaded—The testator's only grandchildren, Isabella and Janet Kirkwood, having failed by decease, before majority or marriage, the claimant, by the express destination in said disposition and settlement, is entitled to the fee of the subjects in question, as being the nearest lawful heir of Isabella Little, the testator's daughter.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutors:

“10th February 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the process, Finds that the claimant, John Thomas Keeling, is the person who, if he shall establish the fact of his being the nearest lawful heir of Isabella Little, is entitled to succeed in this competition, and decerns accordingly: Quoad ultra, continues the cause until the retour of the brieve shall have been made and reported.

“Note.—The question, who is entitled to succeed, is purely a question as to the granter's intention, as deduced from the whole words of the deed; and if this intention, so deduced, be doubtful, then the most precise language is incapable of expressing the simplest thought.

“The granter had a daughter, and through her, two granddaughters. He anticipated the event which has actually happened, of the granddaughters dying unmarried and in minority; in reference to which his object plainly was, to keep his property in his own family, instead of letting it go into the family of their father. In order to attain this object, he declares, by the clearest possible mark, who is to succeed after this their failure. He does not leave the law to settle it, but declares it himself; and his destination is to his daughter in liferent, for her liferent use alienably, and her two children in fee, equally; ‘whom all failing the said children before majority or marriage, to the nearest lawful heir or heirs of the said Isabella Little’ (his daughter.) The grandchildren survived the granter, and died in minority and unmarried; and it is admitted that the claimant Keeling is the nearest lawful heir of Isabella Little. Nevertheless, he is opposed by the person who, through their father, is the nearest heir, not of Isabella Little the mother, but of the deceased unmarried minors.

“The ground of this opposition is, that the children having survived the granter, the property vested in them, and consequently descended to their heirs; and in exposition and defence of this construction, recourse is had to all the mysteries of substitution and institution. The answer to all this consists in merely reading the words of the deed. Can failing before marriage or majority be held to be the same with failing before me? Is not Keeling the heir of Isabella Little? And is it not declared that the heir of Isabella Little shall succeed, if, as has happened, her children should die before majority or marriage? Other clauses in the deed are referred to, in order to show that this could not have been what the granter meant, but (as the Lord Ordinary thinks) with singularly bad success; for every subsequent word corroborates the dispositive clause."

"10th February 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the process, Finds that the claimant, John Kirkwood, junior, is not entitled to succeed; dismisses his claim, and finds that he has no right to oppose the service of John Thomas Keeling; finds him liable in expenses in this competition, and decerns accordingly: Quoad ultra, continues this cause until the retour of the brieve shall have been made and reported.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary refers to his note in the first case of Keeling against Kirkwood."

Kirkwood reclaimed, but the Court, without calling on the respondent's counsel, adhered.

No. 155.—PATRICK MILNE, Pursuer, v. CHARLES MELVILLE, Defender.

Process—Decreet—Reduction—Suspension—Advocation—A party presented an application for interdict to the Magistrates of a burgh, which was granted, and afterwards made perpetual, accompanied with certain findings, reserving to either party to take any competent course to have the judgment applied, and allowing extract as of an interim decret. The petitioner extracted the decret, and received payment of his expenses—Held that a reduction of the interlocutor was competent.

The parties in this action are conterminous proprietors, and the gable which divides their properties is alleged to be mutual. The pursuer having occasion to enlarge his premises, took down the gable with, as he alleges, the consent of the defender; but in the course of rebuilding it, he made the foundation of the new gable six or eight inches thicker than that of the old, and, it is said, also encroached upon some vacant ground. In consequence, the defender applied to the Magistrates of Dundee for an interdict against him, and craved that he should be ordained to restore the defender's property to the same state in which it was previous to the pursuer's operations. The Magistrates granted interim interdict, and on the 14th March 1838, pronounced an interlocutor, finding that whether the gable-wall, mentioned in said action, belonged wholly to the said Charles Melville or not, at least the said Charles Melville had such right in the said wall as deprived the said Patrick Milne of the right of taking down the wall at his own hand, and therefore declared the interdict which had previously been granted perpetual, and ordained the said Patrick Milne immediately to restore the wall as nearly as possible to the state it was in before his operations were begun. On the 24th March 1838, the Magistrates, finding that the interdict applied only to the gable-wall, and not to the projection on the vacant ground, remitted to Mr William Scott, superintendent of public works in Dundee, to superintend, at the cost of the said Patrick Milne, the restoring of the wall, and carrying of the judgment of the Court into effect. The pursuer having been found liable in expenses, the Magistrates, on the 31st March 1838, approved of the clerk's report upon the account of the same, and decerned. On the 7th June 1838, the Magistrates found, that however clear it might appear that the said Charles Melville would not be injured by the foundation of the wall projecting under ground on his property, yet the said Patrick Milne was not entitled to make such projection to any extent whatever, unless in so far as there was clear evidence that the old wall taken down did so project; that wherever there was doubt or want of evidence as to whether there had been a stooling or otherwise, the presumptions must be against the said Patrick Milne, and decerned accordingly; and, with the instructions therein contained, remitted of new to the said inspector. On the 11th of July 1838, the Magistrates recalled the remit and appointment of the inspector, and of new decerned in terms of the foresaid interlocutors, of date the 14th, 24th, and 31st days of March, and 7th day of June 1838, reserving to either party to take any competent course for having the said judgments applied, and allowed extract of the said decrees to be issued as of an interim decret, after the lapse of twenty-four hours; found the said Patrick Milne liable in the expenses incurred since the last taxation; appointed an account thereof to be lodged and taxed, and decerned. The interim decret was extracted as allowed; and the various sums of expenses decerned for, amounting to £30. 2. 2., were paid by the pursuer.

A second application was made by the defender on the 16th July,—the proceedings on which formed the subject of advocation—vide ante, p. 48.

The present action was brought for the purpose of reducing the interlocutors pronounced under the first.

Pleaded in defence—1. The action is incompetent, in respect that the cause in which the interlocutors or judgments brought under challenge were pronounced has not been exhausted, but is still in dependence. 2. The action is farther irrelevant and incompetent, in respect that the pursuer is barred, by acquiescence and homologation, from challenging the interlocutors and judgments in question, and in respect that he has libelled no relevant grounds to entitle him to insist in any such challenge. 3. There are no relevant grounds libelled under or in reference to which the pursuer is entitled to conclude for repetition of the sums of expenses in question,—these sums having been voluntarily paid by him, and fairly received by the defender, several years ago, without protest, reservation, or qualification of any sort on the part of the pursuer.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"18th February 1842.—Having heard the counsel for the parties, repels the preliminary defences; and in respect the defender now intimates that he does not mean to acquiesce in this judgment, finds him liable in expenses; and remits the account thereof, when lodged, to the auditor to tax and to report."

The defender reclaimed, and argued—That the judgment was only interlocutory, and the decree ad interim; reduction therefore was incompetent; and even an advocacy was so only on special grounds, and with consent of the Inferior Judge: Coates, December 1835. The pursuer must wait for a final judgment; and if he then advocate, he will be required to find caution for expenses.

Answered—Not an interim decree, but a decree of which an extract was allowed to be issued as of an interim decret. It was extracted, and the pursuer compelled to pay the expenses. This is the distinction between the present and the case of Coates. In the advocacy of the subsequent proceedings the defender pleads res judicata; and the pursuer now brings a reduction of the prior judgments. If a decree be not extracted, advocacy is the proper course; and if extracted, suspension. But here the pursuer has paid the expenses, and his only remedy is by reduction. Whether a reduction of an interlocutor is competent or not, depends on circumstances. It has been held, that where an interdict has been made perpetual, the interlocutor may be reduced.

Lord Medwyn.—On the explanation given, I am satisfied the interlocutor is right. The reservation to either party to take any competent step to have the judgments applied, does not exhaust the cause, in so far as it allowed the defender here to go on; but he did not choose to do so. He applied for extract and obtained it, and recovered his expenses. In this situation, is there any thing to prevent the party to proceed by reduction? The rule is, where advocacy or suspension is competent, reduction is not to be resorted to for the purpose of being relieved from finding caution for expenses. But I cannot see that advocacy or suspension are competent after decret has been extracted; and the party has refused to go on under the reservation in his favour. He proceeded in an altogether new action, which is now under advocacy.

Lord Moncreiff.—I have not the least apprehension that we are interfering with the rule as to suspensions and advocations.

Lord Justice-Clerk concurred.

Lord Meadowbank absent.

SECOND DIVISION.—[J.W.]

No. 156.—JOHN BALFOUR, Pursuer, v. SIR ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL and OTHERS, Balfour's Trustees, Defenders.

Proof—Presumption—Debitor non præsuntur donare—Testament—Legacy—A party under an obligation to pay to A, or to the heirs succeeding him in the lands of B, a sum of £3000 on her own death or marriage, bequeathed to him, his heirs, executors, and assignees, a legacy of £20,000, payable the first term after her death—Held that the debt was not extinguished by the legacy.

The late John Balfour of Balbirnie, the grandfather of the pursuer, died in 1813. A few weeks before his death, being desirous of increasing the provisions previously settled by him on his wife and daughters, he signed an informal writing, dated 4th December 1813, but which was neither holograph of him, except as to the sums of the several provisions, nor duly tested, whereby, inter alia, he bound himself to pay to his wife, Mrs Balfour, an additional annuity of £200, and a capital sum of £3000 for enabling her to purchase a dwelling-house after his decease, the rights and titles to which were to be taken in favour of herself in life-rent, and, after her decease, of Miss Anne Balfour, her youngest daughter, also in life-rent, during her life and remaining unmarried; and after the death both of his wife and Miss Balfour, or at the death of Mrs Balfour and the marriage of Miss Balfour, then to his eldest son, Robert Balfour, or to the heir succeeding to him in the lands and estate of Balbirnie.

Shortly after the death of Mr Balfour, and in fulfilment of the intentions expressed by him, his son, Robert Balfour, then of Balbirnie, granted a bond of provision, dated 31st May 1814, in favour of his mother and sisters. Inter alia, he became bound to make payment of the sum of £3000 for purchasing a dwelling-house for his mother,

“the rights and title-deeds of which dwelling-house she should be bound and obliged to take to and in favour of herself in life-rent, during all the days of her life; and after her decease, to and in favour of the said Miss Anne Balfour, his sister, also in life-rent, during all the days of her life and remaining unmarried; and after the death of both his said mother and youngest sister, or the death of his mother and the marriage of his said sister, then to himself, or the heirs succeeding to him in the said lands and estate of Balbirnie, in fee.”

In regard to this sum, the interest was regularly paid to Mrs Balfour down to Whitsunday 1819; and the capital itself was shortly thereafter paid to Miss Anne Balfour upon occasion of her purchasing a dwelling-house in Charlotte Square, Edinburgh, in June 1819; the titles to which were taken in favour of Mrs Balfour in life-rent, and of Miss Anne Balfour herself in fee, instead of being taken in favour of Miss Balfour in life-rent, and so long as she should remain unmarried, and to Robert Balfour, or the heirs succeeding him in the estate of Balbirnie, in fee. In consequence of this Miss Balfour granted the following obligatory letter:

“Edinburgh, 2d June 1819.—MY DEAR BROTHER, As you have, agreeably to our father's settlement, advanced to me the sum of £3000 Sterling, with which, and £400 more of my own, I have purchased a house in Charlotte Square, and taken the right to it in favour of our mother in life-rent, and of myself in fee, or property; I hereby, in terms also of the said settlement, oblige myself to repay to you or your heirs the sum of £3000 so advanced by you, on the death of the longest liver of my mother and myself, or on her death and my own marriage, and to grant you a regular bond on stamped paper for the money, if you deem it necessary. I am, &c.
(Signed) “ANNE BALFOUR.”

Miss Balfour never granted any regular bond,—her letter having been considered as quite sufficient.

By her deed of settlement, of date 28th April 1835, Miss Balfour, among other legacies and bequests, left to her brother, General Robert Balfour, the sum of £16,000, to each of his four sons the sum of £1000, and to each of his four daughters the sum of £2000. By a codicil, dated 9th April 1838, Miss Balfour recalled the legacy of £16,000 to General Balfour, he being now dead, and also the legacy of £1000 to Captain John Balfour, now of Balbirnie, the present pursuer, and in place thereof she legated and bequeathed to him the sum of £20,000. The legacies were to be payable “to the said legatees, and their respective heirs, executors or assignees, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after my decease.” Miss Balfour died in 1839, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 28th April 1835, whereby she conveyed her whole estate, heritable and moveable, in favour of Sir

Archibald Campbell of Succoth and others, as trustees for the uses, ends, and purposes therein mentioned; and, inter alia, for payment of all the just and lawful debts that should be due by her at the time of her death.

The present action was brought for payment of the sum of £3000, in terms of the obligatory letter granted by Miss Balfour to the father of the pursuer.

Pleaded for the pursuer—1. The pursuer, as the heir succeeding to his father, the late Lieutenant-General Balfour, in the estate of Balbirnie, being at the death of Miss Anne Balfour the party in right destinatione to the debt of £3000, which, by her obligatory letter, she had bound herself to pay to the said Lieutenant-General Balfour and his heirs, in terms of her father's settlements; and the said debt being still resting-owing, the pursuer is entitled to decree for payment against the defenders, her testamentary trustees, in terms of the conclusions of his action. 2. Under the circumstances which here occur, the terms of Miss Balfour's settlements afford no ground for presuming that she intended the legacy bequeathed by her to the pursuer to be in satisfaction of the debt in question. On the contrary, the presumptions of the case, with reference to the relative situation of the parties—the amount of the residuary funds—the inductive causes expressed by the testatrix for leaving this legacy—the nature, destination, and term of payment of the bequest itself, as contrasted with those of the debt due by her,—are all in favour of an opposite conclusion. 3. Independently of any evidence of intention arising from the terms and tenor of the testamentary deed, and supposing a sufficiency of funds for payment of both debts and legacies, there is no rule of law for holding that a legacy is to be imputed in extinction of a debt due by the testator to the legatee; nor is there any sound principle or reason, in common sense, upon which such a proposition can be maintained.

Pleaded for the defenders—1. The obligation incurred by Miss Balfour, under her letter of 2d June 1819, to repay on her death to General Balfour or his heirs the £3000 received from him, and expended by her in the purchase of a house, has been fulfilled, by the legacy to a much larger amount having been left by her, first to the General, and upon his predecease to his heir the pursuer, and having been paid to the latter. 2. Under the well-known maxim of law, debitor non presumitur donare, the presumption is that Miss Balfour meant to include the said £3000 in the £20,000 bequeathed by her to the pursuer, and had no intention that, over and above the said £20,000, he was to obtain payment of the said £3000 from her funds. 3. Not only is there nothing in the terms of the deeds of settlement, or in the facts and circumstances of the case, to exclude the operation of the above-mentioned presumption of law; but, on the contrary, these show it to have been the understanding that Miss Balfour's liberal provision to her brother and his heir, was to sopite and extinguish all legal claim at their instance against her estate, and that the pursuer was not to receive from her funds the said £3000, over and above the £20,000 bequeathed by her.

The Lord Ordinary having appointed mutual cases, made avizandum with the cause, accompanying his interlocutor with the following note:

"This case is taken to report, as it is prepared for the consideration of the Court by very learned and able papers on each side; and no question has occurred in which either the point now at issue, or any one precisely analogous with it, has been hitherto decided in our practice.

"The pursuer, Mr Balfour of Balbirnie, has commenced the present action against the testamentary trustees of his deceased aunt, Miss Balfour of Kingsdale, to constitute a debt of £3000, alleged to have been due to him as representative of his father, the late General Balfour, at Miss Balfour's death. The defenders admit the original constitution of the debt, but they plead that it was satisfied and paid by a legacy of much larger amount (£20,000), which Miss Balfour directed to be paid to the pursuer, and which of course he has since received.

"There can be no doubt that the maxim debitor non presumitur donare, is a rule of admitted authority in our law; and if a legacy, payable under a settlement containing the special clauses which occurs in this deed, had ever been held to sanction the application of this legal presumption, the Lord Ordinary would have readily given effect to it in the present instance, as there are strong circumstances to raise a conjecture in many minds, if not a legal inference, that Miss Balfour really meant the legacy to be a satisfaction of the debt. The claim of the pursuer was not exigible till Miss Balfour's death. But at the first legal term thereafter (i. e., as soon as any creditor could by the law of Scotland demand payment of any debt), she directed a sum more than six-fold exceeding the claim, to be paid to the creditor, and that out of the proceeds of the estate or funds from which the debt fell to be paid. No doubt there was no reference in the settlement to connect the legacy with the debt; but it may not unreasonably be supposed that this was attributable to the circumstance that the debt was constituted by a voucher, written by the lady herself at a distance of time backward, and that it had escaped her recollection at the date of the settlement, and that the voucher written by the testatrix herself, was unknown to the man of business who framed the settlement.

"On mature consideration, however, it may be greatly doubted if the terms and structure of the settlement do not effectually exclude in law the application of the presumption in the present case. Holding that the maker of the settlement, like testators in general, must be presumed to have known the state of her own affairs, she made it a primary direction of this settlement, that all her just and lawful debts should be paid; and thereafter, and as it were out of the residue, she legated and bequeathed £20,000 to the pursuer. It is rather thought that the first direction in the settlement, to pay all the debts of the testatrix, is not affected by the subsequent legacy bequeathed to the pursuer.

"With regard to the authorities, there does not appear to have been any case in our own Court, in which the effect of a legacy to a creditor, bequeathed under a settlement containing such clauses as the present, has been considered by the Court. But the law has been laid down in the English Courts, in cases approaching very near to the present, and that deserve particular attention, as the same rules of construction of testaments, founded on the presumed meaning and intention of the testator which have been adopted in our own practice from the civil law, appear also to be recognised in the law of England. In that view, the doctrine applicable to this question, in a book of the highest authority in English practice, deserves particular attention. 'The intention of the testator being the prevailing rule to go by in the construction of wills, it has been from thence established as doctrine, that wherever a person, by his will, gives a legacy as great, or greater than the debt he owes to the legatee, that such legacy should be a satisfaction of the debt, on the presumption that a man must be intended just before he is bountiful, and that his intent is to pay a debt, and not to give a legacy.—Bacon's Abridgement, voce Legacies,' D.

"But it is afterwards explained that this general rule has long been viewed as resting on a very questionable foundation in equity and right construction; and accordingly, so far back as in 1743, Lord Hardwicke observed, that the maxim 'Debitor non presumitur donare' would not hold, if it was to be reconsidered; for the Court have always shown some dissatisfaction at the rule, and endeavoured, if there is any room, to distinguish cases out of it.' The same very learned Judge added, in a subsequent case, that 'legacies naturally imply a bounty, and therefore, though the Court of late have not altogether disavowed the doctrine of satisfaction, yet they have been very inclinable to lay hold of any circumstance to distinguish the latter from the former cases.' 3 Atkins, p. 96. There do not appear to be any subsequent authorities in England, at variance with the law as laid down in these cases. On the contrary, Lord Alvanley, in 1797, seems to have treated the maxim now founded on as entitled to no extension. 3 Vesey, jun. p. 561.

"From these and other precedents, it appears to be now established beyond question in England, that the maxim now pleaded in defence is not maintainable in certain classes of settlements which deserve to be noted.

"1st, A legacy of greater amount than the debt, cannot be pleaded as a satisfaction of the latter, where the testator has separately directed his debts to be paid. That was laid down in the case of Richardson above cited. "W., by a will, gave to her servant G. £500, to be paid her within three months after W.'s death; and in another part says, 'I give £5 a-piece to the rest of my servants, but not to G., because I have done for her very well before; and by a latter clause gives her lands in trust to pay her debts and legacies. W. at her death, owed G. £200 on bond. On the circumstances of this will, there is sufficient to take away the presumption that the legacy was given in satisfaction of the debt." Richardson, 3 Atkins, p. 65.

"The preceding case was, to a certain extent, less favourable for the creditor than the present, as the direction to pay the testator's debts in Miss Balfour's settlement, precedes the legacy; while in the case referred to, that direction occurred in a clause of the deed posterior to the bequest. Nevertheless, Lord Hardwicke found both legacy and debt claimable. It is said that this judgment proceeded on the ground that the legacy was granted to a servant, and that a free gratuity is always presumed in legacies to persons of that class; and certainly a part of Lord Hardwicke's remarks affords some countenance for that view of the case. But his opinion takes a wider scope; and when his Lordship observed that the creditor was placed, in respect of her legacy, in a class of parties in the will who were all to receive free donations of a specified amount from the testator, and that it was not reasonable she should get less than the others, which she would do if her prior claim were deducted from her legacy, the same objection applies to all similar cases arising under such settlements as that which is the subject of the present question.

"2d, In the construction of English settlements, the legacy and debt must be payable at the same time, in order to found a plea of satisfaction, on the principle that a debt instantly exigible cannot be held as set off, or intended to be extinguished by a contingent legacy which may never become due. Hence the most slender discrepancy between the date of payment of the legacy and debt, has been held to take the case out of the rule. Thus, in the case of Clark and Sewel, already referred to (3 Atkins, p. 96), it was laid down that 'a legacy that ought to be deemed a satisfaction, must take place immediately at the testator's death; for a debt being due, then the legacy must be so too, and not being payable in this case till a month after, the Court held it to be no satisfaction.'

"This would be a direct authority in favour of the pursuer's claim, if the law of Scotland was precisely the same as that of England relative to the vesting of legacies, and the obligations of executors in the payment of debts. But in Scotland it has generally been held, that legacies bequeathed in the terms used in Miss Balfour's settlement, vest a morte testatoris, while even the onerous debts of the defunct cannot be legally demanded till six months after his decease. If the pursuer's claim, therefore, depended solely on the supposed distinction now adverted to, it would be very doubtful how far it could receive effect, consistent with the recognised principles of our law.

"Generally, it is for the Court to consider whether the rules admitted in English practice, in the construction of such settlements as the present, are sound and reasonable in themselves; and even if they are, whether they be sufficient, on their own merits, to rule the present question."

At advising,

Lord Medwyn.—I have no wish to decide this case upon any rules in English practice. The principle in our law is to give effect to the intention of the testator; and in determining what it is, the maxim debitor non presumitur donare must be attended to. It is, however, only a presumption, and must yield either to a stronger presumption, or to express intention. It is said that in the case of a legacy, the maxim is excluded; but a legacy does not always exclude it: Spaden and Hardie. I do not think the legacy included the debt, and am therefore for repelling the defences.

Lord Moncreiff.—This is properly a question of construction on the deeds and writings of the testator; but it is one of intention. There is no doubt of the rule debitor non presumitur donare; but it does not take effect in every case. It is liable to exception whenever circumstances raise a contrary presumption or intention of donation. In all the cases the rule is general, but liable to exceptions; and it were unreasonable to lay it down that the maxim is excluded in mortis causa deeds. Smith is directly to the contrary. In that case there was a legacy, and yet the rule applied. Spaden does not apply, in my view. I come therefore to the special case; and it is material that the £20,000 is expressly bequeathed as a legacy unconnected with the debt of £3000. The deed of the father is specific as to the title to the house being taken to the heir; and when a different arrangement was made, the letter granted by Miss Balfour was conformable. If the pursuer had predeceased the testator, the legacy would have been payable to his executors, and not to his heirs. This might have been a different person from the heir of Balbirnie, to whom the debt was specially payable. If so, it is exceedingly difficult to find any link of connection between the debt and the legacy;—both must have been paid. The testator orders the trustees to pay all debts; and this affords an explanation why no special mention is made of the £3000. The presumption is that Miss Balfour knew that it was due, and that she had provided generally for its payment among her other debts. Judging upon the principles of law, and the facts of the case, I don't think that there is room for the maxim debitor non presumitur donare. The maxim might apply to such a case; but I do not think it takes effect here.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I concur. The plea maintained by the pursuer would exclude the application of the maxim—or rather the relevancy of a defence founded on the maxim—in all cases of legacy. But the cases overrule this plea. In all the cases the point is, whether the maxim took effect; but there is no general rule. In each particular case the intention of the testator is to be regarded. We are not driven to adopt the distinctions of the English law. We have not fallen into their error, and do not require to resort to their devices to redeem it. I do not attach much importance to the direction to pay debts. The trustees, by their intromissions, were as much bound to pay, as although expressly directed to do so. I don't profess to lay down any general rule on the matter; and if this be said to leave great uncertainty, the same result seems to obtain in England. I do not see how justice can be attained otherwise than by looking to the case with a view to give effect to the testator's own intention. No doubt, in attempting to ascertain it, we must take along with us all legal presumptions. Under the circumstances, I do not think the legacy included the debt; and if the intention be clear, I do not think the difference in the terms of payment material.

SECOND DIVISION. — (J.W.)

NO. 157.—WILLIAM RATTRAY, Pursuer, v. JOHN MEADOWS WHITE and MANDATORY, Defendants.

Bankrupt.—Statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 110.—Assignee, Judicial — Real Estate, Vesting of.—Held that the vesting order in the Insolvent Debtors' Act, 1 and 2 Vict. c. 110, comprehended the real estate of the bankrupt situated in Scotland, and, being registered in the General Register of Seisins, excluded an action of adjudication at the instance of a creditor competing with the judicial assignee.

Archibald Torry, formerly merchant in Edinburgh, having gone to London, where he was imprisoned for debt, applied to the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors to be discharged, in terms of the Statute 1 and 2 Vict. c. 110. Whereupon an order was made by the Court, in terms of the Statute, "vesting all his real and personal estate and effects, both within this realm and abroad," in Mr Samuel Sturges of Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, as provisional assignee. Afterwards the Court ordered that the defender, Mr John Meadows White of Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, "shall be, and he is hereby appointed assignee of the estate and effects of the said Archibald Torry, for the purposes of the Statute." Both the original order in favour of the provisional assignee, and also the appointment in favour of Mr Meadows White, were recorded in the General Register of Seisins.

The pursuer, Mr Rattray, as the indorsee or assignee of Thomas Smith Fairley, writer in Edinburgh, raised two several processes of adjudication, as a creditor of Torry, for the purpose of attaching and transferring to him certain decrees of adjudication which Torry had obtained against the Earl of Buchan; and the defender put in a minute to the Lord Ordinary, praying his Lordship to sist him and his mandatory as defenders, and to allow them to put in defences. The pursuer having maintained that the defender, Mr Meadows White, as assignee under the Statute, had no right to claim any part of Mr Torry's real estate in Scotland, the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:

"12th February 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties on the minute, No. 8 of process, by the English assignee, allows him to lodge defences within eight days, but under this explanation, that his being allowed to do so is not to be held as implying that the real estate of the bankrupt in Scotland is vested in him, or as excluding any of the pleas of the pursuer, but is merely intended to put the cause into proper shape for having the pleas of both parties stated and decided."

Afterwards defences having been put in, the record was closed, and the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor reporting the cause to the Inner-House.

The clauses in issue were: Section 37,

"That all the real and personal estate and effects of such prisoner, both within this realm and abroad (except the wearing apparel, bedding and other such necessities of such person and his family, and the working tools and implements of such prisoner, not exceeding in the whole the value of £20), and all the future estate, right, title, interest, and trust of such prisoner, in or to any real and personal estate and effects within this realm or abroad, which such prisoner may purchase, &c., shall be vested in the provisional assignee for the time being of the estate and effects of insolvent debtors in England, and such order shall be entered of record in the same Court, and such notice thereof shall be published as the said Court shall direct; and such order, when so made, shall, without any conveyance or assignment, vest all the real and personal estate and effects of such prisoner, and all such future real and personal estate and effects as aforesaid, of every nature and kind whatsoever, and all such debts as aforesaid, in the said provisional assignee," &c.

It is further enacted, section 45,

"That it shall be lawful for the said Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors, at any time after making any such vesting order as aforesaid, as to the same Court shall seem expedient, to appoint a proper person or persons to be assignee or assignees of the estate and effects of such prisoner for the purposes of this Act; and when such assignee or assignees shall have signified to the said Court his or their acceptance of the said appointment, the estate, effects, rights and powers of such prisoner, vested in such provisional assignee as aforesaid, shall immediately, by virtue of such appointment, and without any conveyance or assignment, vest in the said assignee or assignees in trust for the benefit of the creditors of such prisoner, in respect of, or in proportion to, their respective debts according to the provisions of this Act, and every such appointment shall, after acceptance thereof, be entered of record of the said Court, and such notice thereof shall be published as the said Court shall direct; and every person so appointed assignee, shall be deemed to be an officer of the said Court, and shall be liable as such to the control thereof."

It is further enacted, section 46:

"That a copy of any order, under this Act, vesting the estate and effects of any such prisoner in the provisional assignee of the estates and effects of insolvent debtors, or of the appointment under the provision last hereinbefore contained, of an assignee or assignees of such estate and effects, such copy being made upon parchment, and purporting to have the certificate of the provisional assignee of the said Court or his deputy appointed for that purpose, indorsed thereon, and to be sealed with the seal of the said Court, shall, in all courts and places, and without further proof, be recognised and received as sufficient evidence of such order and appointment respectively having been made, and of the title of the provisional assignee, and such other assignee or assignees respectively under the same; provided always, that where, according to any laws now in force, any conveyance or assignment of any real or personal property of an insolvent debtor would be required to be registered, enrolled, or recorded, in any registry-office in England, Wales, or Ireland, or in any registry-office, court, or other place in Scotland, or any of the dominions, plantations, or colonies belonging to her Majesty, then, and in every such case, such certified copy, as hereinbefore is described, of such order under this Act, vesting the estate and effects of any prisoner in the provisional assignee of the said Insolvent Debtors' Court, and a like certified copy of the appointment of an assignee or assignees under this Act (if any such appointment shall have been made), shall be registered in the registry-office, court, or place wherein such conveyance or assignment, as last aforesaid, would require to be registered, enrolled, or recorded. And the registry hereby directed, shall have the like effect, to all intents and purposes, as the registry, enrolment, or recording of such conveyance or assignment as last aforesaid, would have had; and the title of any purchaser of any such property as last aforesaid, for valuable consideration, without notice of any such order or appointment as aforesaid, who shall have duly registered, enrolled, or recorded his purchase-deed previously to the registry hereby directed, shall not be invalidated by reason of such order as aforesaid, or by the appointment of an assignee or assignees as aforesaid, or the vesting of such property in him or them consequent thereupon respectively, unless a certified copy of such order, and a certified copy of such appointment, if any, shall be registered as aforesaid, within the times following; that is to say, as regards the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, within two months after the date of such order and appointment respectively, and as regards all other places, within twelve months from the date thereof respectively."

The 121st section provides, "that this Act shall not extend either to Scotland or Ireland, except where expressly mentioned."

At advising, 16th November 1841,

Lord Medwyn.—I never considered a case where I had greater difficulty in forming an opinion;—indeed, I can hardly say that my opinion is the same as when I came to Court this morning. Here the bankrupt is possessed of heritable property in Scotland, against which decree of adjudication is sought at the instance of an alleged creditor. Mr White appears in the process of adjudication, and is allowed to lodge defences, in which he pleads, that by the vesting order, the whole of the heritable estate belonging to the bankrupt is vested in him. The terms of that vesting order are very broad; therefore, the question just comes to be, whether, under the 37th section of the Act, the heritable property belonging to the bankrupt is so vested in Mr White as to entitle him to have the adjudication dismissed? Now, I thought that the two sections in the Act (37 and 46,) had a very marked bearing on each other, and would, if we had to deal with them alone, be decisive on the point; and it is to be observed, that the words of the Bankrupt Act are very similar to, and closely connected with, the Insolvent Act;—indeed, the clause in the one seems to be copied from the other. But the great difficulty is occasioned by the 121st section, where it is said that the provisions of the Act are not to extend to Scotland unless where Scotland is expressly mentioned. In the case for Rattray, p. 22, an illustration of the principles of interpretation for which he contends is stated, and 6 Geo. IV. c. 14, § 135, is quoted, where I did not expect to see it, as it occurs to me to be more favourable to the views of Mr White. I cannot go along with the argument in Rattray's case, p. 23, for this simple reason, that the heritable property must first be in the commissioner before it can be reconveyed. If in the English Courts it has been held that the words "within this realm" embrace Scotland, we can scarcely go against that opinion, as, in the event of an appeal, there can be no doubt how the case would be decided; but in neither minute is it said that there are decided cases on this point. I own that I came to the Court impressed with the notion which is assumed in Rattray's case, that the interpretation of the Insolvent Act must be the same as of the Bankrupt Act—(reads 25th section of Bankrupt Act). In the 26th section there is a remarkable change in the diction. But I would be very much guided by the interpretation which the English Courts put upon the Statutes.

Lord Moncreiff.—I have great difficulty in this case; and the Court is placed in a difficult situation, for the Statute is entirely English; and whoever drew it, must have been profoundly ignorant of the mode of transmitting and vesting property in Scotland. I assent to the rules quoted from Bacon as to the interpretation of Statutes; and in conformity with that rule, when I read the words of the last clause of the Act, that none of its provisions shall extend to Scotland unless where Scotland is expressly mentioned,—and when I find that in the 37th section Scotland is not once named, I should have thought that Scotland could not have been intended to be brought within the enactment, and I still incline to think so. My difficulty is created by the clause relating to the registries; but even here it must be observed, that it is only by implication that Scotland is mentioned. This is a strange clause, and one which I don't understand; it is strange if merely registering is to give a title; for nothing is said of infeftment. But unquestionably the implication from this clause is, that Scotch heritage was, upon registry of the vesting order, intended to be vested in the assignee. Then, again, the clause in the vesting order covers Scotland under the words "within this realm or abroad." Now, all this is by implication, and it does seem to me that the clause at the end of the Act must just have been put in with the view of providing for such a case, where, by possibility, Scotland might be supposed to be embraced, and preventing it being so embraced unless specially mentioned. Unless this was the intention in introducing that last clause, I cannot understand its use at all.

Lord Meadowbank.—I have no difficulty in this case. Looking to the whole history of the bankrupt law, both in England and Scotland, I think that, according to the fair and legitimate construction of the Statute, and of its introductory clause, it was intended to vest a bankrupt's real estate in Scotland in the provisional assignee. For a considerable time it was doubted whether a commission of bankruptcy vested the personal estate of the bankrupt abroad in the assignee, and there was much inconsistency in the decisions on this point. But at length it was settled that the domicile of the bankrupt should regulate his personal estate wherever situated, and that when in Scotland, it should be held conveyed by the commission of bankruptcy. At a later period several eminent lawyers wished to assimilate the laws as to the vesting of a bankrupt's real and personal estate; and the case of Stein, quoted in White's case, p. 4, shows the leaning at that time, and which continued till the 6th Geo. IV. c. 16, was enacted; although Lord Eldon, in the case of Selkirk, put to rights certain objectionable doctrines which had been expressed in that case of Stein. Now, observe what was done by that Statute. Lord Moncreiff has expressed a doubt whether it applies to Scotland, but I have no doubt that the Legislature did contemplate real estate in Scotland, and intended it to vest first in the trustees, and upon their denuding, in the assignee. In short, the Legislature wished to put bankrupts in England, Ireland and Scotland, on the same footing. For any difficulty as to the meaning of the words in section 12, "both within this realm and abroad," is removed by the 64th section, where we have "England, Scotland and Ireland" specified,—a clause which would be an absolute absurdity if the Legislature had not meant to convey the whole property belonging to the bankrupt, whether in England, Scotland or Ireland. Now, having got this, we have a parliamentary interpretation of a parliamentary term, and we are bound by it. It has been said that the words "within this realm or abroad" can only refer to the dominions subject to the Legislature, and that it is absurd to give the words a more extensive signification. I am not sure of this. It seems to me quite competent to make such a statutory provision; and the jus gentium would lead foreign countries to give the same interpretation to the clause as that designed by the enacting Legislature. I don't say that this would necessarily follow, but merely that such a provision is competent, and not just an absurdity. Now, observe the provisions of our own Bankrupt Act 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41, § 79—(reads).—We are ignorant of the forms for vesting real estates in England, yet it is enacted that the act and warrant of confirmation shall vest in the trustee all the real estate in England belonging to the bankrupt. In like manner, the framers of the English Bankrupt Act were ignorant of the forms for vesting real estates in Scotland, yet they provide for its vesting in the trustee, and upon his denuding, in the assignee. In short, it was just intended to assimilate the two Acts; and the Legislature, without condescending to particulars, considers it sufficient to say, that the real estate is vested in a particular party, leaving it to him to find out the proper mode of completing the conveyance. But this case does not depend on either of those Statutes, but on the Insolvent Act 1 and 2 Vict. c. 110. Mr Torry applied for the benefit of this Act, and the Court pronounced an order vesting the whole of his property, "within this realm or abroad," in the person of the provisional assignee; and by a subsequent appointment Mr White is made assignee in the room of the provisional assignee. Then under the 46th section of the Act, this gentleman records the vesting order in the Register of Sasines in Scotland; and the real question comes to be, whether the 37th section comprehends real estate in Scotland. If this clause had stood alone, and without limitation, it must have been held to comprehend real property situated in Scotland; but it is said that it is controlled by the provision in the last clause of the Statute, which enacts, that unless expressly mentioned, the Act does not extend to Scotland. Now, I lay aside all implication, and ask whether Scotland is expressly mentioned in the 37th section? It does appear to me to be expressly mentioned, and I am surprised that there should be any doubt of this. One great object of the Act was to enable the insolvent, in the most effectual manner, to distribute among his creditors his estate, whether in England or abroad, and therefore, it would be most extraordinary if Scotland is to be excluded. If, while facilities are afforded for the distribution among his creditors of all the insolvent's property wherever situated, property in Scotland alone is to be exempted from these provisions. This appears to me to be a construction so singular, that if by any of the ordinary rules of interpretation, we can comprehend Scotland, we must adopt that rule. Now, taking the strictest rule of construction, we are not bound by the last clause of the Statute to hold that the 37th section does not apply to Scotland, unless the eight letters of which "Scotland" is composed be found therein. Suppose the words used had been "North Britain," or "Great Britain," would not these expressions have been equivalent to an express mention of Scotland? Now I say that when we find a term in this 37th section which, in common parlance, in the language of law and of the Courts, and above all, which in parliamentary language and according to parliamentary interpretation comprehends Scotland, we are not entitled to give that term a more limited interpretation. This term is "realm," or "kingdom," which comprehends the whole United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. Thus, in the common parliamentary expression, "Kings and Queens of this realm," is not Scotland comprehended here? And where an enactment is intended to apply to a portion of the realm, the expression invariably used is, "that part of the," &c. Looking to 6 Geo. IV., where the vesting clause, with the exception of a few words, is the same, we find an explanation given of the word "realm," and that it comprehends Scotland. This Statute does the same thing. It provides for the registering the orders in Scotland, although it does not specify in what particular register, and the termination of this clause (§ 46,) to my mind settles the question by the use of the words "Great Britain." This would be an absurdity if no estate had been vested. Now, looking to the effect of the construction which we are called upon to make, viz., to exclude Scotland which is nominatim comprehended, to hold the 46th section as unnecessary and of no meaning, it appears to me to be opposing all the sound rules of interpretation; and indeed to be stultifying the Statute itself. Therefore, I am clear of opinion, that under the word "realm," Scotland is comprehended.

The Court being divided, appointed the case to be laid before the other Judges, who returned the following opinions:

Lord President (Boyle), Lords Gillies, Mackenzie, Fullerton, Cockburn, Cuninghame, and Murray:

"This is a case of novelty, regarding the interpretation of a recent Statute for the relief of insolvent debtors in England, but it does not appear to be attended with much difficulty, particularly when we keep in view the late alterations that have been adopted by the Legislature with regard both to the English and Scottish bankrupt law.

"Considerable progress was made by the decisions of the Courts of the two countries in bringing the personal estates of bankrupts, wherever situated, under the law of the domicile of the bankrupt, and thereby facilitating their distribution among the creditors; and as far as was consistent with the state of the law as to real property, a similar melioration was manifested both in Scotland and England.

"The important enactment in the English Bankrupt Act of 6th Geo. IV. c. 16, however, put the real estate of the bankrupt equally under the control of the commissioners as the personal estate, and empowered them to convey the same to the assignees for the benefit of the creditors, as effectually as the personal estate.

"The clause in that Statute is quoted at page 5 of the respondent's case, and after declaring in the 12th section that the effect of the commission of bankrupt should be to convey to the commissioners 'all the bankrupt's lands, tenements, and hereditaments, both within this realm and abroad,' it unequivocally proceeds, in the 64th section, to provide for the transference of all the bankrupt's lands, tenements, and hereditaments in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and in any of the dominions, colonies, and plantations of his Majesty.

"Both the real and personal estates of bankrupts were thus for the first time put on the same footing by the operation of law, and without the necessity of any circuitous or expensive forms.

"Such being the salutary provision made as to bankrupts in England, it is not surprising that a provision of a similar nature should have been subsequently introduced into the late Bankrupt Act for Scotland, and this has accordingly been done, as is shown by the enactment at page 10 of the case for the pursuer.

"The transference of real property is thus completed by its actual vesting in the assignees in England, and trustee in Scotland, by virtue of the act and declaration of the law.

"When the Legislature then thought fit to establish a new law for the relief of insolvent debtors from the imprisonment under which they laboured in England, the 1st and 2d of her Majesty, c. 110, under which this question arises, was passed.

"The sections referred to are at pages 6, 7, and 8 of defender's case.

"Now, one cannot think it at all surprising that as to the real estates, as well as the personal estates, of such insolvents as were to be relieved, similar enactments to these in the Bankrupt Act should be introduced; and accordingly it is seen that they are described in both Statutes in the precise same words as to their situation, viz., 'both within this realm and abroad'—these words in the Bankrupt Act being preceded by all the bankrupt's 'lands, tenements, and hereditaments,' and in the Insolvent Act by the words—'all the real and personal estate and effects of such prisoner.'

"Now, as the Bankrupt Act, in the 64th section, provides that the commissioners shall, by deed indented and enrolled in any of his Majesty's Courts of record, convey to the assignees for the benefit of the creditors (as had previously been vested in them), 'all lands, tenements, hereditaments, except customary or copyhold, in England, Scotland, Ireland, or in any of the dominions, plantations,' &c., we have here the express declaration of the Legislature itself, that by the use of the words 'this realm,' it held Scotland and Ireland to be included as well as England. Why, then, should a more limited interpretation be put on the words 'within this realm,' when used in the Insolvent Act, as to the real and personal estate of the prisoner vesting in his provisional assignee?

"The term realm is in the one Statute clearly used as applicable to the whole of the United Kingdom, and we can see no ground for holding that it is to be read in the other Statute as of a more limited import. The pursuer seems to contend that it includes neither Scotland nor Ireland in its use in the Insolvent Act; and, to be consistent, he must hold that Scotland is equally excluded by the words 'and abroad.'

"But it really appears that the 46th section of the Act, not to dwell on any more of it, is sufficient to show that Scotland was clearly held as included in the provisions contained in the 37th section, by the words 'within this realm,' as it is there expressly provided, that where, by any law now in force, any conveyance or assignment of any real or personal property of any insolvent debtor would be required to be registered, enrolled or recorded 'in any registry in England, Wales or Ireland, or in any registry-office, court, or other place in Scotland,' the certified copy or order under the Act 'shall be registered in the registry-office, court, or place wherein such conveyance or assignment, as last aforesaid, would require to be registered, enrolled or recorded.' It is no sufficient answer as to the effect of this clause to say, that registration in Scotland is inapplicable to a mere conveyance of real property. Registration is requisite in regard to sasines and other instruments connected with real estate in Scotland, and there is here an express recognition of the necessity of following out the system of registration applicable to an order as to real as well as personal property under the Act.

"Now, after this, to hold that this Statute did not at all comprehend or provide for the vesting in the assignees authorised by this Act of the real estate of an insolvent in Scotland, seems to be a proposition altogether untenable.

"Without dwelling more upon the matter, it appears to us that we have the declaration of the Statute itself, that it did mean to extend its operation in the above respect to Scotland,—as the provision as to the registration in the 46th section never otherwise could have been introduced,—and therefore the proviso in the 121st section, as to the Act not applying to Scotland, unless where 'it is expressly mentioned,' is in this particular quite inapplicable,—the term, this realm, being used as including the whole United Kingdom, of which Scotland is a part. It has already been seen that such is the clear meaning of the words 'this realm,' as occurring in the late English Bankrupt Act; and yet in that very Statute it is likewise provided in the 135th section, 'that it shall not extend to either Scotland or Ireland, except where the same are expressly mentioned.' But as in reference to the provision in the 12th section, that the persons appointed by the commission shall take order and direction of all the bankrupt's lands, tenements and hereditaments, 'both within this realm and abroad,' the 64th section afterwards expressly provides that these commissioners shall 'convey to the assignees, for the benefit of the creditors aforesaid, all lands, tenements and hereditaments (except copy or customary hold), in England, Scotland and Ireland,' &c., there cannot be a doubt that the clause as to the Act not extending either to Scotland or Ireland, except where the same are expressly mentioned, is quite inapplicable to the present question."

Lord Ivory:

"I have arrived at the same conclusion. It seems to me impossible to dispute (maintain?) that an enactment conceived in such broad terms as to include 'all the real and personal estate of the prisoner, both within this realm and abroad,' except such trifling articles as his wearing apparel, working tools, &c.,—and even these only to an extent 'not exceeding in whole the value of £20,'—should yet not reach the real estate of such prisoner situate in Scotland. It is no answer that the Statute is declared 'not to extend either to Scotland or Ireland, except where expressly mentioned.' It is conceded (pursuer's additional case, p. 10), that without expressly mentioning Scotland, Scotland would necessarily have been intended to be included under such general words as 'Great Britain,' or 'the United Kingdom.' But if so, the same necessity of construction must be equally operative to include Scotland, under the general words 'within this realm or abroad.' I am very clearly of opinion, that, as applied to both Ireland and Scotland, 'this realm' must here be interpreted as of identical meaning with 'the United Kingdom,' or 'the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.' And I can in no view adopt a reading of the Statute which would, contrary to its whole policy, and in the face, as it seems to me, of all common sense, allow even the insolvent himself (supposing the question were with him), on the one hand, to demand the privileges of the Statute, and on the other, to withhold from his creditors, it might be, the most valuable portion of his estate, merely because it happened to be situate in Scotland."

(Lord Jeffrey absent from indisposition.)

At finally disposing of the cause, Lord Medwyn and Lord Moncreiff expressed their adherence to their former opinions.

The Lord Justice-Clerk said he concurred with the opinion of the Lord Justice-General.

Lord Meadowbank returned the following written opinion:

"In this case I had the misfortune to differ from my two brethren, Lord Medwyn and Lord Moncreiff, when the case was advised by this Division, and had an opportunity then of stating fully the views which I entertained with regard to the Acts of Parliament in question. It is, therefore, unnecessary for me to say more at present than that I retain my former opinion, and concur entirely with the views of the consulted Judges."

The Court pronounced an interlocutor in terms of the opinions of the consulted Judges.

No. 159.—GEORGE BRECHIN, Advocate, v. WILLIAM TAYLOR, Respondent.

Cessio—Aliment—Act of Grace 1696—A party having petitioned for cessio, to which he was found entitled, on condition of assigning £5 of his wages for behoof of his creditors; and he having refused, was in consequence incarcerated on the warrant under which he petitioned. An application for aliment under the Act of Grace, or alternatively for liberation, refused.

The advocate is due to the respondent the sum of £20. 12. 7., besides expenses of process and dues of extract, as constituted by a decree of the Sheriff-substitute of Aberdeenshire, of date 8th July 1840. He raised in consequence a process of cessio bonorum, and when under examination, deposed, that he was a single man, and in the receipt of from £25 to £30 per annum, and board and lodging from his employer. In these circumstances, the Sheriff found him entitled to the benefit of cessio, on condition of his assigning £5 out of his wages for the benefit of his creditors. When this assignation was prepared and presented to him, he refused to sign it. In consequence, the respondent caused the warrant he had obtained, and which was that founded on by the advocate in his petition for cessio, to be put in force. The advocate was accordingly apprehended, and lodged in the jail of Aberdeen. Two days thereafter, he presented a petition for modification of aliment under the Act of Grace 1696, after considering which the Magistrates pronounced the following interlocutor:

"15th December 1841.—In respect it appears from the prisoner's deposition, that his imprisonment arises from his refusal to do an act ordained by a competent court, and which is within his power, refuses to modify an aliment to him in hoc statu."

(Signed) "JAMES FORBES, B."

The prisoner advocated, and pleaded—That in the circumstances stated, and the advocate not having been incarcerated for the non-performance of any obligation in the nature of factum prestandum, but simply for non-payment of a civil debt, there were no termini habiles in law, and no grounds in point of fact, on which an aliment ought to have been withheld from the advocate, and the cause ought instantly to be remitted to the Magistrates of Aberdeen, with instructions to modify such aliment as your Lordships shall deem reasonable, or otherwise to liberate the advocate from jail:—Smith v. Christie, 18th January 1776, Mor. Dict. of Dec., Vols. XXVII. and XXVIII., p. 11,816. Aitkin v. Gray, 27th May 1790, Mor. Dict. of Dec., Vols. XXVII. and XXVIII., p. 11,819. The Act of Grace. Geikie v. his Creditors, 9th February 1833, S. and D., Vol. XI., p. 372.

Pleaded for respondent—As the incarceration of the advocate does truly proceed from his refusal to obtemper the order of a competent court, pronounced in a process founded upon the warrant of his present imprisonment; and as it is still in his power to operate his release by complying with the said order, he is not entitled to the benefit or the provisions of the Act of Grace, nor has he any claim in law for aliment as against the respondent, nor failing such aliment, to be liberated from jail:—Turner v. Ross, 2d December 1709, Mor. Dict. of Dec., p. 11,802. Act of Grace. Glasswell v. Durham, 28th December 1710, Mor. Dict. of Dec. p. 7460.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

“3d March 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel for the parties, and thereafter made avizandum, and considered the cause, appoints the parties to print the note of advocacy, along with the reasons and answers; and when printed, appoints the same to be boxed to the Lords of the Second Division, in order that the same may be reported to the Court.

“Note.—The advocate Brechin, prisoner in the jail of Aberdeen, before he was imprisoned, raised a process of cessio bonorum before the Sheriff of Aberdeenshire. The Sheriff, on the 5th of August, found him entitled to the benefit of the cessio, on condition of his assigning £5 annually out of his wages to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors. When the assignation was presented to him he refused to sign it, and no further steps were taken by him in the process of cessio. The respondent then incarcerated Brechin, who presented a petition to the Magistrates of Aberdeen for aliment, under the Act of Grace 1696. The Magistrates of Aberdeen refused the aliment, on the ground that the advocate had refused to obey the order of a competent court, which was within his power. The advocate pleads that he is here incarcerated for a debt, and that, whether he is entitled to a cessio or not—and even supposing that he is denied the benefit of the cessio from misconduct—he is on the footing of a debtor not able to aliment himself; so that his misconduct in the cessio cannot operate against him in the proceedings under the Act of Grace, where he appears as a civil debtor. In support of that view, he has referred to the case of Geikie v. his Creditors, 9th February 1833, 11 S. and D. 372,—where the Court gave an addition to aliment under the Act of Grace to a party whose cessio was refused, on the ground that he was believed to be concealing his funds. There may be room, however, for a distinction between that case and the present, when there appears nothing to prevent the pursuer signing the assignation which had been ordered, whatever the effect of it may be.”

At advising, the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

“In respect that the incarcerating creditor states that he will liberate the advocate as soon as he signs the assignation prepared, and previously presented to him under the order of the Sheriff in the process of cessio, and that the debtor may obtain liberation from prison whenever he chooses, by complying with the said order of the Sheriff, Refuse the note of advocacy, remit the cause simpliciter to the Magistrates of Aberdeen, and decern.”

SECOND DIVISION.—(J. W.)

No. 160.—Mrs M. WEDDERBURN or HAWKINS and HUSBAND, and MANDATORY, Pursuers, v. Sir David WEDDERBURN and Others, Defenders.

Process—Lis Pendens—Foreign—Diligence—A party having instituted a suit in the Court of Chancery, which seemed the proper forum for the consideration of his claims, thereafter brought an action on the same claims, and against the same defendants, in the Court of Session, for the purpose of suing out diligence on the dependence against their property situated in Scotland—The Court repelled a preliminary defence founded on lis pendens, but appointed the pursuer to lodge a minute stating the progress made before the Master in Chancery, and what orders had been issued.

In the year 1796 the late Mr David Webster, Mr John Wedderburn, and the defender Sir David Wedderburn (then Mr David Wedderburn), entered into partnership in terms of a contract of copartnership. During the subsistence of the partnership, Mr Andrew Colville, one of the defenders (then Andrew Wedderburn), was conditionally, and to the effect of enabling him to sign the company firm, assumed a partner, but he was not to share in the profits or losses of the company.

David Webster died on 21st March 1801, leaving a will, appointing his wife and his two partners, Mr John Wedderburn and Sir David Wedderburn, his executors in trust.

In terms of the contract of copartnership, the representatives of Mr Webster were entitled to a share of the profits from the time of his death till May 1801. Thereafter the business was carried on by a variety of partners, under successive firms. These parties or their executors are the defenders in this action, and the pursuers are the children of Mr Webster, calling for a share of the profits of the business from their father's death down to the 1st May 1837.

On 21st February 1831, a suit in Chancery, as set forth in the summons, was instituted by the pursuers. The bill having been filed, an order was pronounced by the Master of the Rolls, and affirmed by the Lord Chancellor, directing the Master in Chancery to ascertain,—1. What was the value of Mr Webster's interest in the firm of Wedderburn, Webster and Company, on the 1st of May 1801, and, as incidental to that inquiry, to take an account of the previous transactions of that firm. 2. The amount of the profits made by the new and subsequent firms. 3. The sums paid or invested on account of David Webster's estate. 4. The capital employed by the partners in the new and subsequent firms. 5. The Master has certain powers given him, and amongst others the power of stating special circumstances relating to the matters aforesaid, and of making just allowances to the parties,—the latter involving many nice and important questions as to what the partners are entitled to for labour, and otherwise, affecting the amount of what (if any thing) is to be recovered by the plaintiffs.

Pending these proceedings each of the four children of Mr Webster raised an action in the Court of Session against the defenders, who are resident in Scotland, or are possessed of heritable estates there.

The summons sets forth, that the share of the profits effeiring to David Webster and his estate, from 1st May 1801 to 1st May 1837, amounted to about £462,076. 7s. 2d., and that the proportion of that sum belonging to the present pursuers, amounted to £97,279, or thereabouts, exclusive of periodical interest. And accordingly the pursuers concluded for payment "of the foresaid sum of £97,279. 4. 7., or such other sum, more or less, as shall, in the course of the process to follow hereon," be ascertained to be the amount of their share "and proportion of the gains and profits of the said business," (deducting £13,055. 7. 3. admitted to have been received by the pursuers), with interest of the balance since April 1837. The summons also concluded for payment "of the sum of £217,818. 7. 8., or such "farther and additional sum, less or more, as shall be ascertained, in the course of the process to follow hereon, to be the pursuers' share and proportion of the accumulated interest on the said profits," from 1st May 1801 to 1st May 1837.

When these actions, at the instance of the children of David Webster, were instituted in this Court against the present defenders, who were also defendants in the suit in Chancery, the latter presented an application in the Rolls Court to restrain the plaintiffs from suing such actions in the Courts in Scotland for the same claims. On hearing counsel on that application, the Master of the Rolls pronounced a judgment on 23d January 1840, whereby his Lordship granted the injunction required. The plaintiffs thereupon brought the matter before the Lord Chancellor, and gave notice of an alternative motion, viz., either that the injunction so granted by the Master of the Rolls should be discharged, or that the plaintiffs should be at liberty to carry on the suits in Scotland, for the purpose of compelling the defendants to give security for so much of the profits of the business as might be found due. The Lord Chancellor having heard the counsel for the parties on these motions, on the 4th of March 1840 pronounced a judgment, bearing that his Lordship

"doth not think fit to make any order as to that part of the notice of motion which seeks to discharge the order made by the Right Honourable the Master of the Rolls; but upon the rest of the motion, now made as an original motion to his Lordship, his Lordship doth order that the plaintiffs be at liberty to proceed in the suits or actions commenced by them in the Court of Session in Scotland, or take such other proceedings as they may be advised, so far only as may be necessary for the purpose of obtaining security, according to the practice of the Court of Session, for the forthcoming of the property of the defendants in Scotland, to answer the demand of what may be found due from the defendants under the decree in these causes."

In this state of matters, the defenders proposed in this suit the following preliminary defences:—1. As the present random claim of the pursuers is comprehended in the suit before the Court of Chancery in England, and is thus lis alibi pendens; and as there has been no decree pronounced in that Court for the sums sued for, and it has not been ascertained in any way, in that suit, or otherways, that all or any part of the sums sued for are owing to the pursuers, the present action ought to be dismissed. 2. That from the statement in the summons, it is apparent that the sole object of the action is to obtain letters of inhibition and arrestment against the defenders upon the dependence; and as this, in fact, would be to obtain these diligences upon an illiquid and random claim now depending before the Court of Chancery in England, which must be decided by the law of England, and over which action in England the Court of Session has not, and cannot have any control, the present action should be dismissed. 3. The present claim is barred by the accounting which took place between the pursuers and Mr Webster's executors,—by the discharge which the pursuers granted,—and by the lapse of time in bringing forward the present action.

The Lord Ordinary appointed revised cases, and thereafter pronounced the following interlocutor:

"20th March 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel on the preliminary defences, and thereafter considered the revised cases for the parties, and whole process.—In respect it is judicially stated for the pursuers that they only intend to insist in the present action for the purpose of suing out such diligence against the property of the defenders situated in Scotland, as is competent, by our law and practice, against the property of defenders in ordinary depending suits of admitted competency in our courts; and in respect that the pursuers have farther stated that they do not propose that the defenders shall be subjected to the discussion of the merits of the claims against them in this Court, as well as in the Court of Chancery at the same time, but are willing that the present case shall be sisted till the amount of the pursuers' claims is ascertained by the Court of Chancery, before which they were first brought, and which seems the proper forum for the consideration of the said claims on their merits.—Repels the first and second preliminary defences stated against the competency of the action founded on the lis pendens in the Court of Chancery; and sustains the competency of the action as urged, in hoc statu, to the limited effect, and for the special purpose before set forth; and reserves the other preliminary defences, as involved in the merits, and requiring probation, to be discussed along with the merits, if these shall be afterwards competently investigated in this Court;—but, quoad ultra, sists process for six months, in order to afford time to the parties to bring the proceedings relative to the claims libelled on to an issue in the Court of Chancery; and farther, reserves to the defenders, in case of any diligence being used on the dependence of this action to an excessive and unreasonable extent, to apply to the Lord Ordinary or the Court for a recal or restriction of the same in terms of law, and to the pursuers their answer to such application if made, as accords of law; and in respect the defenders do not intend to acquiesce in this interlocutor, finds them liable in the expense of discussing the preliminary defences, in terms of the Statute, as the same may be taxed by the auditor, and decerns.

"Note.—This is a question of great importance both to the parties and to the law. But it is thought that the authorities, both earlier and later, predominate greatly in favour of the competency of the action, when raised under the circumstances and to the effect to which the pursuers at present propose to limit their proceedings in this Court.

"From the numerous transactions which commerce gives rise to among the members of different states, it is a question which has long been the subject of consideration, whether the dependence of a suit in one country ought to prevent a creditor from taking such steps in another, as are necessary to secure the property of the alleged debtor for the ultimate payment of the debt. The decided tendency of the decisions in our law, from the earliest period, has been to admit of such actions, to enable the creditor to attach the debtor's property within our jurisdiction.

"In the first place, the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court over foreigners, when they possess such property within Scotland, has been long admitted in cases which, but for that property, there would have been no forum competens in this country to support the jurisdiction of the Scotch Court.—See the case of Galbraith in 1626 (p. 4813, Dict.), and of Haldane against the York Buildings Company in 1724 (Dict., p. 4818).

"The only question then is, if this undeniable right of a creditor to attach his debtor's property when situated in this country, is affected by the consideration that the claim is already the subject of litigation in the forum of the debtor's residence, or of the place where the debt was contracted. Here also the weight of the authorities in our law appears long to have sanctioned actions, the avowed object of which is to attach the property of debtors, notwithstanding the dependence of suits in other countries.—See the cases of Vanlovan in 1651, and of Cornel Cunningham in 1705, reported in the Dictionary under 'Lis alibi,' p. 525-56. Indeed all the cases reported under this title are adverse to the objection of lis alibi, with the exception of the case Gordon v. Elliot in 1715, where the whole sum in dispute was actually consigned in the court abroad; and the case of Blackstock, reported in Mr Brown's Supplement (5 Supp., 508), where the defender, before being cited in Scotland, had found caution in the court abroad, which of course was the only legitimate object of a second suit in this country. It is thought that, on principle, both of these precedents rather aid than oppose the plea of the pursuers in the particular circumstances of this case, as it is manifest that the Court, if they had not dismissed the actions, would have recalled any diligence used on the dependence as nimious and oppressive. Hence there was no purpose or use in entertaining the action as a ground for new attachment, which the Court would have abrogated the moment they were laid on.

"The later cases, however, of M'Master in 1834 (12 Shaw, 731), and Munro v. Graham in 1839 (1 Danlop and Bell, p. 1192), seem to fix the competency of actions brought for the purpose avowed in the present instance, in a manner hardly admitting of question in any subsequent case. In Graham's case, Lord Moncreiff expressly found, 'that it is not incompetent for the pursuer to raise and insist in this action, to the effect of obtaining security over property situated in this country;' and that finding was adhered to by the Court. No doubt the defenders refer to certain expressions in the Lord Ordinary's note, to show that he laid some stress on the circumstance that the defender Graham had not appeared in the Court of Chancery, and therefore, as he had not submitted to the jurisdiction of any other court, that he might be amenable in Scotland, where he had property. It is supposed, however, that his Lordship's meaning in that passage of his opinion was, that the defender, not having pleaded to the merits in the Court of Chancery, might be compelled to state such pleas here, if he meant to resist decree. But that is not proposed in the present case. Here the defenders are not required to plead to the merits; but this case is to wait the issue of the pending suit in Chancery; and the case of Graham is of importance to show that a suit brought for the sole purpose of commencing an attachment of property in Scotland, was found relevant by the Court in the recent case now referred to.

"Farther, the proceedings of the Court in the case of M'Master in 1834 are equally decisive in this question. There a party began by bringing an action in this Court on a claim which ought to have been previously constituted in England as the proper forum for trying the claim, and the Court here sisted proceedings till the pursuer filed his bill in Chancery, and obtained a judgment there. In that instance the suits in both countries were entertained at the same time under the direction of this Court itself, though proceedings in Scotland were superseded till the issue of the English suit. How then can the Court be now asked to dismiss the pursuers' action, merely because they have taken the very course recommended in that late and well-considered precedent, and begun their proceedings by a suit in the English Court?

"It is obvious to remark, that from the course followed both in M'Master's case and in Munro's, the main objection is removed on which the plea of lis alibi pendens is founded. This rests chiefly on the hardship of compelling defenders to incur the expense of entering appearance, and meeting their adversaries in two courts at the same time. When an action, brought, however, solely to attach property situated in any other country than the proper forum of the parties, is sisted till the case is discussed in the primary jurisdiction to which the parties are subject, the defender suffers no hardship beyond that to which every party is exposed who is subjected to prohibitory diligence for a depending claim. The defenders, however, plead, that from the limited effect to which the pursuers are allowed by the Court of Chancery to insist in the present action, from the terms of the summons, they would be exposed to diligence of a very severe and oppressive nature, if any were allowed to issue upon it as a depending suit, because the Court is prevented from entering into the merits of the case, so as to enable them to determine, as they do in other cases of diligence and on depending claims, how far there is ground for recalling or restricting the diligence. But the Lord Ordinary certainly does not understand that there is any such limitation in the power of the Court as that which the defenders allege. Holding this as an action brought to enable the pursuers to get the security of the defenders' property in Scotland for their ultimate claims, there is nothing in the orders or opinions of the Court of Chancery, as communicated by the parties, to show that the Court here is to be restrained from looking into the proceedings and grounds of the pursuers' claims, to enable them to judge to what extent the defenders shall find security to enable them to get that attachment ad interim relaxed, according to the uniform law and practice of Scotland. Nay, it is thought that cases might even occur where this Court might render it imperative on a pursuer to show, by the report of a Master, or of the proper officer in Chancery, to what extent the claims of the pursuer had been as yet ascertained or rejected. In this view, both Courts co-operate with each other in securing the just rights of litigants in a reasonable manner, which is manifestly an object of high concern in the administration of justice in both countries. It is plain from the report given of what passed in the Court of Chancery, that the noble and learned Judges in that Court saw no incompatibility in the proceeding which the pursuer is now adopting in Scotland, if competent under our laws; and the Lord Ordinary is humbly of opinion that it is maintainable on legal grounds which have long received effect in Scotland.

"With reference to the separate pleadings lodged in the name of Sir David Wedderburn, and of the executors of John Wedderburn, it is only necessary to observe, that they appear to have been made parties to the action in Scotland because their constituent's estate is interested in the issue. They are defendants in the English suit; and if they had not been called in this action, a dilatory plea might have been urged, that all having interest were not cited. It does not appear, however, that any diligence is proposed to be used against them; and if any attachment should be used against the individual estates of executors for what is due by them solely in their official capacity, it would be competent to the Court to recall it. But it is obvious that the pursuers' claim, both under the bill in Chancery and in the present action, is laid against Messrs Colville and Seton, as partners of the later concerns of Wedderburn and Company, and Wedderburn, Colville and Company; and so individually responsible to the pursuers in a large part of the balance claimed, if it shall ever be substantiated. It is probably for that branch of the pursuers' claims only that any diligence has been, or will be raised against the property of these gentlemen in this country, on the dependence of the present action. That, however, is an ulterior inquiry which cannot affect the preliminary question now under consideration."

The defenders reclaimed. At advising on 20th July 1841, the Court were equally divided in opinion,—Lord Moncreiff and Lord Meadowbank were for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, while the Lord Justice-Clerk (Boyle) and Lord Medwyn were of a contrary opinion. In consequence of this result, the case was disposed of by the following interlocutor:

"The Lords appoint the papers to be laid before the Lords of the First Division and the permanent Lords Ordinary for their opinions, whether the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against should be adhered to or not."

The following opinions were returned:
Lord President (Boyle) and Lord Gillies:

"We consider the question that is raised in this case, and decided by the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, to be one of very considerable importance in this department of the law; and as our views do not coincide with those of the Lord Ordinary, we shall state shortly the opinion we have formed upon the case.

"It appears from the narrative of the summons in this case, that the pursuers, along with certain others, the near relatives of Mrs Hawkins, in February 1831 commenced proceedings in the Court of Chancery in England against the present defenders, and also John Wedderburn, and James Wedderburn, now deceased, for whom the defenders now act as executors, by bill of complaint, concluding that the pursuers, as children of the deceased David Webster, were entitled to participate in the profits made by carrying on partnership business since his death, and that an account should be taken of all that was due to them in consequence thereof, in any manner of way; and that if necessary an account should also be taken of the personal estate of John Wedderburn (the first), that had come into the possession of J. Wedderburn, Andrew Colville, and Alexander Seton, as his executors. James Wedderburn having afterwards died, bills of revivor were afterwards filed in the said Court against Andrew Colville and Alexander Seton as his administrators. Appearance having been made in Chancery for the defenders, in answer to the several bills filed against them, as alleged principal debtors, and also as executors of their respective constituents, an order was made in 1836, by the Master of the Rolls, directing one of the Masters in Chancery to take an account, as required by the said bills, in the manner that is set forth in the summons. This order having been appealed from, the Lord Chancellor, on the 9th of November 1838, dismissed the appeal, thereby determining, as the summons bears, or at least strongly indicating, that the children of the said David Webster are entitled to participate, under the circumstances set forth, in the gains and profits made by carrying on the foresaid partnership business since the death of the said David Webster, according to his share, and the proportions falling to his children by virtue of his will.

"Before, however, any step was taken before the Master in Chancery, under the order made for an account by the Master of the Rolls, the pursuers instituted their action under the present summons, the terms of which are before the Court: while three similar actions were raised by others interested in the succession of David Webster, against the several defenders,—some as directly liable, both as principals and as executors, and others in their capacity as executors alone for others who are now deceased,—concluding for the enormous sums that are set forth as due, less or more, and with interest to the extent of no less than £217,818. 7. 8.

"These conclusions are preceded by the statement, that the defenders have lands, heritages, and other property, heritable and moveable, within Scotland, and reside therein, at least are subject to the jurisdiction of the Scottish Courts and to the executorial of the law within Scotland: And therefore 'necessary it is for the pursuers, and the pursuers are entitled to have them convened before the Lords of our Council and Session in Scotland, in order to have decree against them, to the effect, and in the terms underwritten, so that the pursuers may operate payment of the said sum against the said defenders and their said estates within Scotland.' But it is particularly to be observed, that the conclusion, in consequence of an amendment of the summons, is not made to depend on any decree to be pronounced in the Court of Chancery, but is for the direct payment of the sums to be found due here.

"Upon this, and the other actions being instituted in this Court, the defenders applied for an injunction to restrain the pursuers from proceeding with them, and thus carrying on litigation both here and in England for the same alleged debt; upon which application it appears that the Master of the Rolls, on the 23d January 1840, ordered that the pursuers 'be restrained by the order of this Court from prosecuting or carrying on the four several suits or actions commenced by them respectively in the Court of Session in Scotland' against the defendants, Andrew Colville, &c., to recover the respective shares claimed by the said petitioners respectively, in the profits of the trade or business carried on by the successive partnership firms of Wedderburn and Company, Wedderburn, Colville, and Company, Colville, Wedderburn and Company, and Colville and Company, mentioned in the decree in this cause, bearing date the 5th day of November 1836, and by the partners constituting those firms respectively; and it is ordered that the said petitioners, and each of them, be also restrained by the order of this Court from commencing or prosecuting any other suit or proceeding in the said Court of Session, or other Court in Scotland, to recover the said shares of profits so claimed by them respectively, or otherwise touching or concerning the matters in question in this cause, until the further orders of this Court,' &c. This order was followed by an award of costs to the defenders.

"This order for injunction by the Master of the Rolls was submitted to the review of the Lord Chancellor, as appears from his order of 4th March 1840; and accompanied at the same time by an application for liberty to insist in Scotland in the suits there depending, to the effect of obtaining security for the sums sued for, according to what it appears had been alleged to be the practice of the Scottish Courts. The order pronounced on that motion bears, that 'his Lordship doth not think fit to make any order as to that part of the notice of motion which seeks to discharge the order (injunction) made by the Right Honourable the Master of the Rolls; but upon the rest of the motion now made, as an original motion to his Lordship, his Lordship doth order that the petitioners be at liberty to proceed in the suits or actions commenced by them in the Court of Session in Scotland, or take such other proceedings as they may be advised, so far only as may be necessary for the purpose of obtaining security, according to the practice of the Court of Session, for the forthcoming of the property of the defendants in Scotland, to answer the demand of what may be found due from the defendants under the decree in these causes.'

"So standing matters in England, and the Master in Chancery being left to proceed in taking the account that had been ordered in the suit there depending, for the purpose of ascertaining what may be truly due, with the view of adopting certain measures in security of their debt, by inhibition and arrestment against the defenders, the pursuers moved in the present action, when the Lord Ordinary pronounced the interlocutor now under review.

"Before adverting to the preliminary defences that have been so far repelled by the Lord Ordinary, it is necessary to observe, that there is an objection, altogether different, which applies to a considerable part of the present summons; viz., in so far as it concludes against all or any of the defenders, as executors of deceased individuals, to whose estates letters of administration were taken out in England, or in the courts of which country these executors were necessarily bound to account. It has been ruled by the decisions in the cases of Palmer and others, that executors under similar circumstances must be called to account in the courts of law in England, and that Scotland is not the proper forum in which English executors can be sued; and, if this is settled law, it surely is not to be understood that persons so situated can be made amenable to the jurisdiction of a Scottish court to any effect whatever, in connection with supposed claims against them as executors, when they are already defending themselves against the very same claims in the proper court in England. But this objection, in so far as applicable to the present action, does not seem to have been at all attended to in the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, though it appears certainly to be deserving of special attention.

"Keeping however in view the terms of the present summons, which concludes directly against the defenders as liable to account for and pay the large sums of money therein set forth, and which does not make their liability at all to depend upon what sum may ultimately be found due by them in the present depending suit in Chancery, it seems quite impossible to deny that there here exists a manifest appearance at least of his alibi pendens. The hardship, therefore, that would be imposed upon the defenders, in being obliged to oppose the pursuers both here and in Chancery at one and the same time, is too manifest to require any discussion. It was at once, accordingly, acknowledged by the Master of the Rolls, who did not hesitate to grant his injunction against the pursuers proceeding with their litigation in this Court at the same time that they were insisting in Chancery, and where regular appearance had been made for all the defenders. The present is not, therefore, the case of a party refusing to submit himself to the jurisdiction of the proper Court in England, or withdrawing himself from the operation of its decrees, and not leaving sufficient funds within its territory to answer for the debt claimed against him; in which circumstances it has been found, by the recent decision of Munro v. Graham, 4th July 1839, that action might be instituted against him in Scotland, where he held a landed estate. All that occurs in the present case is, that the defenders in this Court, who are resisting as defendants the pursuers' suit in Chancery, are proprietors of landed estates and funds, and have their residence in Scotland; but this surely of itself cannot be viewed as sufficient to deprive them of the benefit of the ordinary defence that is available to all litigants whatever. But in addition to that plea, of the hardship of being involved in a double litigation, the defenders also found upon the special terms of an existing injunction in Chancery, restraining the pursuers from prosecuting or carrying on the several suits commenced by them against the defenders, or commencing or prosecuting any other suit or proceeding in the Court of Session, or any other Court in Scotland, to recover the said share of profits. It seems impossible, therefore, that they can obtain any effectual decree in those suits under the existing summonses, which conclude directly for recovery of the sums sued for. The merits of the claims under them cannot be ascertained, nor can any investigation in regard to the extent of their claims be carried on.

"It is no doubt true, that on application to the Lord Chancellor he was pleased to grant leave in the terms which have already been referred to. But although he certainly did thereby authorise the plaintiffs before him to avail themselves of those actions which they had already instituted in this Court, or of such other proceedings as they might be advised, as far only as may be necessary for the purpose of obtaining security, according to the practice of the Court of Session, for the forthcoming of the property of the defendants in Scotland, to answer the demand of what may be found due from the defendants under the decree in these causes,—yet his Lordship clearly meant that the leave so granted should be exercised only according to the practice of this Court. He must have been informed that it was conformable to our practice under the dependence of regular actions, for the pursuers to take measures for the security of such sums as might ultimately be decreed for; and under this impression alone, it is to be presumed that he granted the liberty in question. He never meant by his order, however, to give authority for the adoption of any measures for the purpose of obtaining any security that the practice of the Court of Session did not recognise as competent,—neither did the Lord Chancellor in the least degree mean to deprive the defenders of any plea competent to them, or as arising out of the frame and structure of the summonses that had been instituted in this Court.

"The competency, therefore, of the proceedings of the pursuers, and which have so far been sanctioned by the judgment of the Lord Ordinary in sisting procedure for six months, but permitting thereby in the meantime the use of the diligence of inhibition and arrestment against the defenders, stands altogether unaffected by the liberty granted under the order of the Lord Chancellor.

"While the defenders are made regular parties to the proceedings in Chancery, which must be admitted to be the proper Court for investigating such a case as the present, and are there actually defending themselves, and remain amenable to its jurisdiction, and while it cannot be denied that litigation on the merits of the action cannot proceed here, nor any proceedings in fact adopted towards investigating what is truly due, it does appear not a little extraordinary that the pursuers should be entitled to adopt the same measures, in security of their alleged claims, that are competent to the pursuers of actions liable to no such objection as can prevent their obtaining a direct decree. No statement has been made that any measure of a similar nature would be competent in England, with regard to security over either the real or personal estate of the defender in a depending action in Scotland, against whom a suit of a similar nature was attempted to be carried on in the former country. No case in this country has been pointed out at all similar to the present, as neither the case of M'Master, nor the recent one of Munro can be viewed as truly of the same nature. In the case of M'Master v. Stewarts, the action was for implement of an English will, under which the defenders in this country had administered in England, and as the will permitted others who had declined to act to file a bill in Chancery, and both parties had bills depending there, the proceeding here for accounting for intromissions was instituted and allowed. The nature of the case of Munro v. Graham has already been noticed. If the present pursuers, however, are allowed to inhibit and arrest on the dependence of the actions that they have raised in this Court, but in which they cannot obtain decree, for the very same enormous sums they are now demanding in their depending suit in Chancery, and where the defenders at this moment are litigating with them, we apprehend that the same sort of proceedings to obtain security, may be resorted to by every party that has instituted in a foreign country an action to any amount against any one possessed of landed property in Scotland. The consequences of establishing such a rule of practice are certainly deserving of serious attention, as it will be sanctioning the doing indirectly, what cannot be obtained directly, namely, to procure security for a claim depending in another country.

"We are aware that the defence of lis pendens in any of the Courts in England has, in several instances, not been sustained. But still, it is a defence which appears to be founded on strong principles of equity and expediency; and accordingly it would appear, that in this cause effect was given to it, first by the Master of the Rolls, and then, to a certain extent, by the Lord Chancellor, who ordered 'that the petitioners be at liberty to proceed in the suits or actions commenced by them in the Court of Session in Scotland, or take such other proceedings as they may be advised, so far only as may be necessary for the purpose of obtaining security according to the practice of the Court of Session, for the forthcoming of the property of the defendants in Scotland, to answer the demand of what may be found due by the defendants under the decree in these causes.'

"All possible respect is due to the opinion of the Lord Chancellor; but a question is raised, whether the qualified permission here given by his Lordship is, in the peculiar circumstances of this case, according to the practice of the Court of Session, or consistent with the principles of the law of Scotland, by which diligence of this sort is regulated or allowed.

"By the law of Scotland a person is entitled, merely by raising and executing a summons, to use inhibition and arrestment against his alleged debtor. This is a great privilege, and one, so far as we are aware, peculiar to the law of Scotland. In the general case, a pursuer's object in bringing his action is to constitute and obtain a decree for payment of his alleged debt against his debtor; and to make that decree effectual, he is allowed, on the dependence, to use his diligence. His primary as well as his principal object, is to obtain decree; and while he is seeking that, the use of diligence is allowed him. But matters are here in a manner reversed. His diligence is the primary object, and he raises the action, not with the view of getting or of seeking a decree, but solely, in the meantime, to create a dependence, which may be the foundation of diligence. We believe that no instance of such a case is to be found in our law books, and that no precedent or practice can be pointed out of such a proceeding.

"The use of this diligence is a Scottish privilege, and allowed only to suitors in Scottish Courts,—to one who undertakes to establish his claim in a Scottish Court. But here the pursuer does not at present undertake, or offer to establish his claim here. It is to be established in an English Court, and there only. In effect, this is bestowing on an English suitor the privilege of a Scotch suitor.

"The only object on which he can at present insist, is to obtain a decree of a foreign court, and in Scotland, his only object at present is to create a dependence. We should say that this was not a legitimate object. What is the evil to be obviated, or what is the benefit meant to be bestowed on the creditor, by allowing him the use of diligence on a dependence? It is to afford him immediate security while he is proceeding to establish his claim in a Scotch Court, but not while he is proceeding to establish it in a foreign court. This may lengthen and increase greatly the hardship of the debtor in such a case.

"In this case the pursuer, so far from insisting in his claim and offering to establish it in the Scotch Courts, asks, on the contrary, that process shall be sisted. He virtually admits that he is not now in a situation to establish his claim in this Court, where he desires that proceedings may be stopped. But observe, that during the stoppage of proceedings, the unfortunate debtor is subjected to that diligence which the law authorised only on the supposition that its commencement and termination were to be regulated by a litigation in Scotland. If the process is sisted, there is substantially and in truth no litigation, or, we may say, no proper dependence in Scotland—at least, none such as the law contemplated when it authorised diligence of this sort.

"The long endurance of the diligence, which a depending action authorises against him, may be a grievous hardship on the debtor. Against this our law affords him some protection. After a summons has been executed, the pursuer may use his diligence; but the defender by protestation can compel him to go on with his action. Again, when the action comes into Court, the defender, as well as the pursuer, is entitled to enrol it, and to insist that the pursuer shall proceed with the action with all due dispatch. Of all those remedies or means of protection the debtor may be deprived, if the endurance of this diligence is to be regulated, not by a Scotch Court, but by the Court of a foreign country. This foreign country may be England, as in this case. But the same would hold if suit was raised in any other foreign state. A pursuer may bring an action concluding for £200,000 in Madrid or Vienna—founded on transactions which took place in Spain or Austria, and then he may bring his action for this sum in Scotland; in which he cannot and does not attempt to establish his claim, but brings it merely to create a dependence which entitles him to use diligence. He acknowledges that it is only by establishing his claim abroad that he can establish it here, and the extent and endurance of the Scots diligence must therefore be regulated by a foreign court.

"That such proceedings as the present may lead to the greatest oppression in many cases, is perfectly obvious. For although it is no doubt competent for the Court, in regard to the diligence of inhibition and arrestment, to recal or limit their extent when used oppressively on actions regularly depending before it, the nature and probable amount of their conclusions being easily brought under notice, and even ascertained with tolerable exactness, yet no such satisfaction can be obtained in such a case as the present, or in one that may relate to a suit depending in a more distant foreign country against a native of Scotland. To obviate the injurious consequences of the use of inhibition and arrestment in such cases, it would at least be advisable to adopt universally the rule that was followed in the Bargany case, and also in the late case with regard to the sale of the estate of Barra, by requiring the user of the diligence to find full security to answer for all the damages that might arise from their use of the diligence. To whatever extent the pursuers in the present case may think proper to push the use of their diligence in security, there seems no mode in which the Court, in the event of an application by the defenders for its restriction, can obtain anything like satisfactory information as to the real nature or amount of the pursuers' demand; no investigation whatever as to the extent of the alleged profits of the various London companies can take place here, as all the requisite documents must be before the Master in Chancery; and this Court can receive no information even as to the progress that the Master is making in framing the account he has been ordered to prepare.

"In whatever aspect, therefore, we view this case, it appears, that by sisting the action even for a limited time, while the pursuers are permitted to resort to the use of diligence in security of their alleged claim, that is going far beyond what has ever been sanctioned by the Court in any former case, and, therefore, we cannot accede to the interlocutor submitted to review."

Lord Mackenzie, concurred in by Lords Fullerton, Cockburn, Cunningham, Murray and Ivory:

"The ordinary and strict rule requiring the dismissal of an action on the ground of lis alibi pendens, which is stated by Lord Stair, appears to us to be limited to cases where the same action is pendent in another Court within the same country. It rests on the reasons, not only that a double litigation on the same claim is vexatious, but that it would be wrong to allow double decrees to be obtained, each constituting res judicata, and which must be either two decrees to do the same thing only once, and so one of them utterly useless, or must be cumulative, to do it twice over, or contradictory and discordant, which would be oppressive, or leading to confusion. But these cases are not applicable in the case of a previous action depending in a foreign court, where the decree obtained is not res judicata in this country, and may not at all, or not satisfactorily answer the purpose of a decision in this country,—the foreign decree extending over the foreign country, the home decree over the home country only, and the legal means and actual facilities of enforcing decrees being different in different countries. Accordingly, there seems no authority for holding that the ordinary rule of lis alibi pendens applies strictly to cases where the previous lis is pendent in a foreign court.

"But though the original and strict rule of lis alibi pendens may not so apply, nevertheless, there seems to be no doubt that in cases of lis alibi pendens, even in a foreign court, it is competent for the court in this country to consider the effect of that circumstance, and if it be such as in reason and equity to require the dismissal, or the sisting, or modification of the action raised here to give it such effect. This again appears to be not only consistent with legal principle, but to be clearly established by the cases referred to by the pursuers as well as the defenders, and by various other cases.

"In this case, then, the existence of lis pendens in the Court of Chancery in England is not denied. And per contra, the existence of jurisdiction generally over the defenders in the courts of this country is not denied.

"Under these circumstances, the present summons is raised in this Court, containing conclusions against the defenders of two distinct kinds—1. Personally: 2. As executors.

"1. Now in regard to the action, in so far as it is an action in this Court against the defenders personally, there seems prima facie no room for doubt, that if, in favour of the defenders, proceedings be sisted until the issue of the suit in the English Court, that is the utmost the defenders can ask. For by that the defenders are entirely relieved from the hardship of double discussion, or discussion in the Court least qualified to investigate the facts and law of the case; and the only effect of sustaining process with such a sist is, that after decree shall be pronounced in England, the action here will then be more speedy than if it had to be raised de novo, and legal, and just diligence in this country for due execution of judgment in the case will be better had. Abstracting, therefore, from the specialities of this case, alleged to have arisen in the course of the proceedings in Chancery, there seems no room to doubt that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary sustaining the action, but sisting proceedings, is right, in reference to the claim against the defenders personally. Supposing nothing appeared here, but that there was a previous suit in the English Chancery on the same personal claim, there seems no room for doubt, that the action here must be sustained, though the process might be sisted, as has been done in various cases.

"But it is said there is a specialty here, which requires immediate dismissal of the action in this Court. The specialty is alleged to be, that the pursuers stand prohibited by the Court of Chancery from legal proceedings in Scotland, under a limited exception, 'that the plaintiffs be at liberty to proceed in the suits or actions commenced by them in the Court of Session in Scotland, or take such other proceedings as they may be advised, so far only as may be necessary for the purpose of obtaining security, according to the practice of the Court of Session, for the forthcoming of the property of the defendants in Scotland, to answer the demand of what may be found due from the defendants under the decree in these causes.' The effect of this is said to be, that the Scotch proceedings are converted into a mere form for attaching to an English suit in Chancery the diligence of the Scotch law by arrestment and inhibition on depending actions. And this, it is said, would be dangerous, because the Scotch Courts have no power over foreign actions, and cannot force them on, or dismiss them, or limit them, whatever may be the conduct of the pursuers; so that this kind of diligence might be kept up to an extent and duration that would be oppressive. And, it is added, that as England is in this respect a foreign country, the same rule must apply to all foreign suits, and expose the lieges of Scotland to arrestment and inhibition without limit, at the instance of all who choose to raise action in a foreign court. Now, I do not see the force of this objection. It seems to me that the effect of the Lord Chancellor's order is not to create any limitation that would not have existed without it, provided we thought, in the circumstances of the case, that the process in this Court ought to be sisted in favour of the defenders until the issue of the suit in Chancery. The effect of such a sist, obtained by the defenders, is precisely to allow such proceedings by the pursuer "as may be necessary for the purpose of obtaining security, according to the practice of the Court of Session, for the forthcoming of the property of the defendants in Scotland, to answer the demand of what may be found due from the defendants under the decree in these causes." The obtaining a sist until the decree in Chancery shall be pronounced, and so keeping up the Scotch action for the purpose of arrestment, inhibition on the dependence, and of decree in Scotland, agreeably to the Chancery decree after it shall be pronounced, is the very thing the Lord Chancellor has allowed to the pursuers. Why, therefore, shall proceedings become incompetent or objectionable here, because they are excepted from a prohibition, which would have been competent if never prohibited?

"But it is said, that under this Chancery injunction, the Court here have no power over the action before themselves. But that is a mistake. The Chancery prohibition is in favour of the defenders only, and binds only the pursuers. The defenders are not barred from craving a recal of the injunction in Chancery granted on their motion, nor barred from craving a recal of the sist which stands in their favour, if they can show any good grounds for the process in this Court going on. It may be difficult for them to do this last; but the difficulty does not arise from the injunction of the Court of Chancery on the pursuers. It arises simply from the fact, that there exists a suit on the same matter between the same parties in another court, much better able to investigate the law and facts of the case. That may entitle the pursuers, as well as the defenders, to maintain the sist. But the mere injunction on the pursuers in favour of the defenders, cannot give the pursuers such right to any extent they would not have possessed without it.

"As to the danger of oppression from the Scotch diligence of arrestment and inhibition proceeding on foreign actions, because these actions are not under the control of our Courts, if that be a good argument, it must warrant the absolute dismissal of all actions in Scotland where there is a lis alibi pendens in a foreign Court, which cannot be disregarded altogether in our Scotch proceedings. For in no case is the foreign action under the control of Scotch Courts; and in all cases arrestment and inhibition may be used in Scotch depending actions. So it would follow, that wherever there was a lis alibi pendens in foreign countries, including England and Ireland, Scotch action on the matter must be absolutely dismissed, unless the foreign action can be disregarded altogether as if not existing. But that seems too much to be maintained. The answer is—(1.) That though there is not in the Scotch Court any control over the foreign action, there is control over the Scotch action, which may be continued under sist, or dismissed, or proceeded in, or modified according to what appears to be the circumstances of the case, either in relation to the state of the foreign action, or any other circumstance appearing. (2.) The Court has power over the diligence of arrestment and inhibition, and may recal or limit these according to equity, on any circumstances appearing to require it; and that, not upon exact evidence, but upon such probable evidence as the state of the case affords. And in estimating that, it is easy to make allowance for the circumstance, that the primary suit is in a foreign Court, and to lighten so far the onus on the party showing grounds for recal, or modification of arrestment, or inhibition. This equitable and discretionary power of the Court alone makes such diligence on the dependence tolerable, in cases of simple Scotch actions. For it is generally impossible to get rid of, or limit this diligence, though excessive, by any thing that can be done in the action. Relief is sought from excessive diligence by a distinct application, directly applicable to the arrestment or inhibition itself, without interfering with the action, and supported by nothing more than the exhibition of probable grounds for thinking that more is claimed in the depending action than is likely to be decerned for. And surely the equitable powers of this Court to restrain excessive arrestment and inhibition on depending actions, may be better exercised by inquiring into the circumstances of each case, whether there be a lis pendens in a foreign court or not, than by attempting a sweeping rule, that wherever there is a lis pendens in a foreign court, which cannot be entirely disregarded, the Scotch action must be wholly dismissed in order to prevent the abuse of arrestment and inhibition. Accordingly, there is no one instance referred to of dismissal of an action in Scotland on such ground, though there have not wanted cases in which foreign lis alibi pendens could not be, and was not disregarded, producing, on the contrary, a sist of the Scotch proceedings. I therefore think, that in regard to the personal conclusions of the action, the interlocutor is right. I may perhaps remark, that in form, I should rather omit the limitation of the sist to six months, and leave it indefinite as to time, standing good till recalled, and only till recalled. But that is not of much moment.

"II. In so far as the defenders are concluded against as executors, if we are to follow the precedents of the cases of Brown's Trustees v. Palmer, 17th December 1830; and Dickson v. M'Master, 7th June 1833, the action here ought to be dismissed immediately. But, on the other hand, in the case of M'Master, 17th June 1834, the plan of sisting the action was adopted on the ratio stated by Lord Corehouse, the Ordinary, that it was 'imperative that this process should be sisted until the accounting in Chancery is brought to a close. It is possible that the aid of this Court may be afterwards required to enforce the execution of the decree.' Considering that in this case the Court of Chancery in England have given leave to the pursuers to sue in the Courts of Scotland, for the purpose of securing execution of the judgment, when it shall be obtained, without making any exception of the action in so far as it is brought against executors, I think Lord Corehouse's conjecture is one that we cannot venture to reject; and I am therefore, in reference to this part of the action also, for adhering to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary sisting procedure. But in regard to this part of the action, if arrestment or inhibition be used, the recal or limitation of them may probably not be very difficult, unless there be something unusual in the situation of the executors."

(Lord Jeffrey absent from indisposition.)

At advising of this date,

Lord Meadowbank.—"When this case was formerly before the Court, I concurred in opinion with the Lord Ordinary. It is therefore sufficient for me to state at present, that I remain of the same opinion, and coincide in the views taken by Lord Mackenzie and the majority of the consulted Judges."

The Lord Justice-Clerk (Hope) stated, that he concurred with the majority of the Judges.

Lord Moncreiff likewise concurred with the consulted Judges.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"In respect of the opinions of the whole Court, Adhere to the interlocutor submitted to review, and refuse the desire of the reclaiming note, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to call on the pursuers to state in a minute, to be lodged within such time as his Lordship shall appoint, what progress has been made before the Master in Chancery, and what orders, if any, have been issued by him: Find the defenders liable in additional expenses, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to decern for the same."

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 161.—MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN M'INNES (Macalister's Trustee), Raiser, v. MACALISTERS, Claimants.

Testament—Succession—Destination—Entail—A father bequeathed to his two natural daughters two separate sums, to be accumulated for their behoof till they were twenty years of age. Failing either of them without lawful male heirs, the other was to take her fortune; and failing both without lawful male heirs, the whole was to go to one, and failing him to another brother of the testator's, and his lawful male heirs, and failing them to a nephew. On the marriage of the daughters, provided it was after twenty years of age, and with the consent of the trustees under the settlement, they were "to have the whole of the sums heretofore bequeathed to them," which sums, however, were to be invested in land, and entailed on the male heirs of the two daughters. A multipoleinding having been raised for the purpose of determining the rights of the parties, and one of the daughters having died leaving a daughter, an interlocutor was pronounced, finding that the lands to be purchased with the sums bequeathed to the daughters were to be settled on the surviving daughter and her heirs-male, under the fetters of a strict entail, but that it was "unnecessary, hoc statu, to give any direction as to the extent of the destination to be inserted in the said deed"—Held that the collateral heirs-male of the testator ought not to be included in the entail which he had directed to be made, and that the trustees under the marriage-contract of the daughter surviving at the date of the above interlocutor, to the exclusion of those of the daughter who had died, were entitled to have the lands and estate purchased with the accumulated amount of the bequests transferred to them in fee-simple, for the behoof of the parties interested in said marriage-contract.

Norman Macalister, governor of Prince of Wales Island, a Scotsman, was lost at sea on his return to this country in 1810. He was the youngest of four brothers, and died unmarried, survived by two brothers and a son of the third. He had two natural daughters, Frances Macalister and Flora Macalister. His settlement, which was holograph, contains, inter alia, the following provisions:

"I give and bequeath to my daughter, Frances, the sum of £15,000 Sterling.

"I give and bequeath to my daughter, Flora Macalister, the sum of £10,000 Sterling.

"The fortune I have thus bequeathed to each of the above-mentioned children, the said Frances Macalister and Flora Macalister, is to be left bearing interest in India, and placed in the hands deemed the most safe by the trustees, who will take care that collateral security be taken for the whole property invested in this way, which is to be left to accumulate for the benefit and behoof of the said children until they are twenty years of age. At the same time, as much of the interest of their fortune is to be remitted to England annually as shall defray the expenses of their education, provided that the sum required shall not exceed £300 Sterling for education and maintenance together, until they are fourteen years of age; and after they have attained that age (fourteen), should their guardians, who shall be hereafter mentioned, deem it necessary, they are then to receive each £300 Sterling annually, until they are twenty years of age, when more may be allowed them should their guardians deem it necessary.

"In the event of the death of the said Frances Macalister without lawful male heirs, her sister, Flora Macalister, is to inherit and receive the whole and every part of the said Frances Macalister's fortune; and in the event of the death of Flora Macalister without lawful male heirs, the above-mentioned Frances Macalister is to inherit and receive the whole and every part of the said Flora Macalister's fortune; and in the event of the death of both of these, Frances Macalister and Flora Macalister her sister, and failing of them both, and their lawful male heirs, I bequeath the whole and every part of the fortune of Frances Macalister and Flora Macalister to my brother, Keith Macalister, and his lawful male heirs; and failing the said Keith Macalister, and his lawful male heirs, I bequeath the fortune of the said Frances Macalister and Flora Macalister to my brother, Mathew Macalister, and his lawful male heirs; and failing of the said Mathew Macalister, and his lawful male heirs, I bequeath the fortune of the above said Frances Macalister and Flora Macalister to my nephew, John Macalister (the claimant's father), and his lawful male heirs.

"I appoint my brother Keith Macalister, my brother Mathew Macalister, and John Macalister, also Donald Macalister my nephew, Lieutenant-Colonel John Macdonald, John Macalister of Cour, and William Burnie, Esq., trustees and guardians to my children in England; and I appoint John Ferguson, Donald Macnab, John Macalister, and Captain John M'Innes, trustees to my children in this country.

"Should Frances Macalister, or her sister Flora Macalister, marry before they are twenty years of age, they will forfeit the whole and every part of their fortune bequeathed to them by me; and after the said Frances Macalister and Flora Macalister are twenty years of age, they may then marry; but whomsoever they marry must have the full consent and approbation of two of the trustees and guardians above named, otherwise they forfeit every shilling of the fortune bequeathed to them by me.

"And whomsoever the said Frances Macalister and Flora Macalister marries after they are twenty years of age, with the full consent and approbation of two of their trustees and guardians, shall and will take, and shall continue hereafter lawfully, him and his lawful heirs, both male and female, to take the name of Macalister, otherwise the above-named Frances Macalister and Flora Macalister, and their husbands, and their male and female heirs for ever, shall forfeit the whole and every part of the fortune bequeathed to them by me in this or other will or wills; provided, however, that the above-named Frances Macalister, and her sister Flora Macalister, has the full consent and approbation of the majority present of their trustees, not less than two, to marry at the time above specified, they will, and in that case, have the whole sums heretofore mentioned and bequeathed to them by me; which sums, however, are to be invested by the trustees and guardians in purchasing lands in Argyleshire, if possible to be procured in that county, which lands are to be entailed on the male heirs of the two sisters, the above-named Frances Macalister and Flora Macalister.

"I leave and bequeath to my brother Keith, £10,000 Sterling during his life, which sum is afterwards to revert to Frances Macalister and male heirs. I bequeath to my brother, Mathew Macalister, the sum of £5000 Sterling during his life, which is afterwards to revert to Flora Macalister and male heirs; failing them, to Frances Macalister."

"I give and bequeath the whole and every part of my landed property and estates of Kernhill, with any other lands that I may have, to my daughter, Frances Macalister, and her lawful male heirs; and failing of the said Frances Macalister, and her lawful male heirs, I bequeath the above-named estates and lands of Kernhill to my daughter, Flora Macalister, and her lawful male heirs; and failing of them, I bequeath the above-named estate and lands of Kernhill, together with every other part of their property, to my brother, Keith Macalister, and his lawful male heirs; and failing of them, I bequeath the above-named estate and lands of Kernhill to my brother, Mathew Macalister, and his lawful male heirs; and failing of them, I bequeath the estate and lands of Kernhill to my nephew, John Macalister, and his lawful male heirs; which, however, I have now burdened with £100 Sterling a-year for life to my sister Peggy."

After attaining the age of twenty, Frances Macalister was married in 1820 to Angus Macalister, and Flora, in 1822, to Keith Macdonald Macalister. Both marriages were approved by the trustees. By ante-nuptial contracts, the whole interests of Frances and Flora Macalister under their father's settlement were conveyed to marriage trustees.

Owing to the want of dispositive words, the estate of Kernhill was not validly conveyed by the settlement, and was taken up by Mathew Macalister, the testator's immediate elder brother, as his heir of conquest. A declarator was afterwards brought, to have it found that, by thus taking up the estate, Mathew Macalister had forfeited his claims under the settlement, and decree to that effect was pronounced. An attempt was made to reduce this decree, but it was found to be final as res judicata.

In 1820, the testator's trustees instituted a process of multipointing for the purpose of ascertaining the rights of all parties interested in the succession.

In this process Flora Macalister and her marriage trustees claimed,—“1st, The principal sum of the provision to her of £10,000 Sterling, in order that it may be invested in the purchase of lands in Argyleshire, to be laid under entail for the benefit of her and her heirs-male, as this Court may direct, and at the sight of the trustees and guardians nominated by the testator, or of such of them as may accept. 2dly, The accumulated interest upon that provision and legacy of £10,000 until she attained the age of twenty, in order that the same may be invested in such manner as this Court may direct, according to the sound and legal interpretation of the true meaning and import of the will. And, 3dly, The accumulations since the claimant, Mrs Macalister, attained the age of twenty.”

The claim of Frances was mutatis mutandis in the same terms.

Frances Macalister died in 1825, leaving an only child, a daughter; and on 30th June 1827, the Court pronounced an interlocutor, in which, inter alia, they “find that Frances Macalister, who married with the consent required in the will of the testator, having died without heirs-male, and Flora Macalister being also married with consent as aforesaid, the said two sums of £15,000 and £10,000, with the said respective accumulations thereon, under the deductions aforesaid, must be invested by the executors of the testator in the purchase of lands in Argyleshire, if possible to be procured in that county, to be settled upon the said Flora Macalister and her heirs-male, under the fetters of a strict entail, as understood in the law of Scotland—the deed to be prepared at the sight of this Court; and find it unnecessary, in hoc statu, to give any directions as to the extent of the destination to be inserted in the said deed, or as to any other particulars thereof.”

In 1831, the testator's trustees purchased the estate of Hayfield or Innistray, in Argyleshire, for £30,000, and on application to the Lord Ordinary, his Lordship approved of the purchase, and authorised Governor Macalister's surviving executor, General M'Innes, to uplift £30,000 of the fund in medio, which had been consigned in bank, to be applied by him

“in payment of the purchase-money of the lands and estate of Hayfield before mentioned, to be afterwards entailed in terms of the testator's will, under the authority and direction of the Court; and authorises and directs the conveyance to the said estate to be taken in the mean time to Colonel M'Innes, the executor, and failing him (in order to prevent the trust from lapsing,) to his agents, Messrs James Mackenzie and William Innes, and the survivor of them, to be held by them in trust for behoof of the parties interested, until the precise sum falling to be laid out in the purchase of land shall be ascertained, and the terms and conditions of the entail finally adjusted and determined.”

The only son of Flora Macalister has died recently, and questions having arisen as to the destination of the purchased lands, General M'Innes, the testator's only surviving trustee, lodged a minute craving the Court to give directions

“with regard to the extent of the destination to be inserted in the deed of entail of the said purchased lands, and as to the conditions of entail, and other particulars thereof, and thereafter to direct and allow the executor and his agents to prepare a draft of the deed of entail, and put it into process.”

Cases were ordered; and the cause having been advised, the following opinions were delivered:

Lord President.—Your Lordships who sat here at the time, will recollect that the questions between the parties in this case were made the subject of cases which were reported to your Lordships by Lord Murray. The cause was afterwards stated in argument before your Lordships, and stood for judgment; but in consequence of the unfortunate event that occurred,—the death of Mrs Flora, who had married Mr Keith Macdonald Macalister, and had left no male issue of her body, in the same way as her elder sister Frances had also done,—your Lordships, when the case came to be advised, allowed parties to withdraw the former cases, and to put in those which are now before us. We have here cases both for the trustees of the marriage-contract of Mrs Flora Macalister and her two daughters, and for the trustees of the marriage-contract of Frances and her only daughter; and we have also cases on the part of the Messrs Macalister, the representatives of the two brothers of the maker of the deed, the deceased Norman Macalister, for some time governor of Prince of Wales Island.

The first question discussed in these papers is, whether or not, in regard to the will of Colonel Macalister, and the proceedings that have already taken place in this Court, particularly your Lordships' judgment in 1827, you are now to proceed further in regard to the execution of an entail of certain lands directed to be purchased, if possible, in Argyleshire? These two gentlemen respectively maintain that they are entitled to demand that that entail, notwithstanding of the intervening death, shall be still framed, and ordered to be extended, so as to include them as heirs of entail of the estate purchased under your Lordships' interlocutor. On that question I have no difficulty whatever. Looking to the whole deed of Colonel Macalister, giving all the effect to it which we are entitled to give in such a question as this, and looking to what you have determined by your judgment in 1827, I am humbly of opinion that we are not entitled to order an entail to be executed, so as to include any one of these two gentlemen or their descendants. Your Lordships are quite familiar with the only passage in the will of this gentleman that has reference to an entail; namely, that where two sums, one of £15,000, the fortune of Frances, and another of £10,000, the fortune of Flora, the natural daughters of the testator, are directed to be laid out in the purchase of lands, if possible to be acquired within Argyleshire, and entailed in favour of these two ladies and their issue-male; but there is not one word farther of direction, or instruction, or exposition of intention, that that entail should go one iota beyond what I have stated. There is also in this will a declared intention that certain other sums, pending on certain events, shall, along with those sums of £15,000 and £10,000, be taken up and destined to his brothers in their order; but there is not a syllable as to the necessity of laying out that money in purchasing lands for the purpose of being entailed on those brothers and their descendants. The question, therefore, is, can we in any way, by conjecturing or guessing at the meaning of the testator, and looking at his predilection for the Messrs Macalister, construe it to have been his intention to include them in the entail, and can we carry out that intention by ordering such an entail to be made? Were we to do so, we would be doing nothing else than making a will for a party who had given no indications of making it for himself. On this part of the case, then, I have not the slightest difficulty in arriving at the conclusion, that we have no right to order any entail to be executed which shall include any of the descendants of the brothers of Colonel Macalister.

But there remains behind a question of great importance, and of sufficient difficulty, apart from the other, namely, What is now to be done, under the present circumstances, with the fortune which had been destined to go to those ladies? The Court had formerly occasion to consider the matter, and by an interlocutor of 30th June 1827, found, “that Frances Macalister, who married with the consent required in the will of the testator, having died without heirs-male, and Flora Macalister, being also married with consent as aforesaid, the said two sums of £15,000 and £10,000, with the said respective accumulations thereon, under the deductions foresaid, must be invested by the executors of the testator in the purchase of lands in Argyleshire, if possible to be procured in that county, to be settled upon the said Flora Macalister and her heirs-male, under the fetters of a strict entail, as understood in the law of Scotland, the deed to be prepared at the sight of this Court; and find it unnecessary, in hoc statu, to give any directions as to the extent of the destination to be inserted in the said deed, or as to any other particulars thereof."

This is the judgment which your Lordships pronounced in 1827 in regard to the provisions in Colonel Macalister's will, and the particular directions therein contained as to entailing those lands in the county of Argyle. Your Lordships thought it unnecessary to go farther than to settle the lands on Flora and her heirs-male, without inserting any further destination. Now, it does not appear that that entail was then executed; but lands having occurred which appeared to the executors to be suitable for the fulfilment of this part of the will, a purchase was made. The titles to that property have very properly been made up in the names of the executors in trust, and have so remained ever since. In this situation of matters the case has come before us on report by Lord Murray, and the question we have to decide at present is this,—it having happened that the family of Flora Macalister is exactly in the same situation with that of Frances when the interlocutor was pronounced—she having now deceased, leaving two daughters but no son—What are the rights that have arisen under the circumstances in which the case now comes before us for our determination? It is maintained on the part of those who are discharging their duty as trustees in the marriage-contract of Frances, and as such attending to the interests of her daughter, that it is impossible to carry forward the entail of those lands beyond what is expressly declared in your Lordships' judgment of 1827—that, in conformity with the will (there being no heirs-male, and there being in the marriage-contract a sufficient conveyance to them by that lady), they are now entitled to insist that her daughter ought to receive the £15,000, with the accumulations, as the amount of her mother's fortune. On the other hand, it is maintained on the part of those who are trustees under the marriage-contract of Flora, that the Court have no choice, but that, in consequence of the judgment of 1827, the daughters of Flora are the only persons to whose interest we are now to look;—that as no other entail can be made, and she executed a deed conveying all her property to trustees, her daughters are the only persons who are entitled to the estate, which is just a surrogatum for the price with which it was purchased, and that the claim of the young lady, the daughter of Frances, cannot now be regarded by us.

I must confess that this appears to me to be a very difficult question indeed; and on this point I set out by stating, that if it was not for the impediment in the way, which, if I could, I have a wish to get over, I would hold that the right of the daughter of Frances to her mother's fortune of £15,000 is just as clear as the right of Flora's daughters to their mother's fortune of £10,000. In principle, I can see no difference between them. If the thing were open—if there were no impediment in the way—if we were now, for the first time in this discussion, considering that neither of these ladies had left heirs-male, I would have no difficulty in the matter at all. But it is in consequence of what has passed—it is in consequence of the judgment to which I have referred—that an impediment exists and stands in our way. I cannot relieve my mind of this difficulty, or see how we can get rid of it. I know it is said in these papers that this is the first time that the question has been brought properly before your Lordships; but, on the other hand, it is averred with equal confidence, that in 1827 this matter was fully and amply discussed; and although your attention was directed chiefly as to how the entail was to be framed, yet the interest of that lady, and the interest of her daughter, were fairly brought under your cognisance. In regard to the contradictory averments, I have no assistance from your Lordships, or from the report of the case, which is very short. One party says that your Lordships did decide the point, and the other says you did not decide it. In point of fact you dealt with the two sums, and found that they must be laid out on land to be settled on Flora Macalister and her issue-male. The case of Campbell appears to be in point, and to show that you could not go beyond the destination actually expressed. Under these circumstances, I have, unfortunately I may say, come to the conclusion, that by the judgment of 1827 the money was made one complete sors, and that the daughters of Flora are entitled to the whole of it. If we had the question for the first time before us, without any impediment in our way, I am quite sure that there would be no difference of opinion among us. I am satisfied that we would hold that the daughter of Frances was just as fairly entitled to her mother's fortune as the daughters of Flora to their mother's fortune. But in consequence of the judgment pronounced in 1827, I am compelled to say that there is an obstacle which prevents us from going farther. That judgment must be binding on your Lordships. I do regret it. If it could be shown to me that I could, with safety and propriety, disregard what must be deduced from that judgment as it now stands, I should entertain a very different view as to the interests of those parties. But I have not been able to get over the difficulty; and I am under the painful necessity of stating, that, under the circumstances in which the case is before us, I cannot resist the conclusion, that the whole must go to the daughters of Flora Macalister.

Lord Gillies.—I concur so entirely with your Lordship, that it is wholly unnecessary for me to go into any detail. I most fervently wish I could give your Lordship any information as to the opinions expressed in the judgment alluded to, but my memory is not sufficiently retentive to enable me, at this distance of time, to do so. I am in the same situation with your Lordship. I have the same inclination to get rid of the difficulty that presents itself to us; but I am sorry to add, that I am of the very same opinion with your Lordship as to the merits.

Lord Mackenzie.—I concur in the opinion which your Lordships have stated. The first question is in reference to the two gentlemen who claim under the deed of Colonel Macalister, which claim is made on the ground that they are entitled to be included in the entail directed to be made of the lands that have been purchased. I do not think that claim well founded. The money was directed to be laid out in the purchase of lands to be entailed "on the male-heirs of the two sisters, the above-named Frances Macalister and Flora Macalister." There is no doubt that that will warrant the constitution of an entail with fetters imposed on the heirs-male. But I see no solid ground for holding that there was an intention to carry the fetters beyond these heirs. There is not a word in the deed which expresses that the fetters are to be carried farther. There was room here for great doubt, whether there could be any fetters upon the sisters themselves,—whether they were only to be enforced on the heirs-male. But as the heirs-male were after the sisters, there was an implication of intention that the fetters should apply to them, to which the Court gave effect. Supposing, then, that the intentions of the testator had been fully carried out, there would have been two entails—one in favour of Frances; whom failing, of her heirs-male; whom failing, of Flora; whom failing, of her heirs-male,—the other in favour of Flora; whom failing, of her heirs-male; whom failing, of Frances; whom failing, of her heirs-male. But the execution of two entails was superseded by the death of Frances before the question was tried. Your Lordships then found that one entail should be executed in favour of Flora and her heirs-male. The point was thus fixed, that the fetters were to be imposed upon Flora herself, as well as her heirs-male. But as to going or not going farther, nothing was said. And now I think the claim that they should go farther has not been supported. We must hold that the fetters should end with the heirs-male of Flora. This I have held all along to be the law of the case, and it excludes the claim of these gentlemen, the collateral heirs-male.

Then arises the claim of the daughters of Flora to the whole subject,—not only to what would have been their mother's share, but also to the other part originally destined to Frances.

I am sorry to say, that upon this point I agree with your Lordships, though the case is a hard one. In determining questions under trusts, the rule has always been that we are to suppose the trust executed. We cannot hold the claim of any party to be excluded by delay in doing so. We must suppose the entail executed. We are not to hold that parties are to be excluded from their just rights by any accidental delay in executing the trust. Once getting this principle, we must suppose that this entail has been executed. It must stand as if fully executed, and as if it had been so from the very first. If that were the case, what would result? By failure of Frances without heirs-male, the whole subject fell under entail on Flora Macalister; whom failing, her heirs-male under the fetters; whom failing, upon other destinations, without any fetters—the fetters in both ending with the heirs-male. Flora then executed a marriage-contract, by which she altered the destination, and settled the estates on her own children, whether male or female. They then came to be her heirs, and have right to the succession, if she had power to dispose of it. It does not signify who were beyond heirs-male in the destination; for they were all put aside by this alteration in the destination, if she had power to alter it. The two gentlemen claiming might have been parties if she had not interposed; but by her marriage-contract they were all put out, and the destination is made to go to her own daughters. Now, I think Flora had power to alter the destination. No doubt, she had a son; and as long as he lived the fetters were good and valid. But when he died she became the last heir of entail, entitled to dispose of the estate as she chose, and she did dispose of it under that settlement in favour of her own daughters.

But then it is said that Frances also made a marriage-settlement during her life, and that she altered the destination. No doubt she also executed a marriage-settlement; but she had no power to alter the destination. I have already said, that though the entail was not made then, we must hold it as made. If it had been made then, it would have been an entail on Frances Macalister; whom failing, her heirs-male; whom failing, Flora; whom failing, her heirs-male. And then, during the whole life of Flora, it was a good and binding entail; and Frances, being an heir of entail, with parties substituted to her still alive, had no power of disposal. The daughter of Frances is barred by the fetters which were operative against her mother during her lifetime; whereas the daughters of Flora are not debarred by the fetters. Flora got the whole of this estate, and held it as last heir of entail, with a power of disposal. No doubt a deed was made by Frances to defeat the right of Flora, but that deed was void, for want of power in the maker of it. Flora would have had no power to alter the destination had she not been the last heir of entail. Being the last heir of entail under this deed, or quasi last heir, I think her alteration of the destination was effective. The case is certainly a hard one, but for that the testator is to blame. He has made an injudicious settlement; and I dare say if he were alive, and the thing explained to him, he himself would think so. Hard as the case is, under the circumstances, we can do nothing in regard to the claim of the daughter of Frances.

Lord Fullerton.—Considering the terms of this will, and the interlocutors already pronounced by the Court, I have not been able to come to any other conclusion than that which has been just expressed. In regard to the first point, viz., the claim of the Messrs Macalister to be included in the destination of the lands, I do not think there is much difficulty. The testator leaves two sums of money to his two daughters and their heirs-male; and in the event of their both failing, and leaving no lawful male heirs, he bequeaths the fortunes of both to his brothers in their order. There is also a forfeiture in the event of the daughters marrying before they are twenty years of age, and if they should then marry without the consent of two of the trustees and guardians. There is here a conditional bequest to, and institution of, these gentlemen, on the failure or forfeiture of the daughters. But there is also an express provision fixing a particular event on which the bequests are to vest in the daughters.—“Provided, however, that the above-named Frances Macalister, and her sister, Flora Macalister, has the full consent and approbation of the majority present of their trustees; not less than two, to marry at the time above specified; they will in that case have the whole sums heretofore mentioned and bequeathed to them, which sums, however, are to be invested by the trustees and guardians in purchasing lands in Argyleshire, if possible to be procured in that county, which lands are to be entailed on the male heirs of the two sisters, the above-named Frances Macalister and Flora Macalister.”

I take these directions of the testator to be quite sufficient to exclude the claims of these two gentlemen, Keith Macalister and Alexander Macalister, to be inserted in the entail of the lands to be purchased. Their rights were extinguished by the events which took place, viz., the marriages of those two ladies with consent of the trustees; it being declared that, in that case, the two sums should belong to the daughters, and be vested in the purchase of lands for their benefit, and that of their heirs-male, without any farther destination. I apprehend that if a party bequeath a sum to A, with this provision, that failing A it shall go to B, and failing B to C, but in a subsequent part of the deed puts in a clause, stating that the money so bequeathed shall, on a certain event, be vested in the purchase of lands for the sole benefit of A, the conditional institutes are excluded in virtue of the arrangement made by the testator himself. In fact, they are no longer institutes—their institution being completely extinguished. I agree, therefore, with your Lordships, that it is impossible, in regard to those gentlemen, that we can, consistently with the will of the testator, carry the destination of the lands beyond the terms of the direction of the testator himself. According to his express directions, though conditional institutes in the moveable bequests, they are not substitutes in the lands to be purchased, on those bequests vesting in the prior institutes.

Then comes the other and more difficult question, in regard to the rights of the female children of the daughters, who both died after marriage, but before the lands were purchased and the entail executed. The direction is, that if the parties married with consent of their trustees, “they should have those sums respectively bequeathed” to them, in order to be invested in the purchase of lands to be entailed on “the male heirs of the two sisters.” Here the first question that arises is this,—supposing the two ladies had been alive, there must have been two entails; but what must have been the nature of those entails? This admits of two constructions. It might be supposed that the two entails to be made were, first, an entail of Frances's property in favour of herself and her heirs-male; and, secondly, an entail of Flora's property in favour of herself and her heirs-male, in which case the heirs-male of Frances would not have taken any part of Flora's estate, and vice versa. Flora having died leaving only daughters, would, in that case, have been the last party entitled to take under the entail so constituted, there being nobody to plead the fetters against her. And in the same way, on the supposition of there being two such entails, Frances's estate would have been carried by the conveyance in her marriage-contract.

But this was not held to be the proper construction of the deed. In the first place, it is contrary to the opinion of English counsel. The entails which they considered proper to be executed were separate entails, but, at the same time, entails which included in each the heirs-male of the other sister. But, secondly, and what is conclusive, that construction was finally excluded by the interlocutor of the Court in 1827. At that time, Frances having died without heirs-male, the Court considered that all they had to look to then was one entail; and that one, an entail including Flora and her heirs-male. This interlocutor could not have been pronounced, unless on the ground that Flora and her heirs-male were to take Frances's share, failing herself and her heirs-male, and that, in consequence of that failure, the whole sums provided were to be applied in favour of Flora. The judgment finds that the said Mrs Frances Macalister being now dead, without leaving male heirs, &c., “the said two sums of £15,000 and £10,000, with the said respective accumulations thereon, under the deduction foresaid, must be invested by the executors of the testator in the purchase of lands in Argyleshire, if possible to be procured in that county, to be settled on the said Flora Macalister and her heirs-male, under the fetters of a strict entail, as understood in the law of Scotland, the deed to be prepared at the sight of this Court; and find it unnecessary, in hoc statu, to give any directions as to the extent of the destination to be inserted in the said deed, or as to any other particulars thereof." Then the lands were purchased, and I see by the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary in 1831, that there is a direction given as to how they shall be held;—he authorises the lands to be purchased, and authorises and directs the conveyance of the estate "to be taken to General MacInnes, whom failing, to Messrs Mackenzie and Innes, his agents, in trust, until the terms and conditions of the entail to be executed should be finally adjusted." Thus, at present, those lands are held in trust for behoof of the parties interested.

Now, if there were any persons entitled to be added to the destination, of course they would become parties, for whom, to a certain extent, this trust was executed. But the question here is, are there any such parties? For the reason already assigned, I think there is no room for holding that the two gentlemen here claiming, are parties who have an interest in the trust. Then I am not sure that I understand the ground on which the trustees of Frances Macalister claim. They seem to claim by virtue of the marriage-contract, but I cannot see that it gives to them any right whatever. For how could that, or any deed of Frances, carry directly any interest in the bequest or in the lands purchased, when the interlocutor expressly found that the £15,000 as well as the £10,000, was to be invested by the executors in the purchase of lands, to be settled on Flora and her heirs-male? I cannot see how any other construction can be given to the interlocutor. The only ground, then, for conceiving that the trustees under the marriage-contract are entitled to get at the £15,000 or the lands, in so far as they are a surrogatum for that sum, is to suppose that, some how or other, they are entitled to insist that the heirs-male of Frances Macalister shall be inserted in the destination. But I cannot see how they are entitled to be thus put into the destination. Whether they could have maintained this before the interlocutor of 1827 was pronounced, is a different question. But as the matter now stands, I see no reason for holding that the marriage-contract of Frances could either carry that sum of £15,000 to the trustees directly, or could carry it indirectly, by enabling them to get her daughter inserted in the destination. There is authority for entailing the land to heirs-male, but no authority whatever for carrying it beyond them to any heirs-female.

There is a sum of money, or rather a landed estate purchased with that money, held in trust for the behoof of the parties entitled to take under an entail, and the only question is, what is to be the destination in that entail? The destination cannot go farther than the heirs-male of Flora Macalister. This is confirmed by the case of Campbell, which has been referred to. There being thus an entail limited to the heirs-male of Flora Macalister, and there being no heirs-male now in existence, the estate is just held in trust for Flora Macalister, and is consequently perfectly well carried by the conveyance in her marriage-contract. Therefore, looking at the whole circumstances of the case, I am bound to hold, first, that we are not entitled to carry the destination beyond the heirs-male of Flora; and, secondly, that there are no grounds for holding that any part of the sum in question was carried by the marriage-contract of Frances. I therefore concur in the opinion which has been expressed by your Lordships.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Find that, according to the sound construction of Governor Macalister's will, the collateral heirs-male of the Macalister family ought not to be included in the entail directed by him to be executed, and repel the claims of Alexander Macalister of Loup, and Keith Macalister of Glenbar, accordingly: Find that the trustees under the marriage-contract of Mrs Flora Macalister, and Keith Macdonald Macalister, her husband, are entitled to have the lands and estate of Hayfield or Innistrathich transferred to them in fee-simple for behoof of the parties interested under the said marriage-contract, and appoint the proper deed to be prepared for vesting the said lands and estate in their persons, as trustees, accordingly; and the said deed, when duly revised and settled, to be executed and delivered to them; and to this extent sustain the claim of Donald McCrummen and Mathew Norman Macdonald, the surviving and accepting trustees under the said marriage-contract, and of Ann Amelia Burnie and Margaret Frances Byng Macdonald Macalister, only children of the said marriage: and repel the claim of the trustees under the contract of marriage of the late Mrs Frances Byng Macalister and Angus Macalister of Balinakill; and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed accordingly."

11th March 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 162.—THE REV. WILLIAM MIDDLETON and OTHERS, Suspenders, v. ALEXANDER ANDERSON and OTHERS, Respondents.

Church—Patronage—Jurisdiction—Process—Certain parishioners having complained that a majority of the presbytery of the bounds had inducted a minister into the parish in violation of the Act on Calls, in disregard of a tender of special objections, and pending appeals to the higher church courts, the Commission of the General Assembly interdicted the presentee from officiating, and authorised the members of Presbytery not complained of, to provide for the ministration of the word and sacraments in the parish—A note of suspension of this sentence passed, and interdict against the execution of it granted.

The Reverend William Middleton, after officiating for several years in the parish of Culsamond as ordained assistant to the incumbent, the Rev. Ferdinand Ellis, received a presentation to be his assistant and successor. This presentation, granted by Sir John Forbes of Craigievar, the patron, and accompanied with the usual documents, was laid on the table of the Presbytery of Garioch on 22d September 1841, and sustained. At the same time, two motions were submitted to the Presbytery,—the first, "That the Presbytery do appoint one of their number to meet with the elders of Culsamond for the purpose of making up a roll of male heads of families in communion with the church in said parish, conformably to the Act of Assembly 1835 on the calling of ministers;" and the second, "That the Presbytery proceed according to the law and practice of the Church previous to the interim Act of Assembly 1834." After discussion, the second motion was allowed to be withdrawn, and the first was agreed to without a vote—six members of Presbytery, being one-half of the whole sederunt, exclusive of the moderator, entering their dissent, and both the patron and presentee protesting, that by the adoption of the motion their rights should not be compromised.

The Presbytery having again met on the 6th October, called for the roll of the male heads of families. It was accordingly laid on the table, and being purged and completed, "was countersigned in name, presence, and by appointment of the presbytery, by the moderator." Thursday the 28th of October was fixed as the day for moderating in the call, and the Presbytery having accordingly met, a call was produced and read to the congregation, and thereafter subscribed by the whole elders, three of the heritors, and a number of male heads of families and communicants—the whole amounting to forty-one. Mr J. D. Milne appeared as agent for the presentee, and Mr David Mitchell for certain of the parishioners. After some preliminary procedure, Mr Mitchell craved "that dissents be received according to the Act of Assembly on Calls;" to which Mr Milne objected, and craved that his objections be recorded. It was then moved "that dissents be received." This motion was agreed to without a vote; but seven of the members, forming a majority of the whole sederunt, entered their dissent, and protested that the adoption of the motion should not compromise their sentiments "as to the Veto Act, nor the rights of the patron and presentee accruing to them respectively from the presentation, and relative documents formerly sustained by the Presbytery." Mr Milne also protested. Dissents were then tendered, and the Presbytery found that they had been lodged "by an apparent majority of male heads of families on the roll." Mr Mitchell craved "that the Presbytery would now proceed, according to the Act on Calls, and the instructions to presbyteries thereanent, with a view to the ultimate rejection of the Rev. William Middleton, the presentee to Culsamond." Mr Milne craved, that in respect "that the said Act anent calls had been found to be ultra vires of the ecclesiastical courts, and that the dissents tendered were illegal and incompetent, the Presbytery proceed to sustain the call, and thereafter, on a future day, to induct the presentee." The following motion was then made:

"The Presbytery having duly considered the call now given to the Rev. William Middleton to be minister of this parish, find it subscribed by three out of five heritors,—that a fourth, necessarily absent, had intimated his concurrence,—and that the remaining heritor had intimated no opposition or dissent; find it subscribed by all the elders, and by a large number of respectable male heads and other communicants in the parish; therefore the Presbytery did, and hereby do, sustain said call, concur with the same, and appoint Mr Middleton, who is already an ordained minister of the Church, to be received and admitted into the pastoral charge of this parish on Thursday the 11th day of November first ensuing,—the Rev George Peter, minister of Kemnay, to preach and preside on the occasion: They also appoint one of their number to preach at Culsamond on Sunday first, the 31st day of October current, and to serve an edict to the above effect."

Another motion was made, "That at present, in this case, the Presbytery do sist procedure, and report to the General Assembly." The first motion having been carried, five of the members dissented, and protested for leave to complain to the Synod. Mr Mitchell protested, and appealed. It does not appear from the minutes of Presbytery that he did more; but, according to the statement of the dissentients, "when these two motions were about to be put to the vote, and before the roll was called, the law-agent for the dissentients, perceiving that a majority of the Presbytery was determined to proceed, disregarding the dissents, craved to be heard, and intimated verbally that he was ready to offer special objections against the said presentee; and notwithstanding of his having been interrupted by the members constituting the majority of the Court, on the ground that he was out of order, did make the Presbytery aware of his offer of special objections before the said motions were put to the vote; but the vote was taken notwithstanding, and the motion to proceed with the settlement was carried by a majority of seven to five." "Immediately after said motion was carried, the said law-agent for the dissentients caused to be served by a notary-public a schedule, setting forth, that as an apparent majority of dissents had been lodged and declared, the said Presbytery were bound, in terms of the laws of the Church, to take steps for the ultimate rejection of said presentee: But that, since they had resolved to take steps to the contrary, it farther represented the willingness of the said agent, without prejudice to the effect of the said dissents, but in corroboration thereof, to tender special objections, and did thereby, then and there, tender the same; the said objections having been seen by the said notary-public, and afterwards marked by him as notary in the premises." It was then moved,

"That as the dissent and complaint of the minority, and the protest and appeal by the agent for the dissentients, against proceeding to receive and admit Mr William Middleton, the presentee, are founded on the Veto Act, which has been declared ultra vires of the Church, and illegal, the said dissent and complaint, and the appeal, are inept and incompetent, and ought not to bar the execution of the Presbytery's finding,—the Presbytery accordingly proceed to the induction on Thursday the 11th day of November, and that the record be now closed."

This motion having been seconded, Mr Mitchell

"now tendered special objections to the fitness of the presentee; and it was moved, 'That the said objections be received and discussed;' which being seconded, it was agreed that this motion be put as an amendment on the former, and that the state of the vote be, first or second motion; and the roll being called, and votes marked (first motion, second motion), it was carried first motion by seven votes to five; and the Presbytery found and appointed in terms thereof. Against which sentence Mr Garioch declared that he protested for redress in the hands of Mr John Anderson, notary-public in Aberdeen; and Mr David Mitchell aforesaid, declared that he protested in like manner in the hands of said notary-public."

The Presbytery then appointed the usual steps to be taken for Mr Middleton's admission on the 11th November. The Presbytery having accordingly met, the clerk stated "that he had in due time received a paper containing reasons of dissent and complaint by the minority of the Presbytery against the finding of the Presbytery sustaining the call and appointing the settlement of Mr Middleton." The reasons of dissent are as follows:

"1. Because the said settlement is in violation of the solemn principle recognised by the standards of the Church,—'That no man be intruded into a congregation contrary to the will of the people.'

"2. Because the resolution of the majority to proceed to the settlement, did not stand directly against any provision of the Veto Act, the regulations of which Act were followed out down to this stage of the proceedings, though it was characterized by them as illegal; but against a proposal simply to sist procedure, and report the whole case to the General Assembly.

"3. Because, under the circumstances, the settlement is a wilful and deliberate defiance of the Church itself, as well as a subversion of the rights of her people, and is in reality, on the part of the majority of the Presbytery, a breach of those solemn ordination vows which they came under to submit to the authority of the judicatories of the Church.

"4. Because it is a submission of the privileges which the Lord Jesus Christ has conferred upon the Church, as her exalted head, to the powers of this world, which effectually degrades and prostrates the spiritual independence which belongs to the Church, as a church of the Redeemer.

"5. Because it must inevitably lead to schism and separation on the part of the majority of the Presbytery, and on that account is another breach of their ordination vows, whereby they are solemnly bound to 'maintain the unity and peace of this Church against error and schism, notwithstanding of whatever trouble or persecution may arise, and to follow no divisive courses from the present established doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of this Church."

The clerk also stated

"that he had received, at the same time, reasons of dissent and complaint by the same minority, against a sentence of the Presbytery refusing to receive special objections from communicants and parishioners of Culsamond, against the settlement of the Reverend William Middleton; which paper being produced and read, the Presbytery find, that these reasons offered are ex facie based on an erroneous assumption, and moreover, that the record having been closed, reasons of dissent and complaint from that finding cannot be competently received, and refuse to record these reasons accordingly."

The clerk then produced the papers containing reasons of protests and appeals by the agent for the male heads of families, dissentients, namely,

"1st, Reasons against receiving ex gratia the memorial of certain communicants not parishioners; 2d, Reasons against the finding of the Presbytery sustaining the call, and appointing the settlement, without regard to dissents given in; 3d, Reasons against the finding of the Presbytery refusing to receive special objections to the presentee;—all which being read, the Presbytery allow the first two papers of reasons of protests and appeals to be recorded, and extracts thereof granted;" but "with respect to the third paper of reasons of protest and appeal lodged, inasmuch as the said reasons are ex facie equally ill based with those of the minority, which have been already refused, the Presbytery also refuse to record these reasons, and intimated this accordingly."

The Presbytery afterwards proceeded to the church, but the moderator

"having repeatedly attempted, but in vain, to ascend the pulpit stair, and there being in the church a constant noise and hooting, with yelling, besides throwing of stones, and other signs of violence, which were continued for about an hour, in presence of Mr Sheriff Murray of this county,—Mr Sheriff Lumsdaine, of the county of Suberland, and Justice of the Peace for this county,—Mr William Simpson, procurator-fiscal,—Captain Elphinstone Dalrymple, Justice of the Peace; and the said Captain Dalrymple having declared that the Presbytery were deforced and violently interrupted in the execution of their purposed solemn duties, and Mr Sheriff Lumsdaine having farther intimated to the Presbytery 'that Mr Sheriff Murray considered it unsafe and inexpedient to proceed to public worship within the church;' and both said Sheriffs having made ineffectual attempts to address the people, the Presbytery, after waiting for some time after said intimations, and the violent and indecent interruptions continuing unabated, resolved to adjourn to the manse for the purposes of worship, and of receiving and admitting the Rev. Mr William Middleton to be minister of the church and parish of Culsamond, as aforesaid."

The Presbytery adjourned accordingly, and completed the settlement.

The Commission of the General Assembly having met on the 17th November 1841, the dissentient parishioners gave in a petition and complaint, in which, after narrating the proceedings in the settlement of the parish of Culsamond, they submit "that said proceedings and said settlement are in contravention not only of the recognised laws of the Church prior to the Act of Assembly anent calls, in consequence of the refusal of the said Presbytery to receive special objections against the said presentee, and of their determining to proceed in the face of the due and regular dissents and complaints of the minority of said Presbytery, and of the protests and appeals of the agent for the dissentients against their findings, but more especially of the said Act of Assembly anent calls, and of an apparent majority of dissents received and judicially found under the same; and this while there was no reason at all for their precipitancy—no order or pretended order from any civil court, as in certain other cases—and nothing but their own deliberate resolution so to do.

"That said pretended settlement is therefore irregular, inept, void and null; and that, by the proceedings whereby it has been pretended to be effected, your petitioners are sorely aggrieved, and their spiritual interests deeply injured.

"That your petitioners would farther, in the strongest terms, represent, that as they cannot now, without injury to their own feelings, and dishonour to the Church, avail themselves of the religious services of the said presentee, and as there is no convenient place of worship situated near their parish, they will be totally left without the means of grace; and this while there are, for instance, already some requiring the ordinance of baptism to be dispensed.

"That, in these circumstances, your petitioners have been advised to petition and complain to the Commission of the General Assembly, at their meeting on Wednesday the 17th day of November current, praying the Commission to adopt measures for vindicating the laws and dignity of the Church, and for the protecting the spiritual interests of your petitioners, their families, and the other parishioners of Culsamond, who conscientiously feel dissatisfied with the ministry of the said Rev. William Middleton." They therefore prayed the Commission

"to serve this petition and complaint upon the individual members constituting the majority of the said Presbytery who voted on the motion sustaining the call, and concurring in the same, and appointing the said Reverend William Middleton to be admitted into the said parish, notwithstanding the said apparent majority of dissents, and in disregarding the same; as also upon the motion disregarding the dissents and complaints of the minority, and the protests and appeals of the agent for the dissentients, upon the pretence that they were founded on the Veto Act, which had been declared ultra vires of the Church, and whereby they declared the record closed, with a view to prevent special objections from being received, though tendered, and by whom, in its subsequent stages, the said pretended settlement has been perpetrated;" "as also the said Reverend William Middleton the presentee, who has closed with the said settlement, and accepted of the same, notwithstanding the dissents above-mentioned, and that it is perpetrated against the laws of the Church; and to appoint the said parties respectively to appear before the Commission of Assembly, or before the General Assembly itself, at its next meeting, to have such censure pronounced upon them as to the said Commission or the General Assembly shall seem meet; or to give such other order upon the said individuals, respectively, as to the said Reverend Court may seem meet in the hail circumstances, for the vindication of the laws and discipline of the Church, the protection of the spiritual interests of the said parishioners and petitioners; for dealing with the said individuals for their said disorderly conduct as it may appear to deserve; and further, to annul and rescind the pretended settlement, and whole proceedings above set forth and complained of; and also to take into immediate consideration the spiritual necessities of the petitioners, and the said parish, and to take such steps for the immediate supply of public worship and ordinances, as to the said Reverend Court may seem meet, to prevent the lamentable consequences which must otherwise ensue from the want of them."

The Commission, after hearing counsel for the petitioners,

"did and hereby do grant warrant to all presbytery and kirk-session officers to serve the said petition and complaint upon the several parties therein complained of, as craved, to cite them to appear personally to answer thereto before the Commission at its meeting in March next, or failing such meeting, before the General Assembly at its meeting to be holden at Edinburgh on the 19th day of May next, and also appoint the said parties to give in answers to the said petition and complaint in writing to the said meeting of the Commission, or failing said meeting, to the next General Assembly, all with certification. Farther, the Commission in the meantime, and until a final deliverance shall have been pronounced in regard to the proceedings complained of, did and hereby do interdict and prohibit the Reverend William Middleton from officiating and administering ordinances in the said parish, and authorise and enjoin the remanent members of the Presbytery of Garioch, not complained of, to meet forthwith to provide for the ministration of the word and sacraments in the parish of Culsamond, in the manner which shall appear to them competent in the existing circumstances of said parish, the senior of the said remanent members being convener, and to report in their name to the meeting of the Commission in March, and to the next General Assembly."

A note of suspension and interdict was presented by Mr Middleton and the majority of the Presbytery, praying the Court

"to suspend the proceedings complained of, and particularly the sentence or deliverance of the Commission, or pretended Commission, of the General Assembly against the complainers, of the date of 17th November 1841; and to interdict, prohibit, and discharge all execution or intimation of the said sentence or deliverance, or of any of the proceedings complained of; as also all proceedings in furtherance or pursuance of the same, and every attempt, in any way whatever, to carry the same into effect: And in particular, to interdict, prohibit, and discharge Alexander Anderson" and others, "designing themselves male heads of families and communicants in the said parish of Culsamond, or residents and communicants in the said parish, from prosecuting or following forth a pretended petition and complaint, hearing to be presented in their names to the Commission of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, which met at Edinburgh on Wednesday the 17th November 1841, against the complainers, to the effect of molesting and disturbing the complainers, or any of them, in the performance of their duties as ministers of their respective parishes, or as members of the Presbytery of Garioch: And further, to interdict, prohibit, and discharge the Reverend Henry Simpson" and others (minority of Presbytery), "from usurping and exercising any of the functions of the said Presbytery, by taking upon themselves the superintendence of the parish of Culsamond, and from providing, or meeting to provide, for the ministration of the word and sacraments in the said parish, in any manner of way whatever, to the exclusion of the other members of said Presbytery, complainers, and from interfering with, or molesting the Reverend William Middleton, complainer, minister of the said parish, in the enjoyment, exercise, and discharge of his rights, functions, and duties as such, or as a member of the Presbytery of Garioch, and from preaching or administering any of the ordinances of religion in the church and parish of Culsamond, and from using the church bell of the said parish, without the consent of the complainer, the Reverend William Middleton, minister thereof, and from instructing and authorising others to usurp and exercise any of the functions of the said Reverend William Middleton, complainer, as minister of the church and parish of Culsamond."

In support of their note the suspenders pleaded—

1. The rejection of a presentee by a presbytery, on the sole ground that a majority of the male heads of families, communicants in the parish, have dissented, without any reason assigned, from his admission as minister, and the refusal or delay of such presbytery to induct a qualified presentee on this ground being illegal, and a violation of the duty of presbyteries as imposed by Statute, the Presbytery of Garioch were not entitled to give any effect to the dissents tendered, without reasons assigned, at their meeting on the 28th October 1841, but were bound and astricted by Statute to proceed with the settlement of Mr Middleton notwithstanding these dissents. 2. The complainer, Mr Middleton, being a qualified presentee presented by an undoubted patron, and his presentation having been sustained by the Presbytery of Garioch, he was entitled to insist, as he did, that the Presbytery should proceed to admit and receive him as minister of the church and parish to which he had been presented, according to law, notwithstanding the dissents, without reasons assigned, of a majority of the male heads of families, communicants in the parish. 3. The rights of the presentee, and the duties of the Presbytery, being thus clearly defined and settled, no dissent and complaint, or protest and appeal taken to any Superior Church Court, on the ground that the Presbytery had refused to commit the unlawful act of entertaining and giving effect to the said dissents without reason, could have the effect of sisting farther procedure, or of entitling the Presbytery to refuse or delay, when required by the presentee, to proceed with his settlement—the said dissents and complaints, and protests and appeals, being in themselves inept and illegal. 4. The complainer, Mr Middleton, an ordained minister of the Church of Scotland, having been regularly admitted and received as minister of the said church and parish of Culsamond, upon the presentation in his favour according to law, is entitled to be protected in the enjoyment and exercise of the rights and duties of his office, thus legally vested in him; and the pretended Act of the General Assembly anent calls having been found by this Court, and by the judgment of the House of Lords, to be illegal, he is further entitled to an interdict against all proceedings founded on the authority of the said pretended Act, and against any undue interference with him in the discharge of his duties or enjoyment of his rights as minister aforesaid. 5. The Commission of the General Assembly have no jurisdiction to entertain or dispose of the matters contained in the said petition and complaint, in respect the same formed no lawful ground of complaint against any of the parties called who were acting legally in the settlement of Mr Middleton as minister in the foresaid parish, and it was ultra vires of the Commission to interfere or pronounce the sentence complained of. 6. The sentence of the said Commission, which was pronounced in absence, and without calling the parties there complained of, is farther illegal: (1.) In respect it is, quoad the complainer, Mr Middleton, an unwarrantable interference with his rights, and the performance of his duties as minister of the parish of Culsamond, and with the right of the parishioners of the said parish to receive his ministrations as their parish minister. (2.) In respect it involves an illegal and unprecedented interference with the functions of a presbytery, and authorises and instructs certain individual members of the Presbytery to usurp the functions of the collective body.

The dissentient parishioners entered appearance, and pleaded—1. That as the interdict now craved does not relate to any civil right, but to matters purely spiritual, it does not fall within the jurisdiction of this Court, and therefore this application is incompetent. 2. That as the judgment complained of was strictly and legally within the competency of the Court which pronounced it, this Court has no jurisdiction to interfere with its due execution. 3. The interdict now craved cannot be granted without an interference with the rights of the Church, as confirmed and recognised by the law and the constitution of this country. 4. That even if this Court had jurisdiction, under any circumstances, to entertain such an application as the present, which is expressly denied, the procedure of the complainers, members of Presbytery, in the premises, was altogether inept and illegal, and contrary to the laws of the Church, and, in particular, to the Act of Assembly 1732, c. 5.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"13th January 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having resumed consideration of this note of suspension and interdict, with the answers thereto, and productions, and having heard parties fully thereon, refuses the note: Finds the complainers liable in expenses, of which appoints an account to be given in, and remits the same, when lodged, to the auditor to tax and report; and decerns.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary has given the most anxious consideration to this case, and has not presumed to dispose of it without a careful and laborious examination of all those former judgments of the Court which were argued on before him by the complainers, as ruling the question.

"The more he has studied the matter, the more has he become satisfied that the present case does not fall within the scope of these precedents. There is no question now brought before the Court as to the legality of the Veto Act; and the civil rights, whether of the patron or presentee, will stand perfectly unscathed, notwithstanding all that has yet been done by the Commission of the General Assembly. The only question here is, shall this Court interfere with the proceedings of a proper church court, where that Court, acting within its own province, is dealing with a proper ecclesiastical cause; and this too, while that cause is still actually depending before them?

"It cannot be doubted—for the very judgments of this Court which are most unfavourable to the extreme pretensions of the Church tribunals, expressly assume—that there is an ecclesiastical jurisdiction altogether independent of the civil courts. This, indeed, as an abstract proposition, even the complainers hesitated not to concede. But what is more important, the doctrine was again and again distinctly laid down by both of the noble Lords, who, in the Court of last resort, supported the judgment of affirmance in the case of Auchterarder. Lord Brougham, taking his illustration from the question of qualification, said:—'Prove to me that this is a matter of ecclesiastical cognizance: Prove to me that this is a question of qualification like the question of sufficiens or minus sufficiens in literatura, and then I say that the Court of Session will be excluded.' And so also said the Lord Chancellor:—'It is not disputed that, as to matter of qualification, which is submitted to the decision of the Church, the judgment of the Assembly upon appeal is final.' In truth, no man who knows anything of the constitution either of the civil or ecclesiastical courts, could ever be misled on this point. The powers of both are to be found in the Statute-book. By 1537 (1532), c. 36, the Court of Session is authorised 'to sit and decide upon all actions 'civil.' By 1579, c. 69, 1592, c. 116, &c., the Presbyteries and other Church Courts, upwards to the General Assembly, are empowered 'to put order to all matters and causes ecclesiastical within their bounds, according to the discipline of the Kirk.'

"The only difficulty is, where to draw the line of demarcation between the 'action civil,' and the 'matter and cause ecclesiastical,' with the corresponding puzzle, by what authority shall the line be fixed?

"Fortunately, it is not necessary, in the present case, at all to deal with this questio vexata. At least, so it has appeared to the Lord Ordinary in pronouncing the above judgment; and the grounds upon which he has arrived at this conclusion are as follow:—

"1. To put the case hypothetically: Suppose that the Veto Act had never been passed, and that without any attempt to encroach upon, or evade the civil rights of either patron or presentee, and without at all departing from the old and established, and therefore unquestionably competent and legal form of proceedings in the induction of a minister, a question had arisen in the church courts as to the presentee's qualification in literature, life, or manners. This, it will be observed, is the very case which was put in the House of Lords as an admitted example of the independent jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts. Now, suppose farther, that in the course of adjudicating upon this question, there came to be tendered, at a particular stage of the process, certain dissents for cause, or 'special objections to the presentee's fitness,' and that these were rejected by the Presbytery, and an appeal taken to the superior church judicatory; and, finally, suppose that the Presbytery, disregarding this appeal, determined, notwithstanding, to proceed in the settlement, and appeal was again taken against this irregularity, and that, in the face of all this, the Presbytery still went on to complete the settlement,—in such a case, it cannot surely be questioned, that this Court would have been utterly incompetent to interfere with the proceedings of the higher church court in disposing of the appeal. 1. The church court was here in no respect stepping beyond or out of its own province: 2. The cause in which the question had occurred was purely a 'cause ecclesiastical;' and 3. The question itself, even in so far as it might depend upon the regularity or competency of the appeals, as having been taken in any peculiar form, or at any particular stage, being a question affecting the form of process in the church courts, was still one upon which these courts, and these courts alone, were entitled to adjudicate.

"II. The case which has actually occurred, and which is now before the Court, is not substantially different from the hypothetical one that has just been put; for, after laying aside (which the Lord Ordinary unqualifiedly does) all that was either said or done in the Court of Presbytery as to matter connected with the Veto Act, there still remain the two important points (and which only became the more important after the Presbytery had resolved, as they ultimately did, not to proceed upon the Veto Act).—viz., 1. That special dissents, or 'objections to the fitness of the presentee,' were tendered and rejected; and, 2. That various appeals having been taken against the proceedings, the Presbytery yet went on to the final question of settlement, and admitted the presentee in the face of these appeals.

"The complainers say, that the dissents were not tendered at the proper stage. But, 1. That is an answer which it is conceived they must plead in the church court, in justification and support of their own judgment; which, at least as regards the jurisdiction of that tribunal, has been competently carried up for review; for this Court cannot review, and of course cannot inquire into the regularity or irregularity of what must, on all hands, be admitted to be matter of proper church procedure. 2. Even were the church court of review itself to decide erroneously upon the matter thus brought up to them, the case must there 'take end,' as having been adjudicated on by the only competent tribunal. 3. The complainers stand out in an awkward predicament, as regards the objection on its merits. For though it were the fact (and the Lord Ordinary has formed no opinion either way) that the dissents for cause were not lodged in due time, this would seem to have been very much attributable to the conduct of this Presbytery itself, in having not only commenced their proceedings upon the footing of the Veto Act, (for though dissents were entered by certain of the individual members, no appeal was taken, and the proceeding was thus left, in substance as well as form, the authoritative proceeding of the body); but having so continued them through several diets of the cause, and having only determined at last to change their course after they came to find that the majority of the dissentients, without cause, were against them, the complainers seem, in this respect, to have been very much playing the game which the Church at large has been said to have done, in first pleading to the veto in the civil courts, and afterwards resisting the decision. But be this as it may, at least the proceeding was calculated to mislead the parishioners, who might otherwise, at that stage which the complainers say was the proper one, have dissented for cause. Therefore, even though it were to be assumed that there was some irregularity in point of time or otherwise (which, however, the respondents deny), it may reasonably be doubted how far the complainers, at least, would not be barred from taking advantage of it, and whether, accordingly, if they made the attempt, the supreme judicatory of the Church would not, in a general review of the cause, be warranted, without any imputation on the correctness or propriety of their proceedings, to repon the dissentients as a step tota re perspecta necessary for doing substantial justice between the parties.

"In like manner, the complainers justify their having refused to receive and record the dissent and complaint tendered by the minority of their own body, as well as the corresponding protest and appeal of the communicants and parishioners against the sentence 'refusing to receive special objections,' on the ground 'that the record having been closed, reasons of dissent and complaint, &c., from that finding cannot be competently received.' But, while this argument is open to the same observations generally which have just been made upon the preceding, it appears from those very minutes of Presbytery, which the complainers have here produced, that the record was not closed until AFTER the special objections had been tendered. The minutes bear that a motion was made, and laid on the table, to the effect, inter alia, 'that the record be now closed.' But the minutes go on, 'which motion being seconded, Mr David Mitchell now tendered SPECIAL OBJECTIONS TO THE FITNESS OF THE PRESENTEE; and it was moved THAT THE SAID OBJECTIONS BE RECEIVED AND DISCUSSED.' Now, these two motions were put against each other as motion and amendment. Therefore, though the first motion no doubt carried, it is clear there was no closed record until the result of the vote. But the judgment, as determined by that vote, is the very judgment which was the subject, as well of the dissent and complaint, by the minority of the Presbytery, as of the protest and appeal by the parishioners.

"The complainers have still another plea,—viz., that by the rules and practice of the Church, frivolous appeals may be disregarded. The Lord Ordinary does not know how the case may be as to this: or whether, as is most probable, the true substance and meaning of the rule (if such there be) be not rather confined to this—that though frivolous appeals may be disregarded in the first instance, to the effect of enabling the inferior church court to go on and complete their proceedings without those vexatious stops and interruptions which such appeals might occasion, it is still open to the appellant, in the end, to insist for judgment on his appeals before the Superior Court, and not less competent for that Court to give effect to these appeals, should they happen to differ in opinion, as to their importance, from the Court below.

"Be this, however, as it may, the alleged practice cannot avail the complainers; because, whatever may be the case as to the earlier stages of their proceeding, they were not entitled, in the face of an appeal, however frivolous, to proceed to admit and settle the presentee. The Lord Ordinary finds it laid down in Dr Hill's book on the Practice of Church Judicatories, (p. 36, citing Act 5, Assembly 1732. Form of Process, c. 5, 10.) that, 'in regard to the settlement of a parish, that it may not be unnecessarily delayed, it is especially provided that, notwithstanding an appeal, a presbytery may proceed to all the previous steps to take the presentee upon trial, and to serve the edict, LEAVING only the ordination or ADMISSION TILL THE APPEAL BE DISCUSSED.'

"But, finally, the question here raised is like all the rest, just precisely such a question as the Supreme Church Court, in dealing with the practice of its own inferior judicatories, is exclusively competent to decide upon; for surely, least of all, in a matter of mere practice or form of proceeding, is there the shadow of pretext for maintaining that the Supreme Civil Court is entitled to review, or in any respect to interfere with, the Church tribunals.

"III. Did the matter stop here, the Lord Ordinary would be decidedly of opinion, that having regard to the nature and character of the questions raised, it is not competent to this Court even to read, for the purpose of reviewing, the sentence of the Commission of Assembly which is here complained of. That Court may or may not have adjudicated correctly the cause which was brought before it; or it may have proceeded rashly—let it be irregularly—in so adjudicating. The complainers, for example, say they ought not, until the complaint was finally discussed upon its merits, to have pronounced deliverance of interdict against the presentee, &c., strangely enough forgetting that nothing is more familiar in the Bill-Chamber itself, than to issue interim interdicts before hearing the party complained against; and that this, indeed, was actually prayed for by themselves in the present case, and is in fact the very course which has been followed by this Court in almost every one of the questions of suspension and interdict which have unfortunately arisen upon the Veto Act. Be the blunders and irregularities of the deliverance, however, as numerous and as great as the complainers would wish to represent them, they can, in the circumstances of the present case, no more be redressed by this Court, than the blunders that may occasionally creep into the judgments of this Court could be redressed in the General Assembly. The cause being an ecclesiastical cause,—the question a question of church practice, and the subject, with which the church court have been dealing, being the rendering of 'special objections to the fitness of the presentee,'—that very matter in which the House of Lords have declared the church courts to be exclusively competent,—the civil tribunals, whatever opinions they may hold as to the propriety or regularity of the deliverance, are utterly powerless to touch what a competent court has already, within its own proper province and jurisdiction, adjudicated.

"IV. But if it were competent to look at the deliverance thus pronounced by the church court, it would not avail the complainers; for, on the face of that deliverance, the church court appear to have done nothing but what, as a church court, they were entitled to do. All that is there presented, is the fact that a certain petition and complaint having been submitted, they, 1. appoint service on the parties complained against; and, 2. in the meantime, and until a final deliverance, interdict the presentee 'from officiating and administering ordinances in the said parish;' and 3. authorise and enjoin the members of Presbytery, not complained of, 'to provide for the ministration of the word and sacraments in the parish, in the manner which shall appear to them competent in the existing circumstances of said parish.'

"Now, really, if such a deliverance is to be regarded as involving any matter but what is purely and strictly ecclesiastical, and quite within the reach of the powers of discipline belonging to the church courts, the Lord Ordinary is at a loss to conceive what shall ever be so held. No civil interest, either of the patron or presentee, is thereby affected. And so far, more especially as regards the operation of the Veto Act, it might perfectly well have been that precisely the same deliverance should, in all points, have been pronounced, and precisely the same question that is now before the Court have been raised thereon, although the Veto Act had never existed, or although it had (as it unquestionably ought) been repealed by the General Assembly the moment it was declared to be contrary to the law of the land. Indeed, if the case be what the respondents contend, it is a case of gross departure, in the various particulars already noticed, from some of the most important and fundamental rules of the Church, in regard to the practice of presbyteries in questions of settlement, and the deliverance may, after all, be possibly not merely a competent deliverance for the church court to pronounce, but one actually not more severe, in point of discipline, than such a Court, in the circumstances, was warranted, and might, without any stretch, deem it necessary to pronounce.

"But the complainers say, that however cautious the deliverance may be in expression, it is in reality the Veto Act, and the feelings that actuate the church courts in regard to it that lie at the bottom. The Lord Ordinary can only look at what is competently before him. He is not judicially entitled to inquire into or guess at the motives of a judgment which has been pronounced by a competent tribunal of co-ordinate authority, and which bears the mark of no excess of power to the prejudice of civil right upon the face of it. He acknowledges, in this respect, the soundness of the principle which was given effect to by the Court of Queen's Bench in the late famous case of the Sheriffs of Middlesex (11 A. and E., 273). Nor does he deem it would be either seemly, or looking to the hazard of provoking unnecessary collision, expedient, to presume unworthy motives in the judicial proceedings of such a tribunal as the Assembly or its Commission. To borrow the words of the Lord Chief-Justice Denman in the case referred to,—'if they ever did so act, he is persuaded that, on farther consideration, they would repudiate such a course of proceeding.' And he is satisfied, at all events, that the matter is most safely left upon this footing, instead of straining the law in order to get the better—a little more early—of the inconvenience and excitement of a collision, which after all can be but temporary.

"V. Supposing it were open to look beyond the deliverance, and to construe it with reference to the petition and complaint on which it proceeds; and even farther, to glance from that petition and complaint to the previous dissents and appeals which were taken in the course of the Presbytery's proceedings, it would still make no substantial difference in the case. It would only thence appear that the complainers, in addition to the two grounds of complaint, which, alone, the Lord Ordinary has found it necessary to consider, founded also—but separately and independently—on a third, which, no doubt, might have brought the veto question more directly into the discussion. The Lord Ordinary may have his own impressions as to the unhappy influence which the introduction of this exciting matter may, and perhaps must have had upon the minds and conduct of one and all of the parties who are concerned in this cause. But he deems himself bound to cast all this aside,—neither the deliverance of the Commission, nor the complaint on which it proceeds, is nullified as to those matters contained in it, which are of unquestionable competency, by the mere taint of their being brought into juxtaposition with another matter which may possibly be regarded as incompetent. On the contrary, if that deliverance and that complaint would have been unassailable in this Court, if specifically rested on two out of the three grounds upon which the complaint is rested,—the third not having been stated, or not having so much as existed,—there is quite enough to support the exclusive jurisdiction of the church court,—and the mere introduction of the third ground could not take away this jurisdiction. And then, there being nothing in the deliverance itself to connect it necessarily and exclusively with the third ground, the Lord Ordinary is surely not to presume (more especially if that third ground would vitiate the proceeding by its incompetency,) that the deliverance was founded upon it at all, but must deal with the case precisely as he would have done if that third ground had not been embraced in the complaint,—the terms of the deliverance being perfectly applicable to the other two,—and its whole force being sufficiently exhausted by what might competently have been pronounced with reference to them, and to them alone.

"More particularly would this seem to be the only proper course in the present stage of the proceedings before the church court, in the process of review. The complaint is still in dependence before that Court; and until it be finally disposed of, there can neither be any absolute right to the office of minister recognised in the presentee, nor can it be anticipated how the Court of Review itself may ultimately deal with the various grounds of the complaint which is depending before them. If, rejecting the two grounds, in respect more immediately of which the Lord Ordinary has pronounced the present judgment, they shall rest their final sentence entirely upon the Veto Act, this Court may be again called upon, and it will then be time enough for it (if at all necessary) to interpose. But if, on the other hand, waiving or throwing aside all consideration of the Veto Act, they merely reverse the proceedings of the Presbytery, in respect of the irregularities otherwise committed by them, and so remit the cause back to be proceeded in by the Presbytery, consistently with the old and acknowledged practice in such matters, then there will in no view be any room whatever for interference on the part of this Court; and it will be made clear, on all hands, that to have interfered with them now, would really have been to be guilty of a very grievous encroachment on the independence of the Church and its courts, in regard to a matter exclusively within their own province."

The suspenders reclaimed. When the cause was advised, the following speeches were delivered:

Lord President.—We are now met to decide on the questions which have lately been so elaborately discussed under the reclaiming note against the interlocutor pronounced by the Lord Ordinary on the bills, on the 13th of January last. From the manner in which those questions have been treated, and the great variety of authorities referred to on both sides, it became necessary for the Court to take time for their consideration, and to deliberate on its judgment. Notwithstanding, however, the very wide field of argument which has been embraced by the counsel on both sides, and sensible as I am of the great importance of some of the questions that have been raised, I do not consider it will be necessary, from the view that I have taken of the case, to detain your Lordships at any length commensurate with the extent of the pleadings, which we have all listened to with so much satisfaction. Of one thing I am most fully assured, that, if we arrive at an erroneous conclusion, it will not be owing to any deficiency on the part of the learned counsel, who have maintained the interests of their clients with infinite ability, learning, and research.

I must begin with adverting to one question, to which the attention of counsel was directed by the Court itself, and which, though it had not been made the subject of discussion in the Bill-Chamber, appeared to be of essential importance,—namely, whether the Commission of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, from which that proceeding emanated which has been brought before us, is a tribunal or judicature of the Church established and recognised by the laws and constitution of the realm? Called upon, as the counsel on both sides suddenly were, to argue this question, they have discharged their duty unquestionably in a most able and satisfactory manner. But, although we have bestowed upon their arguments the greatest possible attention, yet, considering the shape of the present proceedings, and that we are now only in a discussion in the Bill-Chamber, it appears to me, and I believe also to all of your Lordships, that it would not be proper or decorous finally to dispose of such a question,—involving interests so extensive and important, both to the Church and to the whole people of Scotland,—without fuller and more deliberate consideration, and probably by availing ourselves of our brother Judges. I shall abstain, therefore, at present from giving any indication of opinion in regard to the above question, and, looking to the Commission as it now exists, proceed to state the grounds of my judgment upon the rest of the case,—the only difficulty as to which I have felt being that of comprising them within as narrow limits as possible.

The note of suspension and interdict, which has been refused by the Lord Ordinary on the bills, was presented on behalf of the Rev. William Middleton, minister of the church and parish of Culsamond, in the presbytery of Garioch and county of Aberdeen,—of that reverend Presbytery, and the Rev. George Peter, the moderator, and the other members therein named; and of Sir John Forbes of Craigievar, Baronet, patron of the said parish:—and it prayed for suspension of certain illegal proceedings adopted against them at the instance of Alexander Anderson, and various other persons designated parishioners of the parish of Culsamond, and enumerated in its prayer, by parties designing themselves and acting as a Commission of the General Assembly. The suspenders also prayed particularly for interdict against proceeding to carry into execution a sentence or deliverance of the Commission, pronounced on the 17th November last, upon a petition and complaint presented against the suspenders by the parties above named, the terms of which are fully set forth in the note. This note having been followed with answers, and the question of interdict having, by consent of parties, been in the meantime reserved, they were afterwards fully heard, when Lord Ivory, on the 13th January pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having resumed consideration of this note of suspension and interdict, with the answers thereto, and productions, and having heard parties fully thereon, refuses the note; finds the complainers liable in expenses, of which appoints an account to be given in, and remits the same when lodged, to the auditor to tax and report, and decerns." To this interlocutor the Lord Ordinary added a note, explaining fully the grounds of his judgment.

Unable, my Lords, as I am to concur in many of the views expressed in this detailed exposition of the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, I do not feel myself as called upon, neither do I consider it in fact as a proper course of proceeding, sitting here merely to review the judgment he has pronounced, to reply in any degree to what he has there stated. I cannot, however, refrain from noticing what I consider as the fundamental proposition on which the whole of the Lord Ordinary's reasoning appears to rest,—namely, “That there is no question now brought before the Court as to the legality of the Veto Act; and the civil rights, whether of the patron or presentee, will stand perfectly unscathed, notwithstanding all that has yet been done by the Commission of the General Assembly. The only question here is, shall this Court interfere with the proceedings of a proper church court, where that court, acting within its own province, is dealing with a proper ecclesiastical cause, and this, too, while that cause is still actually depending before them?” With what is thus pointedly affirmed, I am, upon the the most deliberate consideration, compelled totally to disagree, as it, on the contrary, appears manifest to me, that the Veto Act, and the civil rights both of the patron and presentee, are directly involved in, and are in reality the basis of, the whole petition and complaint which was presented to the Commission of the General Assembly; and that the departure from the enactment and regulations of that Act, in its proceedings, is the real charge made against the majority of the Presbytery of Garioch, and the conduct of Mr Middleton in availing himself thereof. If this can clearly be shown to be the case, it cannot surely be asserted, after what has been solemnly declared to be law, that the granting of the protection of this Court is an interference with the proceedings of a proper church court, acting within its own province, and dealing only with a proper ecclesiastical case. In order, however, to see how the case actually stands, it is necessary to attend to the circumstances under which the deliverance of the Commission complained of was applied for and obtained.

Something has been said as to the incompetency of our looking beyond the terms of the deliverance itself, in order to decide whether it is, in fact, competent for this Court to receive the note of suspension, or in any way to interfere in the case. I can, however, subscribe to no such doctrine, as I hold it to be perfectly legitimate to examine minutely the petition and complaint, which, as the sole foundation of the procedure, was presented to the Commission, and upon which its sentence or deliverance was pronounced. Although the parties have on both sides also referred largely to the minutes of the Presbytery in support of their different statements, I am not prepared to hold that it is equally necessary for this Court to follow them into that minute examination, as we are not here called upon to review those proceedings, in the proper sense of the term. They may, however, perhaps be referred to if necessary, in explanation of the statements in the complaint.

[After narrating the leading facts of the case, and quoting the complaint presented to the Commission, his Lordship proceeded.] If anything had been wanting to show that the real gravamen of this complaint,—(which bearing, as it expressly does, that it had “been craved by the agent for the said dissentients that the Presbytery should then take steps, in terms of the said Act ament calls, and of the instructions of the General Assembly thereanent, for the ultimate rejection of the said presentee,”)—was the disregard by the Presbytery of those dissentients,—and having actually inducted Mr Middleton, notwithstanding of them, and that comparatively little weight is attached to the refusal of the tender of special objections,—it is demonstrated by the primary prayer of the complaint, which craves warrant for service upon the members constituting the majority of the said Presbytery who voted on the motion sustaining the call, and concurring in the same, and appointed the said Rev. William Middleton to be admitted into the said parish, notwithstanding the said apparent majority of dissentients, and in disregard of the same. This leading and fundamental part of the prayer is followed, no doubt, by a reference to “the motion disregarding the dissentients and complaints of the minority, and the protests and appeals of the agents of the dissentients, upon the pretence that they were founded upon the Veto Act, which had been declared ultra vires of the Church, and whereby they declared the record closed, with the view of preventing special objections from being received, though tendered.” But, keeping what is above recited in view, and that the prayer is directed also against Mr Middleton, the presentee, who, it is said, “has closed with the said settlement, and accepted the same, notwithstanding of the dissentients above mentioned, and that it is perpetrated against the laws of the Church,”—it is utterly impossible to deny that the disregard of the Veto Act, and the refusal of the majority of the Presbytery to give effect to it, so far as to sist proceeding till the next General Assembly, are truly and substantially what is brought under the notice of the Commission in this complaint; and that the allegation of a violation of the laws of the Church is brought forward merely as a secondary consideration to elicit out the complaint.

But was this complaint dealt with by the Commission in its deliverance now before us, and which I need not read at length, as in reality relative to matters totally apart from, and in no way connected with the supposed violation of the Veto Act? Or is there an individual member of that Commission who will venture to assert that the deliverance of the 17th November, against which interdict is craved in the note of suspension, had no reference to the alleged departure from the Veto Act and its regulations, but was pronounced solely in respect of the other proceedings of the majority of the Presbytery, which are noticed in the complaint? The preamble of that deliverance is of itself sufficient to demonstrate the direct contrary bearing, as it does, that the Commission “took up the petition and complaint of the dissentient male heads of families and others in the parish of Culsamond, praying the Commission to grant warrant to serve this petition on the individual members constituting the majority of the Presbytery of Garioch.” The description of the complainers here given, applied undeniably to those only who are designated under the Veto Act as entitled to dissent; as, prior to that Act, no such denomination of persons was ever known throughout the country. The deliverance likewise bears:—“Farther, the Commission in the meantime, and until a final deliverance shall have been pronounced in regard to the proceedings complained of, did, and hereby do, interdict and prohibit the Rev. William Middleton from officiating and administering ordinances in the said parish, and authorise and enjoin the remanent members of the Presbytery of Garioch, not complained of, to meet forthwith to provide for the ministration of the word and sacraments in the parish of Culsamond, in the manner in which it shall appear to them competent, in the existing circumstances of said parish.” &c. Now, under these words, “in regard to the proceedings complained of,” it is impossible to dispute that every thing that is set forth in the complaint, as to a disregard of the dissentients under the Veto Act, is included. It is therefore out of all sight to hold for one moment that this deliverance can be viewed as solely applicable to supposed violations of the other known laws of the Church. We see the disregard of the Veto Act,—the Presbytery retracing its steps,—their refusal at last to give effect to it, as being ultra vires of the Church,—and their proceeding to the admission of Mr Middleton, notwithstanding an apparent majority of dissentients given against him, under the provisions of that Act, prominently brought forward as the grounds for calling for the extraordinary interference of the Commission; and, though other allegations are stated as to the violations of the Church, there is no pretence for maintaining that it was in reference to them alone that the Commission pronounced its deliverance. The suspenders are here opposed to the respondents, who demanded the interference of the Commission; and seeing what they have set forth as the special grounds for its interposition in their behalf, they cannot be tolerated in pretending that it was not at all because the Presbytery refused to give effect to the majority of dissentients without reasons, or in consequence thereof to take the necessary steps for the ultimate rejection of Mr Middleton, they had complained.

Had the deliverance pronounced by the Commission, which is the subject of complaint in the note of suspension, been truly meant to be confined to deviations merely on the part of the Presbytery from the laws of the Church, altogether apart from their disregard of the Veto Act, and the majority of dissentients without reasons under its operation, it ought to have been conceived in terms very different from those in which it is actually couched. Had it borne that the Commission, considering that, independently altogether of what had been set forth in the complaint as to the disregard and violation of the Veto Act and its regulations (which, having been found by the highest authority to be ultra vires of the Church, are now no longer operative,) the Presbytery of Garioch had apparently been guilty of a violation of the laws of the Church in their proceedings, and particularly in refusing to receive special objections with regard to the admission of the Rev. Mr Middleton, as assistant and successor in the parish of Culsamond, it therefore pronounced the deliverance as it now bears,—there might have been some foundation for holding that no question was now raised as to the legality or effects of the Veto Act; and that, as the deliverance related solely to an ecclesiastical matter, and was within the province of a church judicatory, the note of suspension was incompetent. But when the deliverance actually pronounced is compared with the petition and complaint, and the terms of its prayer, it is utterly impossible to view it in any such light.

The general terms in which the deliverance of the Commission is framed, whether purposely or not, can never warrant its being withdrawn from its direct connection with the matter set forth in the complaint, so as to entitle the respondents to convert their sweeping and prominent charges as to a violation of the well-known legislative act, under which the proceedings in regard to Mr Middleton were commenced and carried on from the moment his presentation was sustained, into a mere deviation from the laws of the Church in regard to the settlement of ministers. The well-known maxim, Dolus latet in generalibus, directly applies to such a construction being put on the deliverance in question. But I am fully persuaded that there was no real intention of so disposing of, or acting upon the complaint, as has been attempted to be maintained on the part of the respondents; but that the Commission had resolved to interfere in the manner expressed in their deliverance; and that, in fact, it was pronounced in reference to the whole subject matter, and most especially the avowed disregard of the Veto Act and its regulations, that had marked the conduct of the majority of the Presbytery in their later determination to proceed in the admission of Mr Middleton. It is impossible, therefore, for the respondents to be now permitted to shelter themselves under the generality of the terms in which the deliverance is framed, or that they can be entitled to maintain that it was pronounced altogether irrespectively of the veto law.

Keeping in view, then, the real nature of the petition and complaint which was presented by the dissentient male heads of families, and others, in the parish of Culsamond, and the sentence or deliverance pronounced thereon by the Commission of the General Assembly, it remains to be considered, whether the civil rights of the suspenders, now before this Court, are thereby affected or trenching upon. The presentation in favour of Mr Middleton, it is admitted, was granted by the undoubted patron, and was regularly sustained by the Presbytery. The patron and presentee were unquestionably, therefore, entitled to rely that their respective civil rights would be disposed of by the Presbytery in strict conformity with the statutory law in regard to the admission of ministers, and that neither the veto law, nor any other illegal proceeding, would be adopted, so as to interfere with Mr Middleton's admission as assistant and successor to the minister of Culsamond. The duty incumbent on the Presbytery and its component members is pointed out by the statute law of the land; and if they ultimately have conducted themselves in conformity therewith, they are unquestionably likewise entitled to its full protection. It cannot, however, be disguised, that, in their proceedings, after sustaining the presentation, the Presbytery commenced with acting contrary to law; and, in so far as it is necessary for us to give any opinion, I must unequivocally state, that I totally disapprove of the steps that were sanctioned by them, in giving effect to an act which the Church had taken upon itself to enact without lawful authority, and which has been solemnly determined, after the fullest and most deliberate consideration, to have been ultra vires, and utterly beyond the competency of the whole legislative power of the Church. Had those early proceedings of the Presbytery, which were resisted and protested against by the patron and presentee, been made the grounds of application to this Court for our interference, as amounting to a direct invasion of their civil rights, we must immediately have taken the necessary steps for affording them redress. But after having gone so far wrong,—probably from their being misled by the expectation that those persons who had, in fact, petitioned for Mr Middleton's appointment, and with whom they had been so long familiar,—would not afterwards have had the effrontery, and, I must add, dishonesty, to negative it by their dissents without reasons, there was still locus penitentiae for the majority of the Presbytery; and having accordingly stopped short, and resolved to proceed no farther under the Veto Act, but to discharge their legal duty to the presentee, by completing his admission according to law, the persons complained against are now entitled to the full protection of this Court, and to insist that they shall neither be removed from the exercise of their legal functions, nor degraded by having those functions conferred on the minority of their body for having acted merely in obedience to the law.

That Mr Middleton's civil rights, as well as those of the patron, are encroached upon and compromised by the deliverance of the Commission, appears to be clear beyond all doubt. He states that his admission was completed, notwithstanding the illegal attempt of his opponents, backed by the minority of the Presbytery, to defeat it by the application of the veto law,—to the effect, at least, of sisting all further proceedings till the next meeting of the General Assembly. Had this proposal been sanctioned by the majority, after it had been publicly announced that there was an apparent majority of dissents, without reasons, against him, and steps had been craved to be taken for his ultimate rejection in consequence, Mr Middleton was well aware of the fate that, in all probability, awaited him, as occurred in the sequel of that of the unfortunate presentee to the parish of Daviot, whose case was decided by the very last General Assembly, notwithstanding that their line of duty had been so plainly pointed out to them by the judgment of the House of Lords; for I find in the printed Acts of that venerable body, which have been referred to in this case, the following entry of the 28th May 1841:—"Parties having been heard, were removed: After reasoning, it was moved and seconded that the General Assembly sustain the reference: Find that there is a majority of male heads of families dissenting; and therefore instruct the Presbytery of Inverness to reject the presentee to Daviot, and intimate this sentence to the patron. The General Assembly, without a vote, agreed to this motion; when Mr Crawford, for the dissenting heads of families, communicants, took instruments, and craved extracts." The presentee who was thus disposed of, no less than three years after the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Auchterarder, admitted in this case to be authoritative law, is the same individual who formerly obtained from the Second Division an interdict against those same heads of families who were about to enter their dissents against him, without reasons, but which he had unhappily been induced to fall from and commit himself to their tender mercies, and those of the Presbytery, and was thus finally rewarded for his conduct. If the ordinary vehicles of public intelligence are to be relied on, the male heads of families in this parish have again exercised their power of dissenting, without reasons, against another presentee to the church of Daviot. That Mr Middleton had, therefore, the clearest right and interest to object to any such illegal sisting of his admission, is most manifest.

But nothing can be more evident than that his civil rights are directly violated by his being now interdicted and prohibited by the Commission, without even being heard, "from officiating and administering ordinances in the same parish;" while the members of the Presbytery, not complained of, are enjoined to meet forthwith to provide for the ministration of the word and sacraments in the parish of Culsamond." A gross stigma is thus fixed upon him and his sacred character as a minister of the gospel, which resting (as I hold it to be) altogether on illegal grounds, he is justly entitled to complain of, and to be protected against. Notwithstanding what has been said as to its still being competent for him to perform certain acts, for which I see no authority, I am satisfied that the deliverance was intended to prevent his doing anything, in the meantime, within the competency of his office, as the admitted assistant and successor in that parish. The head and front of his offending, therefore, which has led to his being so dealt with, consists in his having merely offered himself to the Presbytery for admission, in terms of his presentation, under his legal rights, and his refusal to submit himself to the operation of the Veto Act. As to the other reverend members of the Presbytery, it is not of their being merely cited, or ordained, to give in answers to the petition and complaint that they complain in the note of suspension, but of the manner in which they are dealt with in the deliverance, in having the minority of their own body appointed to meet and perform that duty, in regard to the parish of Cul-samond, as has already been pointed out. That this is not, in direct terms, a suspension of them from their official situation as regular members of this Presbytery, may no doubt be said; but it still clearly amounts to a degradation from their status and functions as established ministers, pronounced before they were heard for their interests, and which is continued against them, and thereby affects their general usefulness and respectability, and, as they maintain, for merely giving obedience to the declared law of the land. Such sentences, affecting, as they do, the respectability of the parochial clergy of Scotland, are productive of incalculable evil, as they must inevitably lead to a spirit of discontent and insubordination among the people under their charge. Their right to protection is, therefore, equally clear with that of their reverend brother, and no solid distinction can be made between their respective cases.

The whole proceedings of the Commission, in regard to so singular an application as this complaint of dissentient male heads of families, of which no similar example has been produced from the whole annals of the Church, seems, in reality, to have been intended to strike terror into the minds of the majority of this Presbytery, who, it was seen, had returned to a due sense of their duty, and probably, also, to prevent the contagion of their example from spreading in other quarters. If the unusual measure thus resorted to by the Commission, in stepping in between the appeals and complaints, which, they must presume, would be disposed of according to the laws of the Church, is to be defended on account of the supposed exigency of the case, the extraordinary nature of their deliverance entitles those aggrieved by it to call equally for the prompt interference of this Court. Pending appeals, which, according to what we have been told, must clearly be successful, and insure the overthrow of the whole proceedings of the Presbytery in the admission of Mr Middleton, the Commission strikes in by its despotism, interdicting an admitted minister from the exercise of his clerical functions, and putting the majority of the Presbytery under the ban of the Commission; and all this at the very time that the majority of the Presbytery is accused of disregarding an appeal that had been taken. Everything done by the Commission is reconcilable only with its impression, that here was the case of another Presbytery resolved to shake off all connection with the Veto Act, and to abide solely by the established laws of the Church. It was deemed necessary, therefore, that the Commission should act decisively, and not wait for the decision either of the Synod or of the General Assembly itself. I cannot, therefore, view the proceeding that it adopted as necessary merely to secure adherence to the ordinary laws of the Church; but, on the contrary, I consider it, though carefully framed and covered up to keep the Veto Act and its machinery as much as possible in the back-ground, as intended to preserve their full operation against the settlement of Mr Middleton.

From the manner in which the leading counsel for the respondents, in his able argument, spoke of the Veto Act, and the effect of the decision in the case of Auchterarder, one would have been led to suppose that the Church had, in reality, abandoned it, and no longer meant to enforce its operation in regard to any presentation to a benefice in Scotland. That, however, is very far from appearing to be the case, from the course adopted, not only in the very recent case of Daviot, as already noticed, but in this very one of Culsamond, as is demonstrated on the face of the complaint to the Commission; which shows that the Veto Act, even in that part of it admitted to have been found to be illegal, was applied and endeavoured to be enforced against the rights of Mr Middleton. It would have been well, indeed, for the Church itself, the peace of the country at large, and the best interests of true religion, had it acted on the views so properly indicated by its learned counsel, and conformed itself to the expectation expressed in these concluding words of the Lord Chancellor, in moving the affirmance of the judgment in the case of Auchterarder:—"If your Lordships shall concur in the opinions I have expressed, and by your decision inform the clergy of Scotland what the law really is, I cannot doubt but that they will, by their conduct and example, inculcate the sacred principle of obedience to the law,—of respect for the rights and interests of others,—and of the sacrifice of private feelings to the performance of a public duty." Instead, however, after this solemn affirmance, of betaking itself to the wholesome laws of the Church, expounded as they so clearly are, for its guidance, in the admirable compendium of its constitution, by the venerable Sir Henry Moncreiff, or acknowledging, in the words of an eminent leader himself,—“We have failed certainly and conclusively in obtaining a ratification of the veto law, and we have no hesitation in saying, that the first step of an outgoing from this position is the repeal of the veto law;” and adding, “this is the path of consistency and of honour, and we must not be deterred from it by the ill cry of course-minded imputation, or the ridicule of those opposed to us,”—it has since been resolved by the General Assembly not to repeal that veto law; it has been re-affirmed, with the regulations regarding it, as the Acts of last Assembly before us clearly prove; and wherever the presentee is opposed, he has either been rejected, or the case is sisted, and the parishes throughout the land left vacant, while ecclesiastical censures of the heaviest description have been poured out against all those who have merely performed their legal duty, and will not join in systematic opposition to the law of the land.

In this infatuated determination, then, we see the true source of all those proceedings that have taken place, and are continuing to agitate the country, and of which those with regard to Culsamond make a part; and because parties do not slavishly submit to have themselves and their rights trampled upon, under a law attempted to be enacted by the Church, directly interfering with acknowledged civil rights, and which has solemnly been adjudicated to be ultra vires of it, and contrary to the law of the land, but merely apply to this Court for protection, we are to be told that we are going beyond our jurisdiction, and usurping the powers of the Church, whose jurisdiction, forsooth, is supreme in all matters ecclesiastical, and which, of course, has the power of declaring what is ecclesiastical at its pleasure. But what is this but again bringing forward what was so fully discussed, and finally disposed of, in the case of Auchterarder? Is it really expected that this Court, after what has already passed, is to give any countenance, direct or indirect, to the operation of the veto law, or any part or portion of it? If the Church, or any of its members, entertain any such absurd conception, the sooner they get rid of it the better; for I am confident that this Court will continue, as it has done, as Judges sworn duly to administer the law, to disregard and check every attempt to enforce that Act, or any of its provisions, and to protect, in the full enjoyment of their legal rights, all persons whatsoever against whom the censures or punishments of the Church may be attempted to be hurled for giving obedience to the law.

The Presbyterian form of the Church government of Scotland having unquestionably been established by the authority of the Legislature,—its Confession of Faith having been sanctioned by express Statute,—the endowments of the ministers of its parishes having generally been provided for under the same authority, and various Statutes having been passed recognising in the clearest terms the rights of patrons to present qualified ministers to such parishes, and containing special injunctions as to how presbyteries shall proceed in the discharge of their duty with regard to their admission,—it may fairly be asked, whether those Statutes are or are not to have effect? Can it for one moment be maintained, that the Statutes above alluded to, expressed as they are in terms equally clear and explicit as any others in the Statute-book, are to be held pro non scriptis, or as wholly nugatory and inoperative? or is there the slightest pretence for asserting that, in acting upon them in the discharge of their sacred duty, the Judges of the land are transgressing the bounds of their proper jurisdiction, or usurping a right to interfere with spiritual matters that belong solely to the ecclesiastical courts? According to every principle of law, justice and sound reason, the answers to such questions must be given in the negative,—it being plainly the bounden duty of the civil court to interpret and give effect to the Statutes in question, in the same manner as they are bound to do with regard to any other legislative enactment whatever that involves the civil rights of the subjects of the realm. As to the idea that the statutory enactments relative to the rights of patrons, or the duties of presbyteries, as to the admission of qualified presentees, are to be viewed as in their nature encroachments on the spiritual rights and independence of the Church, it can afford no ground of objection in a court of law, when called upon to support the civil rights of patrons or presentees, as the Church ought to have opposed the passing of the law when enacted, instead of having, for so long a period, partaken and enjoyed the benefit and protection that were secured to it as the Established, and certainly not as a Voluntary or Independent Church.

It is the most unfounded, therefore, of all assumptions, to hold that, in merely giving effect to the Statutes in question, this Court is, in the slightest degree, trespassing on the proper spiritual rights or functions of the Church as by law established. If the Church only walks according to the express terms of the Statutes by which it is, both collectively and individually, as effectually bound as any other incorporated body of the State, there can be no occasion for ever calling for the interference of civil authority; but when these Statutes are directly violated, or set openly at defiance, then it becomes necessary that those who are guilty of such breaches of the law, shall be taught that they cannot so act with safety, let their cry of the spiritual functions of the Church being thereby invaded be ever so loud and clamorous.

Before adverting more particularly to the clear exposition of the law, afforded by the judgment of the House of Lords, affirming the decision of this Court in the case of Auchterarder, it is necessary to attend to the position on which some stress has been laid in the argument for the respondents, as to the alleged deviation from the established laws of the Church in regard to the refusal to receive special objections at the time they were alleged to have been tendered to the Presbytery of Garioch; and as to what has also been stated as to the departure from the standing law established by the Act of the Assembly 1732, having warranted the interference of the Commission.

It will be seen from the printed Acts of the last General Assembly, that they contain an "Overture and Interim Act, with regulations for carrying into effect the Act of Assembly, May 29, 1835, anent the calling of ministers;" and though those regulations have undergone some modification since the veto law was first passed, yet others, nearly similar in their terms, were sanctioned and enacted by the same authority, for carrying that Act into effect from its first commencement. These regulations are, therefore, part and parcel of the veto law itself; and it will be seen from the speech of the Lord Chancellor, in the case of Auchterarder, that he so considered and dealt with them throughout as part of that legislative enactment which the Church had attempted to pass. The House of Lords, however, having unequivocally decided that the veto law, in regard to the admission of ministers, was altogether ultra vires of the Church, and consequently wholly inoperative, it necessarily follows, that no presentee can legitimately be made to suffer by the application of any provision of that law, or its concomitant regulations, as a bar to his admission by a presbytery under a legal presentation. It is utterly in vain, therefore, to tell your Lordships that these regulations for carrying into effect the Veto Act are, in fact, transcripts of resolutions that were proposed to the General Assembly in 1834, by Dr Cook, before it was enacted. Whether these regulations were or were not consonant to the law and practice of the Church, is, in fact, of very little importance in the present question; because, instead of their being adopted as a code of procedure for the future admission of ministers, they were negatived by the Assembly, and in lieu of them, that Act, with the regulations for carrying it into effect, which has been found to be altogether ultra vires of the Church, was substituted.

But even if those regulations, which clearly make part of the veto law, could be appealed to by the respondents, it appears, from what is stated in their complaint, that they could not avail them in maintaining that the majority of the Presbytery have been guilty of the wrong that is asserted, in not receiving and acting upon the tender of their special objections. For it is thus provided, in the 6th and 7th regulations, enacted on the 31st of May 1841,—“That if the Presbytery shall find that there is not a majority of persons on the roll dissenting, and if no special objections be stated, they shall sustain the call, and proceed to the trials and settlement according to the rules of the Church: But, if the Presbytery shall find that there is a major part of the persons on the roll dissenting, they shall reject the person presented, so far as regards the particular presentation, and the occasion of that vacancy in the parish, and shall, within two days thereafter, intimate this their determination to the patron, the presentee, and elders of the parish.

“7. That if, at the meeting for moderating in the call, dissents by a majority on the roll shall not be stated; and if any special objections to the settlement of the person presented, of whatever nature such objections may be, shall then be stated to the Presbytery by any person entitled to object by the general laws of the Church, and if such objections appear to be deserving of deliberate consideration or investigation, the Presbytery shall delay the further proceedings in the settlement till another meeting, to be then appointed, not later than eight days thereafter, and give notice apud acta to all parties concerned then to attend, that they may be heard.”

Recollecting, then, that the respondents themselves expressly state that, prior to the slightest hint being given of their even having had it in contemplation to give in special objections, their dissents, without reasons, against Mr Middleton had been received and entered on the record, and a public announcement made that there was an apparent majority of such dissents against him, and that their agent accordingly craved the Presbytery to adopt the necessary steps for his ultimate rejection,—it is plain, upon the face of the regulations themselves, that the then tendering of special objections is an entire departure from their express terms. Even, therefore, if those regulations were to be held as ever so binding, the Presbytery, at the time when it is said the objections were tendered, were not bound to receive them; but resolved, as the majority had become, to act no longer under the veto law, but to proceed in the discharge of their statutory duties in the admission of the presentee,—they are entitled to maintain that they were guilty of no violation of the laws of the Church, in doing, as they did, in strict obedience to the laws of the land; for their constitutional duty as to the proper time of receiving special objections, and which the Presbytery duly performed, is clearly defined in Principal Hill's Institutes of the Church, p. 207, where, after stating that at any time during the trials of a presentee, the inhabitants of a parish may present a libel against him, charging him with immorality or unsoundness of doctrine, and that the Presbytery is not to proceed to the settlement till it is discussed (nothing of the sort having been dreamt of in the present case), he adds:—“After the trials of the presentee are finished, all who have any objections to his life or doctrine are summoned by a paper read from the pulpit, which we call an edict, to appear on the day appointed for his ordination, which is at the distance of not less than ten days from the reading of the edict, and may then, without the formality of a libel, state their objections as matters of charge. The charge will be disregarded by the Presbytery if it is frivolous; and as proof must be instantly adduced, the edict does not afford any occasion of vexatious delay, but it gives persons, the most unacquainted with the forms of business, an opportunity of stating their personal knowledge of any circumstance, in the character and conduct of the presentee, which renders him unworthy of being a minister of the gospel; and, by exhibiting the jealousy with which the constitution of our Church watches over the qualifications of entrants, it furnishes a lesson of circumspection to all who direct their views to the Church.”

In regard, again, to the supposed violation of the injunctions of the Act of Assembly 1732, in requiring, that after appeals are taken, the actual admission of a minister is to stop short till they are disposed of, the true meaning of that regulation is well explained in the passage from Lord Bankton, which has been laid before us. The evil to which that learned author alludes, seems no longer, however, to influence those who take a lead in questions of this nature, or who give countenance to the new-fashioned doctrine as to the supposed distinction between officium and beneficium, in regard to ministers of the Established Church of Scotland,—a doctrine which will probably not soon receive the deliberate sanction of your Lordships. But, not to dwell on this point at present, the Act of Assembly 1732 must be held to have contemplated appeals only that are founded upon grounds consistent, not only with the laws of the Church, but the laws of the realm. If the Veto Act, then, as to a departure from which the appeals were taken against the proceedings of the majority of this Presbytery, is in itself utterly illegal and inoperative, those appeals against the disregard of it cannot fairly be held to fall within the injunction of the Act of Assembly in question. It is, at any rate, obvious, that its violation is not specially set forth as a ground of the complaint; and as to the assertion of any other departure from the general laws of the Church, it has already been sufficiently adverted to.

As to the weight due to the legitimate effect of the judgment in the case of Auchterarder,—in the decision which, in my opinion, ought to be pronounced in this case,—I feel it to be unnecessary to enlarge at any great length. I shall not, therefore, refer minutely to the particulars of that important case, which are generally so well known, further than to direct attention to the words in which, in the authoritative reports prepared under the eye of the House of Lords, and regularly transmitted by its direction for the guidance of this Court, the argument maintained by the appellants, the Presbytery of Auchterarder, backed by the Church itself, is introduced:—“Two questions had to be considered: (1.) Whether the General Assembly were competent to pass cum effectu the interim Act of 2d June 1834? And, (2.) Whether, supposing that such interim Act was alleged to be ultra vires of the General Assembly, the Court of Session had power to entertain the question of its legality?”

In the disposal of the questions thus raised for the determination of the House of Lords, and more particularly set forth in the appellants' pleas in law, reference was made by the counsel for the respondents in this case to certain isolated passages to be found in the opinions of the Lord Chancellor and Lord Brougham in delivering judgment, as favourable to part of their argument; but, upon a careful perusal of the whole of what these learned Lords have stated in so luminous a manner, it appears to me that they afford the most decisive authority, in regard both to the illegality of the veto law itself and its enacted regulations, and to every thing that has been urged against the jurisdiction of this Court concerning it.—[After quoting to this effect from the speeches, his Lordship proceeded.]

Notwithstanding the above opinions, that were followed by the affirmation, on the 3d May 1839, of the judgment of this Court in the Auchterarder case, it has been said that that decision only determined the point which was raised by the summons. This, in one sense, may no doubt be judicially stated; but, nevertheless, it is manifest, from the way and manner in which the whole questions, both as to the jurisdiction of this Court, and the power of the Church, in its legislative capacity, to pass the Veto Act as a binding law with regard to the exercise of patronage, were raised and discussed in this Court, and finally decided in the House of Lords, it is utterly impossible to deny that the total illegality of the whole measure was conclusively determined. No reduction of that enactment, as seemed to be hinted at, was therefore necessary to be instituted. The idea, indeed, of the necessity of raising a reduction of that or any other enactment of the Church, which is directly contrary to the statute law of the land, appears to me to be utterly preposterous,—it being enough, that whenever any such enactment is founded upon as a justification of an encroachment on a civil right, it should be resisted in a court of law, which is imperatively called upon instantly to disregard it. After so clear and authoritative an exposition of the whole law, truly applicable to the present case, as has been afforded by the above opinions in the Court of last resort, I feel altogether averse from entering upon any examination of the Statutes and authorities which are so well known, and which have been again commented upon at such length, in regard to the power of this Court to interfere under the present note of suspension and interdict. Your Lordships, in this Division, have had too much occasion to show what your opinions are, in the various proceedings which have followed, in regard both to the case of Auchterarder itself, and to those which have taken place as to the case of Marnoch, and the discussions relative to the Presbytery of Strathbogie. Holding that your Lordships' decisions have given due effect to what was determined by the judgment of the House of Lords, and concurring, as I entirely do, in the propriety of the solemn assurance you thereby afforded that the law must be carried into full execution, I have only to observe that I had an opportunity, along with this Division, of expressing my opinion with regard to the breach of interdict that was committed in the case of Lethendy, and in which there again arose the fullest discussion in regard to the question of jurisdiction, and the competency of this Court in proceeding as it did in that case. To that opinion I still adhere in all respects; as I also do to the whole of the opinion which I had occasion to deliver in the case of Auchterarder, to a part of which the opening counsel for the respondents in this case thought proper to refer. I can find, however, no inconsistency whatsoever between that opinion and the views which now influence me in the present case; and I had another opportunity of acting upon the precise same grounds, when the Second Division unanimously granted interdict against certain of the male heads of families of the parish of Daviot, who had avowed their intention to dissent, without reasons, against the admission of a presentee, convinced, as we all were, that it was better to prevent a wrong from being done, than to apply a remedy after its completion.

I must here observe, before leaving the case of Lethendy, that the opinions of Lords Medwyn and Cuninghame, in that case, are most important in regard to the matter of jurisdiction. Their diligence and research have accumulated a host of authorities, applying most pointedly to the discussion which has again been raised on the present occasion in regard to that question; and I should have wished, indeed, to have seen the authorities, which are there referred to, fairly grappled with in argument, as they certainly appear to me to be of the most decisive importance. I have no intention, however, of again referring to them at any length, or of recalling to your Lordships' recollection the passages which have been already cited from the works of Mr Erskine and Lord Bankton, but shall content myself with here quoting one passage from Lord Bankton's Institute, as I am doubtful whether it has yet been prominently brought under our notice. In the 25th section of the 22d title of his fourth book, he thus expresses himself:—“It may therefore be questioned how, at present, we are safe against such abuses by our General Assembly, as perhaps they may usurp a jurisdiction that may not belong to them, against which there does not lie an appeal. The answer is, that no execution can follow on the decrees of the ecclesiastical courts, other than church censure for disobedience; and if they should presume to intermeddle in civil matters without their sphere (as it is not imagined they will), I do not see but redress will be competent, by suspension or reduction, before the Court of Session; or a prohibition might be granted, in way of advocacy, inhibiting them to proceed in such matters.” The application of this authority, in regard to the proceedings now under consideration, is most direct, as the attempt to apply the veto law of the Church, as a bar to the admission of a legal presentee, is not only an usurpation of jurisdiction, and a meddling with civil matters, but a direct violation of civil rights, which can properly only be redressed under the authority of this Court. In reference to the same point, I may here also refer to the words of Sir George Mackenzie, who thus expresses himself in his Observations, Vol. II. p. 439:—“The Lords are still allowed to suspend the decrees of the Admiral in præsentia, or by three Lords in the vacance, which is hardly to be reconciled with its being a sovereign court; and yet, in some cases, the Lords suspend the decrees of the Justice Court, and of the Commission of the Kirk, which are certainly sovereign courts.” Such were the views of this author, written towards the close of the seventeenth century.

The above passages may be considered as affording a sufficient answer to what has been urged with regard to the alleged supreme and exclusive jurisdiction of the church courts in matters purely ecclesiastical. The pretence of that jurisdiction being founded on divine authority, has no longer been maintained in argument; and however indisputable it may be supposed to be, in regard to what is confessedly a matter purely spiritual or ecclesiastical, that can in no degree countenance the power arrogated by the Church, to declare, of its own authority, what is truly of that nature. Whenever a proceeding can be shown to trench directly upon a civil right, whether it has emanated from the Church in its legislative or judicial capacity, and, especially, if it is stated to be in violation of the law of the land, by which the Church itself is alone established, it can, in the nature of things, only be in the Supreme Civil Court where the question as to the civil right can be adjudicated. To suppose that the Church itself has only to resolve what shall be held to be an ecclesiastical or spiritual matter, and that that is sufficient to withdraw it entirely from the cognizance of this Court, and compel parties, whose civil rights are thereby prejudiced, slavishly to submit to it, is a proposition utterly extravagant, and contrary to the plainest principles of national jurisprudence. To expect that those who are aggrieved, by an obstinate persistence in the exact same course of proceeding that has been declared to be utterly illegal by the only tribunal on earth that is entitled to decide, are pusillanimously to acquiesce, and refrain from applying to a court of law for protection,—and that our interference is to be proclaimed throughout the land by the members of that very Church which is established and maintained by the Statutes of the realm, as an undue usurpation of power, and encroachment on the supreme jurisdiction of the Church,—is so extravagant a proposition as hardly to be expected to be maintained by any man of rational understanding. The interpretation of all Statutes whatsoever, which embrace the civil rights of the subject, must necessarily proceed from the Supreme Civil Court; and it is contrary to all principle to hold that any ecclesiastical court can possess any thing like co-ordinate jurisdiction in any such matter. Its province is confined to what is purely ecclesiastical or spiritual, as is evident from every word of its own Confession of Faith,—which stands sanctioned by the authority of the Legislature, and which as directly recognises the authority of the civil magistrate as it does that of the Church itself.

As to the childish idea that this Court is in collision with, or, by the judicial determinations it is called upon to pronounce, is entering into competition with the General Assembly as to jurisdiction, or is anxious to interfere in such questions as the present, and the many others which have been raised since 1834 (though, for the preceding century, few had ever arisen), I shall only say, and I believe I speak the unanimous sentiments of the Court, that nothing has been more contrary to its wishes than to have been called upon to adjudicate in any one of them. Let the Church only confine itself to matters that are truly of an ecclesiastical nature, avoiding all interference with civil rights, and in no respect fly in the face of statutory law, or attempt particularly to subvert the law of patronage by its own authority, and there will neither be applications made for the protection of the civil power, nor any interference whatever on the part of this Court, which can by possibility be construed into an attempt to encroach upon the privileges of the Church or any of its courts. But whenever we are called upon to support the civil rights of our fellow subjects—to enforce obedience to the Statutes of the realm—and to protect, from acts of manifest injustice and oppression, those who have merely given obedience to the law,—the Church may depend upon it that this Court will be prepared to perform its own duty, whether those who demand its interference are clergymen or laymen.

Relying on the clear and unalterable determination of the House of Lords as to the utter worthlessness of the veto law of 1834, in affording any bar whatever to the admission of a legally qualified presentee to any parish in Scotland, every patron and presentee, whenever met by an attempt in any presbytery to apply its enactments or regulations to their case, unless they are ready tamely to surrender their undoubted rights, are entitled instantly to apply for the protection of the law; and as the patron and presentee of the parish of Culsamond stand as much entitled to it as those in the case of Auchterarder were,—upon what ground are they to be precluded from calling upon this Court to afford it? In the latter case, the patron and presentee were under the necessity of asserting their legal rights by means of a formal action of declarator, accompanied also by other important conclusions. That course, however, is no longer necessary; and the present application for the suspension and interdict of this Court, to prevent the completion of an egregious wrong, and to preserve an admitted minister in the possession of his vested civil right and ecclesiastical status, and at same time to avert the degradation of his co-presbyters for having merely given obedience to the law, is perfectly competent, as the proper judicial remedy under existing circumstances.

It has been already noticed, that after the apparent majority of dissents had been announced, and an actual demand made on behalf of the dissentients, that the necessary steps should, in consequence, be taken for the ultimate rejection of Mr Middleton, the motion to proceed, notwithstanding, to his admission, was met by a counter motion to sist further procedure till the next General Assembly,—which the supporters of it were fully aware, from what had taken place in the late case of Daviot, would, in all probability, have annihilated the rights of Mr Middleton. The majority of the Presbytery having become, at length, sensible of the illegality of giving any effect whatever to the Veto Act, were fully justified, therefore, in proceeding to the induction, having called repeatedly for any special objections after the reading of the edict, and none having been offered. The completion of that necessary step has conferred upon Mr Middleton the full status of regular assistant and successor to the minister of Culsamond, which can never be affected by the application of the veto law to his case, so long as the arm of the law can be exerted for his protection; and his claim, therefore, to prevent inversion of possession, attempted by the deliverance of the Commission, becomes the more clearly founded in substantial justice. As any attempt on the part of the Church, in the event of the death of Mr Ellis, the minister of the parish, to oust Mr Middleton, under pretended exercise of the jus devolutum, would be utterly nugatory and inept, his right to demand protection in the possession of all his functions, justly warrants him, therefore, in claiming the benefit of the interdict now craved.

The true question, then, presented for our decision in this case, divested of all extraneous matter, is one far narrower than what would appear from the extent of the discussion to which it has led: that most probably arose from the views of the Lord Ordinary, as developed in his note, having led to their being dissected and enlarged upon by the counsel for the suspenders, who were necessarily followed by those of the respondents. But holding, as I do, that the attempt by his opponents to arrest the settlement of Mr Middleton—persisted in, as it was, till the last act of his admission—was bottomed principally, if not solely, on the application of the veto law, and the concomitant regulations, which are manifestly a part of its machinery, and that that law, as a legislative act of the Church, has been declared wholly abortive,—the right of those aggrieved by the extraordinary and unprecedented interference of the Commission of the General Assembly, to apply for protection, flows directly from the solemn determination of the law, promulgated by the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Auchterarder. Any attempt, therefore, to give the case a different aspect, and to represent what has been done by the Commission, in reference to the complaint of the dissentient heads of families of the parish of Culsamond, as a mere exercise of ecclesiastical jurisdiction in a purely spiritual matter, rests, in my opinion, on the most manifest sophistry, and amounts, indeed, to a begging of the whole question. It has been emphatically propounded, that, as applied to the admission of a minister to a parochial charge in Scotland—the duty of a presbytery with regard to which is designated by express Statutes—the veto law, in all its parts, as enacted in 1834, is in reality of no more legal value than a piece of waste paper, and that any attempt to use it as a bar to the taking on trials and admission of a qualified presentee, is a direct invasion of civil right, as to which this Court possesses undoubted jurisdiction, altogether irrespective of the powers of the church courts to judge of the qualifications of a presentee, or to decide in cases that relate solely to spiritual concerns. The Church is, in one word, utterly powerless in attempting to subvert, by its own authority, the law of patronage, which is a matter regulated by the statutory law of the land, and to which, till it is altered by the Legislature of the State, implicit obedience must be given by all men whatsoever.

Friendly, then, as I unfeignedly am, to the true welfare and prosperity of the Church of Scotland as by law established, and anxious to see its speedy return to the condition of universal respect in which it stood previous to the rash and ill-advised measure of 1834, I am decidedly of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be altered,—that the note should be passed, and that the interdict should be granted, in terms of the prayer of the note of suspension.

Lord Gillies.—The question which we have now to decide is certainly one of importance. It has naturally excited a great deal of interest; and any judgment that we pronounce in it may be attended with consequences in which the public is deeply interested. For these reasons I have felt it my duty to bestow upon it careful and full consideration; and we have all the satisfaction of reflecting, that we have been powerfully aided by the learned and ingenious argument which we have heard from the bar, and of which I shall endeavour to avail myself in the observations with which I have now to trouble the Court. These, I trust, will not occupy a great deal of your Lordships' time; for the case, however important, does not, in the view which I take of it, require a lengthened discussion. I say this, because it does appear to me that the present case is settled by recent decisions, forming precedents which we are bound to follow, unless altered or reversed (which none of them have been) by a superior tribunal. On many cases of an older date that occur, and on Acts of Parliament referred to, I do not think it will be necessary for me to trouble your Lordships with any remarks.

In the learned, elaborate, and ingenious note with which the Lord Ordinary has favoured us, his Lordship states that he lays aside, unqualifiedly, "all that was either said or done in the Court of Presbytery as to matter connected with the Veto Act." Could I follow his Lordship's example in this respect, I must own it would tend to simplify the case. But I cannot lay aside the Act of Assembly 1834-5, commonly, and very properly I think, called the Veto Act; and as to which it has been found that it was illegal, and ultra vires of the Assembly. I cannot lay aside an Act in which it appears to me most evident that the whole proceedings on the part of the respondents originated, and which it was the manifest and avowed object of all that was said and done by them in the Presbytery, to enforce and to carry into effect; and by which, therefore, in my humble opinion, the whole proceedings at the instance of the respondents—from the first step to the last—from the first meeting of Presbytery on 22d September down to the deliverance by the Commission of Assembly—are tainted and vitiated. It is impossible for me, then, to lay aside the Veto Act, or to discard from my mind all that was said or done in the Presbytery as to matters connected with that Act. Were I to do so, in truth nothing would remain; for, in my opinion, so far as regards the minority of the Presbytery or the respondents, nothing was said or done in the Presbytery except in relation to that Act, or matters connected with it. If I were to adopt the suggestion in the note, I should therefore be obliged, or rather I should feel myself at liberty, to lay aside the whole case, and to regard the objections taken by the minority to the proceedings or resolutions of the Presbytery as a mere blank—a nonentity. In short, the proceedings of the minority of the Presbytery was just an attempt, or a series of attempts, to give effect to the Veto Act—an Act inconsistent with, and intended to defeat, the civil right of patronage. This is the conclusion at which I think your Lordships must arrive on carefully attending to what was done in the Presbytery.

First of all, then, it is necessary to keep distinctly in view the procedure which has taken place in this case, particularly the proceedings of the Presbytery.—(After narrating the proceedings of the first meeting on 22d September 1841, his Lordship proceeded.)

Thus parties were fairly at issue; the one stating truly that the Veto Act was illegal, and should therefore be disregarded; and the other insisting that the same Act should be obeyed and enforced. It is scarcely necessary to observe that this was a most improper attempt. It is now admitted in this Court that the Veto Act is illegal; and it is abundantly obvious that any attempt to enforce it must be at least equally illegal. This term "illegal" was found fault with. The term seems to me to be an appropriate one when applied to the Veto Act itself; and, in speaking of the conduct of those who attempt to enforce and to compel obedience to that Act, I do think it is the most gentle term that can be used.

But to proceed with the minutes of the Presbytery, which go on as follows:—(His Lordship quoted the two motions,—the one to proceed with the settlement, the other to sist procedure,—and the carrying of the former.)

It may be proper to pause for a moment here. In all the proceedings hitherto, it will be observed that the whole contest lay betwixt the Veto Act on the one hand, and the established law and practice of the Church on the other hand. The friends of the Veto Act first proposed to carry it directly into effect by rejecting Mr Middleton. Failing in this, they moved that the case be referred to the General Assembly,—a motion directly at variance with the settled usage of the Church, and for which, setting aside the Veto Act, no ground, or even pretext, whatever was assigned.

It was at this stage of the proceedings, as appears from the minutes, that Mr Garioch dissented, and protested for leave to complain to the Synod in his own name, and in that of all who may adhere to him; and afterwards Mr Mitchell took an appeal to the Synod. The sentence from which Mr Garioch dissented is that which is embodied in the first motion, which I read a little while ago,—it being the only sentence the Presbytery could regularly pronounce in terms of the rules and usage of the Church previous to the Veto Act. This, then, was just a complaint and an appeal against the proceedings of the Presbytery in disregard of that illegal enactment. The Presbytery did not, and could not, pay any attention to this appeal. They considered it, and in law were entitled to consider it, as an impossibility that the Synod should countenance any attempt to enforce the Veto Act; and so, virtually and in substance, disobey and reverse the judgment of this Court and the House of Lords. It may be further observed, that the reference to the General Assembly, moved by Mr Mitchell, was altogether unconstitutional and irregular. In Hill's Practice (p. 30), it is stated,—“A reference cannot be made to the Supreme Court, if any court superior to that from which the reference proceeds meets before it.” Now, the Synod, in this case, was to meet before the General Assembly; and because this unconstitutional reference was negatived, Messrs Garioch and Mitchell complained and appealed to the Synod.

It is of importance to observe, that this meeting of 28th October was held for the express purpose of moderating in a call. At the previous meeting of 6th October, it was intimated “that the Presbytery will meet at the church of Culsamond, for moderating in a call to the said presentee, on Thursday the 28th current, and to hold public worship at the usual hour.”

By the established practice of the Church, except in so far as altered by the Veto Act, it was a meeting merely ad hunc effectum. The only way in which the Presbytery could perform its duty, or carry into effect the express, and in law, the exclusive object of the meeting, was by adopting the first motion, to sustain the call, to which no objections were made, and appoint the edict to be served. And how was this motion met? Why, by another motion to sist procedure, and report to the General Assembly; or, in other words, that the Presbytery should decline to perform its duty. This motion was rejected, and the first motion was carried. And then came forward Messrs Garioch and Mitchell, and protested, and complained and appealed to the Synod for redress. In admitting or listening to this appeal, it is evident that the Presbytery would have betrayed its duty just as much as if it had adopted the second motion.

In short, on the part of the minority of the Presbytery, the manifest object of all the proceedings I have hitherto mentioned was originally to get Mr Middleton rejected in terms of the Veto Act; and having failed in that object, they next attempted, by means of the same Veto Act, to prevent or delay his settlement,—1st, by moving a report to the Assembly; and, 2d, by an appeal, equally efficacious in point of delay, to the Synod;—thus defeating the presentation in Mr Middleton's favour, and depriving him for an indefinite time, perhaps permanently, of the benefice or status to which, by the established practice of the Church prior to the Veto Act, he was entitled,—no objection being made to his call to be immediately admitted.

These considerations seem to me conclusive. But whatever may be thought of them, this much is clear, that the Veto Act was the sole ground assigned, and the only ground that could or can possibly be assigned, either for sisting procedure and reporting to the Assembly, or for the complaint and appeal to the Synod.

In this state of matters, the following motion was made:— "That as the dissent and complaint of the minority, and the protest and appeal by the agent for the dissentients, against proceeding to receive and admit Mr William Middleton, the presentee, are founded on the Veto Act, which has been declared ultra vires of the Church, and illegal, the said dissent and complaint, and the appeal are inept and incompetent, and ought not to bar the execution of the Presbytery's finding,—the Presbytery accordingly proceed to the induction on Thursday, the 11th day of November, and that the record be now closed."

The propriety of this motion does not seem to me to admit of dispute, and, in truth, it was not disputed by the minority of the Presbytery. But at this stage of the proceedings, they again had recourse to the Veto Act, and resorted to a device for defeating the presentation, suggested by that Act. "Mr David Mitchell," as appears from the minutes, "now tendered special objections to the fitness of the presentee; and it was moved that the said objections be received and discussed."

Here it is necessary to attend to the established, and I believe, the admitted usage of the Church prior to the Veto Act. It will be recollected that it was at the meeting for moderating in a call that these special objections were offered. Now, at that meeting it is certain that no such special objections could be received by the Presbytery. On the contrary, the Presbytery at that meeting always did, as was done at this meeting; they appoint an edict to be served after an interval of some days, calling upon all the people who object to the presentee to come forward and state their objections, which cannot, therefore, be stated or received until after the service of the edict. It appears, indeed, to have been held, that if the objections were accompanied by a libel, they might, at any time, and before the service of the edict, be received by the Presbytery. In particular, this seems to have been the opinion of the late Dr Hill; and in referring to such high authority, I think it right to give it in his own words. "The second way in which the constitution of our Church provides for the voice of the people being legally heard in the admission of their minister, is by giving the inhabitants of a parish a right to appear as accusers of the presentee. At any time during the course of his trials, they may give into the Presbytery a libel, charging him with immorality of conduct, or unsoundness of doctrine. When they present a libel, they bind themselves, under pain of ecclesiastical censure, to prove it; but the Presbytery is not at liberty to proceed to the settlement till the libel be discussed. After the trials of the presentee are finished, all who have any objections to his life or doctrine are summoned, by a paper read from the pulpit, which we call an edict, to appear on the day appointed for his ordination, which is at the distance of not less than ten days from the reading of the edict, and may then, without the formality of a libel, state their objections as master of charge."

Here it will be observed, that great care is taken to prevent undue delay by a wanton or vexatious tender of special objections. First, they must be accompanied by a libel; and, secondly, the objectors bind themselves, under the pain of ecclesiastical censure, to prove them.

Mr Dunlop's authority is to the same effect. But, in one respect, he differs from Dr Hill, and seems to doubt whether, at the meeting for moderating in a call, special objections can be received to the effect of delaying a settlement, even although accompanied by a regular libel. His words are—(Dunlop, § 239). There are other authorities to the same effect in the Compendium of the Laws of the Church by Mr Peterkin.

As to this matter, an important change was no doubt made by the first Veto Act in 1834. That Act was accompanied by regulations having the following title:—"Overture, with Regulations for carrying the above Act into effect." Regulation 4 is in these words:—"That it shall be competent (on the day appointed for moderating in the call) to any one or more of the male heads of families in the parish, in full communion with the church, by themselves or by an agent duly authorised, to state any special objections to the settlement of the person presented, of whatever nature such objections may be."

These regulations for carrying into effect the Veto Act were repeated in 1835, with some variations which it is unnecessary to notice. In 1836, however, an alteration of some consequence was introduced. By the previous Acts, the special objections were to be first considered and judged of, and then the arbitrary dissents of the male heads of families were to be received. But this order was now reversed. It probably occurred that it would have an awkward appearance if the persons, whose special objections had been overruled, should afterwards have it in their power to give effect to them against the presentee by arbitrary dissents. The regulations in 1836, therefore, provided that arbitrary dissents should, in the first place, be received, and that, if the Presbytery shall find that there is at least a major part of the persons on the roll dissenting, they shall reject the person presented.

Then, as to the special objections, this regulation follows:—"That if, at the meeting for moderating in the call, dissents by a majority on the roll shall not be stated, and if any special objections to the settlement of the person presented, of whatever nature such objections may be, shall then be stated to the Presbytery by any person entitled to object by the general laws of the Church; and if such objections appear to be deserving of deliberate consideration or investigation, the Presbytery shall delay the farther proceedings in the settlement till another meeting to be then appointed, not later than eight days thereafter, and give notice apud acta to all parties concerned then to attend, that they may be heard."

It may be remarked, that in terms of this clause, it is only in the event of dissents by a majority on the roll not being stated, that special objections are authorised. Now, it will be recollected that, in this case, dissents by a majority had been stated, and therefore the special objections were not offered in terms of this regulation. I do not state this as a matter of much consequence; and, indeed, by a subsequent regulation, not very consistent with the one above quoted, it is declared,—"That the Presbytery shall not receive such special objections in any case, until after it has been finally ascertained whether there are dissents by a majority of the persons on the roll; but it shall always be competent, as soon as this is ascertained, to state special objections."

Taking it for granted that this regulation fully authorised the tender of special objections in this case, and ordered the Presbytery to receive and consider them, the whole thing appears to me to be of no consequence. For how does the case stand? By the established practice of the Church, it was not competent for the Presbytery to delay the settlement by receiving and considering special objections at the meeting for moderating in a call. This was altered by the Veto Act. Be it so: But the Veto Act was found and is admitted to be illegal. Oh, but it is said that this regulation as to special objections forms no proper part of the Veto Act, but is merely one of those rules which the Assembly is entitled to make regarding the proceedings of inferior judicatories. All this is very well, and might afford a pretext—though a very shallow pretext—for the argument which has here been maintained. But the respondents totally overlook and forget the title given by the Assembly to the regulations upon which they found:—viz., "Regulations for carrying into effect the Act of Assembly, May 29, 1835, on the calling of Ministers." That Act having been declared illegal and ultra vires of the Assembly, to maintain that the regulations made by the Assembly for the express purpose of carrying it into effect are nevertheless to be considered as valid, and be obeyed by the Presbytery, seems to me to be as extravagant and as absurd a proposition as ever was started by human ingenuity.

At all events, it will be observed, that this last proceeding, as well as the previous proceedings which I have mentioned, is entirely founded on the Veto Act, and on the regulations accompanying and forming a part of it. It was solely in virtue of those regulations that the special objections were tendered, or could be received, at the meeting for moderating in a call. But can it now be maintained that those regulations are not matter connected with the Veto Act, when it is admitted that they were made expressly for the purpose of carrying that Act into effect? In short, will the law enforce a regulation avowedly made for an unlawful purpose?

But to return to the proceedings of the Presbytery: It will be recollected that the motion to proceed to induction was met by a counter motion, founded on special objections tendered by Mr Mitchell, who moved, "that the said objections be received, and discussed; which being seconded, it was agreed that this motion be put as an amendment on the former, and that the state of the vote be, first or second motion; and the roll being called, and votes marked (first motion, second motion), it was carried first motion by seven votes to five; and the Presbytery found and appointed in terms thereof. Against which sentence Mr Garioch declared that he protested for redress in the hands of Mr John Anderson, notary-public in Aberdeen; and Mr David Mitchell, aforesaid, declared that he protested in like manner in the hands of said notary-public."

Here it is important to remark, that no appeal to the Synod was taken against this resolution of the Presbytery. It is true that two protests were taken, one by Mr Garioch, and one by Mr Mitchell, in the hands of a notary-public. But these gentlemen—one a minister, the other a legal practitioner—must have been well aware that such protests were of no avail whatever; and that the resolutions of the Presbytery, when no appeal was taken against them to a superior tribunal, were final and conclusive. If acquiesced in at the time (and they must be held to be so, as no appeal was taken against them), the respondents had no title afterwards to bring them under review, or to complain of them to the Commission of the Assembly, or any court of judicature.

All the above proceedings were perfectly regular, and in exact conformity with the rules of the Church prior to the Veto Act. Special objections were irregularly tendered, and therefore properly rejected, at the meeting for moderating in the call on the 28th October. But just fourteen days afterwards, viz., on the 11th of November, when the edict was published, and public intimation openly made, calling upon all persons to come forward who had special objections to state, no person appeared, and no objections were offered. It is very remarkable, too, that some of the persons who had formerly tendered special objections, when uncalled for, were present at this meeting on the 11th November, but declined renewing the objections when regularly called for. The legitimate inference from this is, in my humble opinion, that they had passed from their former objections, and withdrew or abandoned them.

But it is really too much that this delay of fourteen days, which the laws of the Church authorised and required for receiving special objections, should now be founded on as a ground for the severe and harsh sentence or deliverance of the Commission of Assembly.

On this point I shall only farther remark, that if the objectors had really believed that their special objections were relevant and sufficient, it is difficult to account for their conduct in keeping them back when called for, upon any other principle than this, that they were more solicitous to maintain the Veto Act, than to exclude one whom they professed to believe to be an unworthy presentee.

I have now done with the proceedings of the Presbytery; and, if I be not grievously mistaken, I think it has been shown that these proceedings, on the part of the majority, were perfectly regular and proper; and that no objection was, or is yet, stated to any part of them, except such as are founded on the Veto Act and its regulations. First, as to the appeal which followed the motion made to sist procedure, and report to the General Assembly, it will be observed that the Veto Act was the sole ground on which this motion was made, or on which it could be supported. Now, it was against the rejection of this motion that the appeal was taken. What, then, were the reasons of appeal? They are to be found in the Veto Act, or they are not to be found at all. It was, therefore, an appeal by reason of the Veto Act, or for no reasons at all that could be stated,—such an appeal as was never attempted before: an appeal without reasons, or founded on an act declared to be illegal. In either view it was inadmissible.

Secondly, As to the refusal of the Presbytery to receive the special objections offered at the meeting for moderating in the call, it has been shown, that by the practice of the Church, no such objections could be stated or received at that meeting; and that the only authority on which they could be tendered was to be found in one of the regulations appended to the Veto Act, and intituled by the Assembly, "Regulations for carrying into effect the Act of Assembly, May 29, 1835."

Such are the proceedings which were brought under the review of the Commission of Assembly by the petition and complaint now under consideration. Some passages in this petition and complaint deserve notice. After mentioning that dissents had been lodged in terms of the Veto Act, it mentions that the agent for the dissentients took a protest, "setting forth that, as an apparent majority of dissents had been lodged and declared, the said Presbytery were bound, in terms of the laws of the Church, to take steps for the ultimate rejection of said presentee; but that, since they had resolved to take steps to the contrary, it farther represented the willingness of said agent, without prejudice to the effect of the said dissents, but in corroboration thereof, [i. e., of the arbitrary dissents] to tender special objections, and did thereby, then and there, tender the same."

The petition and complaint afterwards states,—“That your petitioners submit that said proceedings and said settlement are in contravention not only of the recognised laws of the Church prior to the Act of Assembly ament calls, in consequence of the refusal of the said Presbytery to receive special objections against the said presentee, and of their determining to proceed in the face of the due and regular dissents and complaints of the minority of said Presbytery, and of the protests and appeals of the agent for the dissentients against their findings, but more especially of the said Act of Assembly ament calls, and of an apparent majority of dissents received and judicially found under the same.”

Here it is said that the settlement was in contravention of the recognised laws of the Church prior to the Veto Act, "in consequence of the refusal of the Presbytery to receive special objections." This will appear rather a bold assertion, when it is recollected that, prior to the Veto Act, the regulations on which the respondents found, as their sole authority for tendering special objections, had no existence.

Again, the complaint bears that the petitioners "cannot now, without injury to their feelings, and dishonour to the Church, avail themselves of the religious services of the presentee." Finally, the complaint bears, "that, in these circumstances, your petitioners have been advised to petition and complain to the Commission of the General Assembly, at their meeting on Wednesday the 17th day of November curt., praying the Commission to adopt measures for vindicating the laws and dignity of the Church, and for protecting the spiritual interests of your petitioners, their families, and the other parishioners of Culsamond, who feel dissatisfied with the ministry of the said Rev. William Middleton."

I shall not trouble your Lordships by reading the prayer of the petition and complaint, with which you are well acquainted, and which is such as might be anticipated from the passages above quoted.

The Commission of the General Assembly, by its deliverance, appointed the petition and complaint to be served, and parties to give in answers. Farther, without waiting for answers, or hearing the parties, "the Commission in the meantime, and until a final deliverance shall have been pronounced in regard to the proceedings complained of, did, and hereby do, interdict and prohibit the Rev. William Middleton from officiating and administering ordinances in the said parish, and authorise and enjoin the remanent members of the Presbytery of Garioch, not complained of, to meet forthwith to provide for the ministration of the word and sacraments in the parish of Culsamond."

By this sentence, the civil right of patronage is encroached upon, and defeated to a certain extent, perhaps entirely; the induction and settlement of Mr Middleton are pro tempore set aside and annulled. He is degraded from his situation of a minister of the gospel, and is disgraced, as far as he can be disgraced by the Commission of the General Assembly, in the eyes of the public. Yet we are told, that this being purely an ecclesiastical matter, we can afford him no redress. My Lords, I always understood that the laws of this country were intended, and were sufficient to protect the subject in his person, property, and reputation; and that if, contrary to law, an injury is done to him in any of these particulars, he is entitled to ask and obtain protection and redress from the Supreme Court.

Such protection was sought for by the bill of suspension presented to the Lord Ordinary; and his Lordship having refused it, the case is now brought before us by the reclaiming note, on which we appointed parties to be heard, and on which, having heard them at great length, we are now to give our judgment.

In answer to this note, the argument mainly relied upon by the respondents amounted to a denial of our jurisdiction. The argument seemed to be maintained in a two-fold view: Firstly, It is said that this was purely an ecclesiastical case, in which the church courts had the sole and exclusive jurisdiction; and, secondly, On the supposition that this admitted of any doubt, it seemed to be maintained that this Court had no power to resolve the doubt, by sustaining its own jurisdiction, while that jurisdiction was denied by the church courts.

This view of the case seems to be pointed at in a part of the Lord Ordinary's note, where it is said,—“The only difficulty is, where to draw the line of demarcation between the action civil and the matter and cause ecclesiastical;—with the corresponding puzzle, by what authority shall the line be fixed? Fortunately, it is not necessary, in the present case, at all to deal with this questio vexata.”

My Lords, this may have been a questio vexata; but, in my humble opinion, it is so no longer. It was settled and set at rest in the Auchterarder case.

Reference has been made to the Courts of Justiciary and Exchequer, as possessing jurisdiction which we cannot control; and church courts are said to be in the same situation. But this must be understood with some qualification. The Justiciary, having exclusive criminal jurisdiction, may erroneously hold and give judgment in a case as criminal, which is purely civil; and we perhaps cannot set them right. That Court has power not merely to pronounce a final judgment, but to decide finally whether the case before it is criminal or civil, though this may possibly admit of doubt. But one thing is clear, that its judgment being given, the diligence of the law and executorial powers of the Court will carry into effect and execute that judgment. In the church courts it is otherwise: the Assembly may decide what is civil and what is ecclesiastical; but its decision upon this point is not final. It may be, and was in the Auchterarder case, altered; and we and the House of Lords determined accordingly. The questio vexata, as it is called, was there decided; and our decision in that case shows that it lies with this Court, and not with the Assembly, to decide it.

In the Auchterarder case, the jurisdiction of this Court was denied on the part of the Presbytery. To show the emphatic terms in which this denial was made, I shall take the liberty of quoting a short passage from Mr Rutherford's speech. Towards the conclusion of it, after stating that the Church did not exceed her powers in passing the Veto Act, he adds,—“She will vindicate her own proceedings to public opinion,—she will vindicate her proceedings before the Legislature of the State, if called upon to do so; but she denies she is under any necessity to defend herself in this Court; and the Presbytery of Auchterarder will not betray her interest or her rights, by entering into a defence, even before this high tribunal, in a matter as to which, however deep and sincere the respect she feels for your Lordships, she must disclaim its authority.”

In opposition to this eloquent address, we found that we had jurisdiction; and by the judgments which we pronounced against the respondents, and which the House of Lords affirmed, the questio vexata, as it is called, was virtually decided.

In the argument against our jurisdiction in that case, it was maintained, as your Lordships will recollect, that any judgment which we pronounced in the declaratory conclusions of the libel, by finding that the Presbytery ought to admit, and was bound in law to admit, &c., could be of no avail, as we had not the means of enforcing it; and the Presbytery might not, and, as it seemed to be insinuated, would not, obey it. It is curious to observe how this line of argument was received in the House of Lords. Lord Brougham says,—“Then it is said you have no means of carrying into effect the decree of the Court of Session, albeit supported by the authority of the House of Lords, which is a decision of Parliament, by its judicial character, upon the subject. In other words, although you say the Presbytery have acted wrong,—although you say that their reason for rejecting is of no avail whatever,—although you say the law is contrary to what they have supposed it to be,—and although you say, deciding upon the petitory part as well as the declaratory part of the summons (which, however, you are not called upon to do), let the Presbytery induct immediately, for it has no grounds for refusing,—still it is affirmed that the Presbytery may persist in refusing, and must prevail.”

On the same point his Lordship farther says,—“My Lords, I defend the Assembly against the arguments and the threats of their advocates. I protest on the part of the Assembly, as a body of Christian men, of whom the bulk are Christian ministers, against the imputations thus thrown out against them by this course of defending them. I say that my hopes of them—my confident expectations of what will be their conduct—are wholly the reverse of those prospects thus held out,—that it was an injudicious line of argument on their behalf; an argument which I am morally certain would be repudiated and spurned by the Assembly itself. My Lords, that Assembly will do its duty,—will show its veneration for the established authority of the law,—will rest satisfied with having entered its protest, and indicated upon its records its own opinions; but will, with its inferior judicature, the Presbytery, render a willing and respectful obedience to the law of the land as pronounced by the Court of Session, and as affirmed by your Lordships.”

Upon the same subject, the Lord Chancellor spoke as follows:—“If your Lordships shall concur in the opinions I have expressed, and by your decision inform the clergy of Scotland what the law really is, I cannot doubt but that they will, by their conduct and example, inculcate the sacred principle of obedience to the law,—of respect for the rights and interests of others,—and of the sacrifice of private feelings to the performance of a public duty.”

The eminent men whose words I have quoted are great lawyers, and, I think, sound moralists; but the event, I am sorry to say, has shown that they are very indifferent prophets.

But the argument which called forth the foregoing observations is founded on a mistake. Though not warranted in the Auchterarder case to go beyond the declaratory findings, the Court has power to enforce these findings by pronouncing a decree in terms thereof, ordering the Presbytery to proceed; and obedience to such decree may and will be enforced by all the diligence of the law. This opinion was expressed by Lord Brougham in the Auchterarder case,—and this was actually done in the case of Marnoch, to which I must now shortly request attention.

In that case Mr Edwards, the presentee, raised an action to have the Presbytery ordained to receive and admit him as minister of the parish of Marnoch. A majority of the Presbytery admitted that they could not resist decree to the effect craved; but the minority defended the action, and with them a record was ordered to be made up in common form. A motion by the pursuer for decree against the Presbytery and the majority was opposed by the minority, on the ground that the granting it would prejudice their pleas in defence; which were, inter alia, 1st, That the pursuer, as a mere presentee, had no title to maintain the action; 2d, That the Court had no jurisdiction to ordain a presbytery to admit and receive a minister, which implied the performance of the spiritual act of ordination; and, 3d, That the alleged majority, having been suspended by the church courts (a sentence which had already been suspended by this Court), had no power to admit and receive the presentee. The Court held that the pleas of the minority were not such as to warrant refusal of the pursuer's motion, and decreed against the Presbytery and the majority. But it is said, that this judgment is to be held as a decree in absence or by default; and is, therefore, of no authority as a precedent. By the consent or non repugnantia of the majority, it is said, that the defences stated by the minority were abandoned or waived, and were, therefore, as a matter of course, disregarded and repelled. But this seems to me to be a great mistake. Of the three pleas in defence urged by the minority, the first and the last,—viz., the objections to the title, and the suspension by the church courts of the majority, were truly of little consequence; and as to them, the consent or non repugnantia of the majority might possibly be held sufficient to warrant the decree. But the second defence—the objection to our jurisdiction—stood in a very different situation. We all held that the consent or waiver of the majority was of no consequence to it. From the report of the case, I appear to have said upon this subject,—“The defenders object to our jurisdiction. Upon this objection the separate record has no bearing. It is an objection which need not appear in the record at all, which may be stated in any case and at any time, and which it is pars judicis to notice. If we think this objection well founded, we are bound at once to stop short. But I am humbly and very clearly of opinion that it is not well founded.”

Lord Mackenzie said,—“I come now to the second question, whether we ought to pronounce decree in favour of the pursuer, in the question between him and the Presbytery, as defended by the majority? And here I agree, that, notwithstanding the defences, we must be satisfied of our jurisdiction, otherwise, ex parte judicis, we ought to find the want of jurisdiction. But in regard to this I have no doubt. I think the question has been determined already by this Court and the House of Lords, because I think the determination of it a corollary from the points they have determined.”

Lord Fullerton said,—“But if there be one plea which more than another warrants the refusal of that sanction, it is that which is offered by the minority here—the denial of the jurisdiction of the Court. That of itself seems to be quite sufficient. That is clearly a matter in which the voice of the mere majority is absolutely inoperative. If an ecclesiastical body is entitled by law to act in certain ecclesiastical matters, free from the control of the civil court, no majority, however great, can bind the minority, however small, by a waiver of that right. And what is more, it appears to me, that even if the waiver were made, it is one which a civil court could not legally accept. It would resolve into a prorogation of jurisdiction; and that de causa in causam, which is eminently incompetent. For no Court can, as I understand, extend even by the consent of all parties, its jurisdiction to matters which the law has placed out of its resort.”

His Lordship's opinion, that on this point of jurisdiction the Court could not legally accept of any waiver, was concurred in by the whole Court; and the Lord President, accordingly, in delivering his opinion, entered largely into the question of jurisdiction, which was most fully and deliberately considered and discussed by all the Judges.

Finally, the Court sustained its jurisdiction, and this not as a matter of course, in consequence of the consent of the majority, but after the most careful and ample consideration. Now, the plea to our jurisdiction in the case of Marnoch is the only one which bears upon the present case, the decree in which, therefore, forms a precedent which we are bound to follow in any subsequent case in which our jurisdiction is, upon the same grounds, disputed.

There are two cases from the Presbytery of Strathbogie to which I shall content myself with barely referring your Lordships. In them, under nearly similar circumstances, similar interdicts were granted to that which is now sought here. But I shall not trouble your Lordships by stating the particulars, and still less by going over the multitude of cases which were referred to in the Auchterarder case, and the others which I have mentioned; and all of which will be well remembered by your Lordships.

I return to the consideration of the question more immediately and properly before us. Is the deliverance of the Commission a legal sentence? Is it warranted by law, or is it contrary to law? And in the latter case, are we entitled to quash it? Upon this point, very high ground was at one time taken. The jus divinum of the Church was founded on, in virtue of which we were told, that we had no right even to look at the proceedings of the Presbytery, or the deliverance of the Commission. The power of the Church, we were told, was derived directly from God; and very strangely an Act of Parliament was founded on, sanctioning, it is said, that doctrine; as if the sanction of Parliament could bestow superior efficacy upon powers flowing directly from such a source. From the consideration of this matter we are now happily freed by the leading counsel for the respondents, who candidly, and I think, wisely and judiciously, abandoned this line of argument; and admitted, I think, that sitting in this Court, we cannot recognise any powers in the Church, except such as have been sanctioned or bestowed upon it by Acts of Parliament, or such as have been found to belong to it by the final and authoritative decisions of the Supreme Civil Court.

The deliverance of the Commission is entirely general. It does not specify or particularly mention any of the grounds upon which it proceeded. Looking at the general tenor of the complaint presented to the Commission, it is evident that the Presbytery's disobedience of the Veto Act formed the main ground on which its proceedings were objected to. The settlement, it is said, was in contravention of the laws of the Church, “but more especially of the said Act of Assembly anent calls, and an apparent majority of dissents received and judicially found under the same;” and it afterwards goes on “praying the Commission to adopt measures for vindicating the laws and dignity of the Church,”—clearly alluding to the Veto Act, and nothing else.

Upon the supposition, which I am convinced is the true supposition, that the ground upon which the Commission proceeded was the refusal of the Presbytery to be guided by the Veto Act, I really cannot think that the case admits of any doubt. The Veto Act had been found to be illegal, as destructive of the civil right of patronage; and it is needless to say, that such an Act could not legally be enforced; and yet, because the Presbytery did not act against law, by obeying and carrying into effect the Veto Act, their proceedings are condemned by the Commission.—Mr Middleton's settlement is suspended, and he is degraded from his status in society. Under such circumstances, I think and feel we are not only entitled, but bound to give him redress.

Aware that such is the light in which the case must be viewed, the respondents now wish to make their escape from the Veto Act, and to show that there were other irregularities in the proceedings of the Presbytery sufficient to justify the deliverance of the Commission. Two, and only two, alleged irregularities are founded on, and in narrating the proceedings of the Presbytery I have already spoken to both of them. The first is the refusal of the Presbytery to sustain the appeal; and the second, their refusal to receive special objections.

As to the appeal, its object was to establish indirectly the delay, which they attempted to obtain directly, by the motion which they made,—“That at present, in this case, the Presbytery do sist procedure, and report to the General Assembly.” Now, why should they sist procedure, or on what subject were they to report to the Assembly? It will be observed, that at that period of this procedure, the only question agitated in the Presbytery was, whether they should carry into effect the Veto Act? This was all that was before them. No other proposition had then been made, nor any other subject started or hinted at. Are you to proceed with the settlement, or are you to delay it, and carry into effect the Veto Act? There are only two appeals, and it was in this state of matters that both these appeals were taken, and their sole ground was the Veto Act. The Presbytery must have stultified themselves if they received such appeals. Nay more, they would have acted directly in defiance of law if they delayed the settlement of Mr Middleton, with the view of carrying into effect the Veto Act. Setting aside the Veto Act, it was, as I have formerly said, an appeal without reasons; for, apart from the Veto Act, no reasons were, or are, or can be assigned for it.

The next and only other irregularity of which the Presbytery is accused, is their refusing to receive the special objections tendered at a meeting held for moderating in a call. It has been shown, that prior to the Veto Act, no special objections could competently be offered or received at the meeting for moderating in a call.

It is no doubt true, that by one of the regulations made for carrying into effect the Veto Act, such objections could competently be received. The regulation provides, that “as soon as it is ascertained whether there are a majority of dissents, it shall always be competent to state special objections;”—a regulation, by the bye, which shows clearly the sense of the Assembly, that by the law as it previously stood, it was not always competent to state special objections, or indeed, competent at any time to receive them prior to the publication and return of the edict.

But the question here is, whether the Presbytery were bound to obey the regulations expressly made for carrying into effect the Veto Act? That they were not bound to obey, and could not, without setting the law at defiance, obey the Act itself, must be admitted. How then could they be bound to obey the regulations for carrying it into effect? On what principles of logic the affirmative of the proposition can be maintained, I confess I am not able to discover; and I shall not attempt to answer reasoning which I cannot comprehend.

The whole question, then, resolves into this,—Are the proceedings of the Presbytery to be set aside, and is Mr Middleton to be degraded from his status, because the Presbytery did not comply with the Veto Act,—because they did not obey and carry into effect an Act which has been solemnly adjudged, and is now, I think, admitted to be illegal? On this question I feel no hesitation in giving my opinion; and I am therefore for granting the interdict now craved.

Lord Mackenzie.—After the full opinions of your Lordship and Lord Gillies, I think it my duty to occupy less of your time than I should otherwise have thought proper.

In the first place, in regard to the general nature of the case, and the proceedings in this Court regarding it, I need say nothing. It is enough for me to refer to the statement of them by your Lordships.

I think it most convenient then, briefly to state, first, what I conceive to be the law of the case, and then notice the facts, and its application to these facts.

The following propositions, into which I have abridged the fuller statement I originally contemplated, I conceive to be agreeable to the law of Scotland:—

1. Patronage was anciently a right to present a qualified person, whom the bishop was bound to admit to an office in the Church.

2. The qualification was of a known nature, consisting in good learning, life and manners,—i. e., morals, including doctrine, or, at any rate, in personal qualities,—all being qualities that might exist, and be known to the patron to exist, in the man presented at the time of presentation. (See, for these two propositions, the Regiam Majestatem, and Balfour, quoted in the Auchterarder case by myself and Lord Cuninghame; and also the speeches of Lord Brougham and the Lord Chancellor in that case.)

3. At the Reformation, the Reformed Church of Scotland set it down as one of their articles, that there should be no patronage. (See Books of Discipline, and the speeches of Lord Gillies and the Lord Chancellor in the Auchterarder case.)

4. Parliament refused them this article, and they gave it up,—only asking to have the sole power of examining presentees, to prevent improper nominations, and of admission, which was a religious rite competent only to the clergy. (See the speeches of Lord Gillies and the Lord Chancellor in the Auchterarder case.) This, and this only, was granted to them; patronage, as it anciently existed, being kept up by law. (See the Statute 1567.)

5. Patronage was, and is, a patrimonial or civil right. Lord Corehouse, in the Auchterarder case says (p. 218),—"There are two postulates which I assume without argument:—1. That patronage is a civil right. By patronage, I mean the right of presenting a person who, if he be qualified in the judgment of the Church, is entitled to be admitted to the benefice,—and that independent of all the accessories of patronage, as a right to free teinds, vacant stipend, a seat in the church, and a burial place there. The right of presenting alone, which affords honour and influence, and the privilege of performing an important duty, is prized on that account, and is the subject of commerce, I believe, in every Protestant country." And Lord Jeffrey, in the Letbendy case, says, (p. 169), "I take it to be fully admitted, that the right of patronage or presentation, and the patrimonial interests which a presentee may derive from its exercise, are purely civil rights; and that it belongs to the civil courts exclusively to adjudicate upon these rights." (See a multitude of decisions upon it by our civil courts, not one of which could have been pronounced if it had not been a civil right.) The Lord Chancellor, in the Auchterarder case, said, (p. 347), "From these authorities, it is clear that the Court of Session has jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the right of patronage, and to correct any infringement of it, as against another claiming adversely, and against the Presbytery, whether claiming adversely jure devoluto, or simply rejecting, without cause, the presentee of the patron, as in the cases of Auchtermuchty, of Dunse, of Kiltarlity and Zetland, and the other cases referred to."

6. It is preposterous to suppose that this right was merely to make the presentation, and that it ended there. Such a right would have been futile. It has always been, and is, a right to present a man who was to be collated or admitted, by the proper official. It is sufficient here to quote Mr Erskine, who says (B. I. t. 5, § 10),—"In truth, patrons considered themselves, in those days, to have as strong an interest in church benefices as superiors had in temporal. Hence, upon the emerging of a vacancy, they not only named the person who was to supply it, but they collated him by giving him investiture or possession of the church, in these or the like words, Trado tibi ecclesiam; accipe ecclesiam. And though collation was soon declared to belong solely to churchmen as a spiritual right, which laics were forbidden to exercise, under the pain of excommunication (Decretal, L. III. t. 38, c. 4 and 10), yet patrons were universally acknowledged to have the right of presenting to the bishop a proper person for supplying the vacant church, whom it behoved the bishop to collate."

7. Accordingly, the obligation corresponding to the right of patronage, under presbytery, is defined by the Statute 1592, establishing presbytery, and which was joyfully accepted by the Church, and regarded as its charter. (See McCre's Sketches of Scottish Church History, pp. 123, 124.) This Statute not only gave the establishment generally to the Presbyterian Church, but it gave specially the admission of ministers to the Presbytery, which they had not before, and provided that the Presbytery should be bound and straitened to admit whatever qualified person should be presented to them by the patron. This was not a mere power, or even a mere direction, given to the Presbytery exercising jurisdiction, but a stringent obligation laid on it in favour of the patron, as the obligation corresponding to his right of patronage. The power of examination, to test the qualification of the presentee, as a matter for which only the clergy were fitted, and the actual admission, as a religious rite, were left to the Church; but the obligation to admit, if qualified, was absolute. The Statute of Queen Anne revived and re-enacted the obligation on the Presbytery constituted by 1592, again using a stringent word to bind the Presbytery,—viz., the Presbytery "shall be obliged."

8. This obligation was imposed, not by ratifying an article in the Confession of Faith, or canons of the Church, but against the desire of the Church, directly by Parliament; and the validity and efficiency of this obligation does not at all in any way appear to have been intended to be left entirely to the judgment of the Presbytery or Church,—the words themselves implying the direct contrary, expressing an obligation imposed in favour of the patron as a party, and on the Church as a party, having opposite pretensions and desires, but tied down withal, who never can be presumed to have been left absolute judge in its own cause.—(See the speech of the Lord Chancellor in the Auchterarder case.)

9. Patronage being a civil right, the obligation of the Presbytery, as the obligee under that right, could not possibly be a matter of mere ecclesiastical jurisdiction; for that would be just another way of saying that patronage was not a civil right, but a mere ecclesiastical right.

10. The Church has, in our Statutes, an ecclesiastical jurisdiction bestowed on it, distinct from, and exclusive of, the civil magistrate,—though this is qualified by the declaration of the right and duty of the civil magistrate to interfere in proceedings regarding religion. But in the Statutes establishing patronage, it is nowhere said that it is to fall under that exclusive jurisdiction. No such thing can be pretended in any Act after the Act 1567; and not truly even in that Statute, which gives exclusively to the Church only the examination of presentees.—(See the speeches of the Lord Chancellor and Lord Brougham in the Auchterarder case.) And that, too, was before presbytery, and under superintendents—a sort of bishops. The Act 1592 contains nothing that can found such a pretension, nor the Act of Queen Anne reviving the Act 1592. The long and laboured argument of the respondents, to show the existence of the exclusive ecclesiastic jurisdiction of the Church, is, therefore, of no relevancy in the case.

11. The argument (to which, indeed, the counsel made not the least allusion), that a civil court decerning, or in any way causing the Presbytery to admit a presentee, is the same thing as the civil court ordaining him themselves,—and so is impiety, profanation, sacrilege, &c.,—and the minister so ordained a minister of the Court of Session or House of Lords, not of Christ, and so forth, is a palpable fallacy, fit only for exciting clamour. At that rate, Parliament “binding and astricting the Presbytery” to admit presentees, were doing the same thing as ordaining them themselves, and so were guilty of impiety, profanation, sacrilege, &c., on a great scale. Yet the Church gladly received the Statute 1592, containing this provision as the condition of establishing presbytery. If serious, such views must evidently make all establishments of religion sinful and sacrilegious, and, indeed, all interference by Parliament with religion at all;—strange things to be in the mouth of any friends of an established church. But, I repeat, they were not argued here. I may also, on this point, refer to the Statute 1571, c. 41, passed a few years after the Statute 1567, by the reforming party, and by which it was ordained, that if any of his Majesty’s “trew lieges” happened to be slain in his service against certain traitors and others, his enemies, “the nearest of the said benefited menneis kyne, abill and qualifield, sall have the presentation, provision, and collation of his benefice, for that time allenarlie: And the samen to be disponed to the nearest of his kyn that happenis to be slayne, or decease, in maner foirsaid, being alwaies abill and qualifield therefore, as said is. And the profites of their benefices, with the fruits speciallie on the ground, with the annat thereafter, to pertaine to them and their executors, alsweil abbottes, priores, as all uther kirkmen.” This provision for the remuneration of the slain, in the persons of their heirs, was surely meant to be implicitly obeyed, and absolute, provided only the heirs of the slain were qualified persons. The examination into that, therefore, was left to the Church; but evidently nothing more. It can never be supposed that the Superintendent, or General Assembly, at its pleasure, was to disappoint this instant statutory right, given on such an occasion as the reward of military service.

12. The Act, now commonly called the Veto Act,—that is, the primary and principal enactment of it in 1835,—is just an enactment by the General Assembly, that the legal presentee of the lawful patron, unless his presentation shall be followed by the assent or non-dissent of the majority of the male heads of families in the parish, shall not be admitted, but rejected by the Presbytery. (See the Act.)

13. In the Auchterarder case, the judgment of this Court, affirmed by the House of Lords, justly described by Lord Brougham as “Parliament in its judicial capacity,” and which stands in place of the Parliament of Scotland, which sat in one house, was, that “having heard the opinions of the said Judges,” &c.—(See the judgment.)—This was just a decision—(1.) that any presbytery rejecting a presentee under the Veto Act, would act illegally, and commit a wrong to the patron and presentee; (2.) that this Court has jurisdiction to decern and declare that illegality and wrong; for, I suppose, it will not be said that a presbytery rejecting, for want of non-dissents, a presentee whose qualification is apparent without examination (as in this case Mr Middleton’s was), are not equally illegal, undutiful and wrongful; or that this Court has less jurisdiction to decern and declare that wrong.

14. From the decision, it must follow as corollaries, that any Synod, General Assembly, or Commission, causing or attempting to force or cause any presbytery to reject a presentee under the Veto Act, or causing, or attempting to cause such rejection, direct or by overruling, to that effect, the act of a presbytery admitting a legal presentee, is equally acting illegally, in violation of Statute, and to the wrong of the patron and presentee; and also that such illegality and wrong fall equally within the jurisdiction of this Court to decern and declare; for if it be a civil wrong to do this, it must equally be a civil wrong to cause, or attempt to cause it to be done; and if it be a civil wrong, the Synod, General Assembly, or Commission, can no more do this wrong, without competent jurisdiction in this Court to afford a remedy, than where the wrong has been done by a presbytery.

Plain it is, that if the civil right of patronage is to be defended only against the direct rejection of presentees by the Presbytery on the Veto Act, it is, in fact, not defended at all. The Synod, the Assembly, the Commission, by rescinding, by deposing, by suspending, by delaying, may render the Veto Act perfectly effective, and patronage an empty sound, though no presbytery should ever violate the Act of Queen Anne; nay, if this proposition of law be rejected, then if ever the Assembly or Commission shall consist of ministers admitted under the Veto Act, they will have power, and may feel bound in conscience, pro bono ecclesiae, even to deprive all the legally patronate ministers at one sweep, on the ground that they all came in by intrusion, —i. e. patronage without a veto, which, as is said, was always against the fundamental law of the Church; and we should have no power to afford redress for this defiance of the right of patronage in its past, as well as its future operation.

15. It also follows as a corollary, that as this Court has jurisdiction to decern and declare these wrongs, it must have jurisdiction and duty to remedy them, as far as may be done by its decerniture in enforcement of the right, or prevention of the wrong. It is true we cannot give an adjudication in implement of the obligation of the Presbytery. We cannot examine and admit the presentee ourselves, or admit him if not needing examination, or order the Sheriff of the county to examine or admit; for that is a religious ceremony, which the clergy only have the power to adhibit. But we may decern the Presbytery to do it; and in all other ways explicate our jurisdiction, as usually it is explicated in cases of obligation ad factum præstandum, where the fact is prestable by the defender, not by the Court or its officers. This is evident in itself, for our judgments declaratory are not mere lectures on law, but intended to be followed by enforcement of the right declared. See, on this point, Bankton and Sir George Mackenzie, quoted by the Lord President. But it is farther proved by a number of cases,—by the case of Strathbogie or Marnoch, on deliberate consideration, if not argument, decerning a presbytery to admit an examined and qualified presentee,—by the second case of Auchterarder, finding a presbytery liable in damages for persisting in rejection of a presentee under the Veto Act,—by the case of Lethendy, where a presbytery were interdicted from admitting a rival presentee, in prejudice of one refused admission on the Veto Act, and censured for breach of interdict,—by the other case of Strathbogie, where there was an interdict against the Commission and General Assembly, from suspending and deposing a presbytery for not obeying the Veto Act,—and by the case of Mackintosh, where male heads of families were interdicted from offering dissents under the Veto Act. See also the speech of Lord Brougham.

I may remark, that of all those modes of enforcing the right of patronage, and preventing or remedying the wrong of the Veto Act, the mildest and least questionable is that by passing a note of suspension, and granting interim interdict.

All these propositions in law appear to me sufficiently clear.

I may observe, that there were several points maintained by the suspenders, on which I do not wish to rest my judgment. I have stated my grounds of law, and have no occasion to go beyond them.

1. I do not wish to hold that this Court can act on the right and duty which the Confession of Faith states to be in the civil power of keeping religion right, by calling of Assemblies, and seeing that things are managed agreeably to the mind of God.

2. I do not wish to hold, that we have a general power of reviewing the sentences of all courts, whenever they err in the construction of Statutes, provided they do not thereby go out of their jurisdiction.

3. I do not wish to hold, that we have a general power of reviewing all sentences of courts that are in excess of their jurisdiction, if they do not touch at all upon matter that is within our jurisdiction. But it is a very different thing, if their excess consists in doing a wrong which is within our jurisdiction to remedy. It is said we cannot interfere with the Justiciary or Exchequer, or they with us. That is too broadly stated. If it were possible that the Justiciary or Exchequer should pronounce a sentence depriving a man of his landed estate, on a question of heritable title, must he lose his estate? Could we not—must we not—suspend such a sentence as illegal and null?

Or if it were possible that this Court should order a man to be hanged for an alleged murder, must not the Judiciary interfere to save him? These are cases that can never happen; but in argument we may suppose them.

On the other hand, there are some things that have been said by the Church to which I cannot give any weight.

1. It has been said that the Church has a divine right, independent of, and superior to, the power of Parliament. That was not argued by the counsel; and Mr Rutherford particularly disclaimed it. Assuredly, such an argument can never be listened to here. We sit here a Court created by Parliament—the organ of Parliament—and must judge according to what appears to us to be the will of Parliament, or resign our office. I have felt no call to any such martyrdom, and shall certainly adhere to my duty of obedience to Parliament.

2. It is said that our own commission is limited; so that, independently of the alleged exclusive jurisdiction of the Church, we are barred from judging in this case by our own inherent want of power. I do not understand that. Suppose the Church had never been established, and had no exclusive ecclesiastical jurisdiction by law, but had been an independent sect, only tolerated like the Episcopal sect in Scotland; and then suppose that a presbytery, duly authorised by the sect, had entered into an agreement with A B, by which he agreed to build a church, and endow it; and the Presbytery, duly authorised by the sect, agreed that, upon a vacancy, A B should present a qualified person, whom the Presbytery agreed to ordain;—suppose, then, A B fulfilled his part, and then, on a vacancy, the Presbytery refused to fulfil its part,—would it ever occur to any body that we had not authority to enforce this contract? It would be no answer to say to us, you are not ecclesiastical,—you cannot ordain. The answer would be, no; and for that reason we discern you to do it as you agreed to do. Just as much must we have jurisdiction, unless it can be made out that we are excluded by ecclesiastical jurisdiction, given by Statute to the Church, where a right and obligation to the same effect are created vi statuti. In fact, patronage has, in justice, the support of contract, or quasi contract also, as well as of Statute. For Parliament, with the consent, I believe, of patrons, gave to the Presbyterians the whole establishment; and, on a vacancy in a church, enjoined the patrons to present a qualified man to the Presbytery to fill it; and that being done, Parliament bound and astricted the Presbytery to ordain or admit. And of this gift of the Establishment, with its condition, the Presbyterian Church accepted, which bound her in good faith, as well as allegiance, to observe the condition, and admit the qualified presentee.

Reverting, then, to the propositions in law I have stated, I now come to the facts of the case, in so far as they appear to be founded on by the parties on either side.

The suspender had been for some years an ordained minister of the Church of Scotland, and assistant in the parish of Culsamond. On the 22d of September 1841, a meeting of the Presbytery of Garioch was held, at which there was laid on the table of the Presbytery a presentation by Sir John Forbes of Craigievar, patron of the church of Culsamond, in favour of the suspender, to be minister of that church and parish, as assistant and successor to the Rev. Ferdinand Ellis, existing incumbent, together with a letter of concurrence from Mr Ellis in common form, and the suspender's letter of acceptance, and the usual certificates. The Presbytery at that meeting sustained the presentation and relative documents, and approved of the arrangement under which the suspender was presented; and being satisfied with the allowance already guaranteed to him for his sustentation during the incumbency of Mr Ellis, they agreed to proceed with his settlement according to the rules of the Church. In this way, it is not disputed that there was a sufficient vacancy, and a sufficient legal presentation by an undoubted patron actually received by the Presbytery. See also cases of Mr Hunter and Mr Edwards. And the ordinary examination into his qualification was not necessary, from the station he already held in the church and parish. The duty of the Presbytery under the Statute 1592 and Act of Queen Anne, was therefore clear. But it appears that this Presbytery, very naturally, and I do not say very inexcusably, wished, if possible, to steer clear of both Scylla and Charybdis, and avoid violation either of the Veto Act of the Assembly or the statutory law of the land. Therefore, while they took the steps for the admission of Mr Middleton in the legal way, they, at the same time, proceeded to make up a roll of the male heads of families, and actually allowed the dissents, without reason, of these persons to be received, in hope, doubtless, that these would turn out to be a minority. But they turned out to be a majority; and then the Presbytery, finding there was no middle course left open, determined to obey the Statutes, and go on with the settlement in the legal way, and disregard the Veto Act. They, no doubt, as stated by the respondents in their reasons of appeal, had sworn to obey the orders of their ecclesiastical superiors; but that oath was, of course, under the well-known and understood condition and limitation, that those orders should not be contrary to the law of the land. For it will not, I presume, be said, gravely and coolly, by any man, that the legal oath of ordination of the Established Church of Scotland is like the secret oath of an unlawful combination, such as has been known in the Court of Justiciary,—an oath binding on them to obey their leaders in everything lawful or unlawful. And, on the other hand, they had taken the oath of allegiance, which bound them to give obedience to Parliament, certainly without the exception, express or understood, that the Acts of Parliament should be agreeable to the will and pleasure of the General Assembly. Finding they must choose between the two, they being satisfied that the law under the Statutes of Parliament was contrary to that of the General Assembly, gave obedience to the superior authority. They sustained the call in favour of Mr Middleton. The minutes bear—(After reading them his Lordship continued).—Here there was a proceeding in which the Veto Act was disregarded, and the settlement proceeded in, in the ordinary legal way. And against this part of the procedure there were an appeal and a complaint, founded wholly on the alleged breach of this provision in the Veto Act.

There is, however, an Act of Assembly requiring that, when an appeal is taken in the settlement of a minister, the admission shall be delayed; and to meet that, and complete the Presbytery's disallowance of the Veto Act, the record bears:—(His Lordship again read from the minutes.) I see there was a protest; but I see no evidence of any appeal against this vote. Such appeal is not noticed in the minutes as actually taken, nor is its actual existence before the Synod stated by the respondents. After this the Presbytery went on, and appointed Mr Bisset to preach at Culsamond on the 31st October, and take other usual steps for the admission of Mr Middleton. And accordingly, on that day, after two papers of reasons of protest and appeal had been allowed to be received, and the third paper, which is stated to have been reasons against the finding of the Presbytery refusing to receive special objections to the presentee, was refused to be received, the Presbytery ordered the edict to be called; and that being done, and no objections being thereon offered, they, after a great deal of violent interruption, admitted Mr Middleton minister of Culsamond, in terms of his presentation.

Such, I think, was the substance of the proceedings of the Presbytery, which were divided among a number of days, from which division I do not see that any consequences of importance followed.

A petition and complaint was now presented to the Commission by a number of persons, stating themselves to be male heads of families, and communicants in the parish of Culsamond,—and by certain other persons, stating themselves to be residents in the said parish, and communicants in the congregation thereof. This petition set forth the facts of the case, as the respondents now state them, referring to the minutes of Presbytery and protests produced; and in the concluding part bearing, “That your petitioners submit that said proceedings and said settlement are in contravention, not only of the recognised laws of the Church prior to the Act of Assembly anent calls,—(i. e. the Veto Act).—“in consequence of the refusal of the said Presbytery to receive special objections against the said presentee, and of their determining to proceed in the face of the due and regular dissents and complaints of the minority of said Presbytery, and of the protests and appeals of the agent for the dissentients against their findings, but more especially of the said Act of Assembly anent calls, and of an apparent majority of dissents received, and judicially found under the same, and this while there was no reason at all for their precipitancy, no order, or pretended order, from any civil court, as in certain other cases, and nothing but their own deliberate resolution so to do." And it concludes with a prayer for serving the petition and complaint on the majority and Mr Middleton, in which are repeated the alleged grounds of complaint, and praying the Commission to censure the suspenders, to rescind the settlement of Mr Middleton, and to provide immediately for the spiritual necessities of the parish, on the footing that Mr Middleton is excluded from his function as minister.

The Commission appointed answers to the petition and complaint to be given in to them or the General Assembly; and, in the meantime, they suspended Mr Middleton from the office of minister; the words being, "from officiating and administering ordinances." They suspended also the majority of the Presbytery from acting as members of Presbytery in this matter, and appointed the minority to act pro tempore.

This is the sentence brought before us by the present reclaiming note.

The present question may, I think, be reduced to a few points.

The first is, whether (whatever might be the powers of the General Assembly itself) the Commission of the General Assembly had jurisdiction to entertain a petition of this kind, for the suspension of a minister, at least pro tempore, and of a majority of a Presbytery, at least in part, on account of a matter not specially committed to them, but wholly arising after the commission was granted? On that, I concur in what is proposed by your Lordship and Lord Gillies, and therefore need say little. If they have no such jurisdiction, it seems pretty clear they must be interdicted by this Court from assuming it, and that at the instance of any persons having a reasonable interest to ask such an interdict. In that view, their proceedings are the proceedings of a party falsely pretending to have the authority of the General Assembly, but having it not,—as if any set of men whatever, or any one man, were to publish a false commission from the Assembly, and thereby to depose or suspend ministers or presbyteries. It would be strange if we had not power to prohibit that, at the instance of any party suffering evil from it. The question, then, here is, Have they such jurisdiction? Now, I may say (1.) that I cannot doubt at all that the General Assembly have power to appoint a Commission, with powers to some extent; (2.) I think it clear, that they have not power to appoint a Commission with powers wholly equal to their own,—a mere alter ego, to sit permanently, and still less to appoint an ecclesiastic dictator, free of all rules, restraints or limits, like a Roman consul, authorised to see "ne quid respublica detrimenti caperet;" and I think, accordingly, that they have never granted such Commission, though they have occasionally used some words that are borrowed from the Roman forms, and of which the sound is a little alarming. But whether the matter in this case was within the jurisdiction of the Commission granted, and competent to be granted to them or not, I think deserves further discussion and consideration. In reference to that question, therefore, I agree with your Lordship and Lord Gillies, that the note should be passed to try the question. But I should not be inclined, on that ground, to grant an interim interdict.

Setting aside that question, and assuming that the Commission had the full powers of the General Assembly, what is the ground on which it is next contended that their deliverance is the fit subject of suspension and interdict? The answer is, that it is a deliverance wholly founded on the Veto Act.

If that allegation be true, after the statement of law I have made, I can have no doubt that it ought to be suspended, and that we should pass the note, and grant interim interdict.

The Veto Act is solely calculated to defeat lawful patronage, and so cause civil wrong; and if, wholly under that Act, and for its illegal purpose alone, the Commission of the General Assembly ordered a newly admitted minister to appear in a process for rescinding his admission, and have suspended him in the meantime, and suspended, in part, the Presbytery,—this must be a civil wrong—the proper subject of suspension and interdict by this Court. I need hardly observe that the appeal or appeals make no difference. If the dissents and objections were illegal, and a civil wrong, the appeal or appeals in support of them could not be better. The appeal or appeals, too, were illegal steps taken under the Veto Act, and could afford no lawful ground for the deliverance of the Commission.

But is the deliverance of the Commission wholly under the Veto Act? It is a proceeding, as has appeared, on a petition and complaint. That petition complains substantially of two things: 1st, That the Presbytery admitted Mr Middleton on his presentation, notwithstanding a majority of dissents. 2dly, That they refused to receive the special objections offered against him. Now, as to the first, it is manifestly founded on the Veto Act. As to the last, it admits of more question. The primary and proper Veto Act says nothing of such objections. But there is annexed to it a set of regulations "for carrying the above Act into effect." And it is by these regulations that special objections are ordered to be admitted at the meeting for moderating a call, as soon as the number of dissents, without reason, shall be ascertained. Before that Act was passed, such dissents were not in practice admitted until the edict had been served: so that there is no doubt that the special objections offered in this case were offered by virtue of the Veto Act. That, I think, has been demonstrated by Lord Gillies. It certainly does seem to follow pretty plainly, that they must be held to have been offered at that time for carrying that Act into execution; and if so, the offering of them at that time was subject to illegality of the same kind, as any thing else done for the illegal object of the Veto Act. It may be asked, however, how the offering of special objections, at an earlier period than was admissible before, could help the carrying into effect the Veto Act? I own I cannot answer the question. It may, however, serve that end in many ways that I do not see. And be that as it may, I agree with your Lordship and Lord Gillies, that we must hold the offering of these reasons, at that early stage, to have been done for carrying that Act into effect, since it is set down, and authorised to be done expressly for that purpose. If, however, they were so offered, it was right in the Presbytery to reject them; and the determination of the Commission, in so far as it may be founded on that rejection, is a deliverance for giving effect to the Veto Act, just as much as it is in reference to the other ground of complaint.

But that is by no means all. For, supposing we could view the offer of special dissents as not connected with the Veto Act at all, or as separable from it, the suspenders would still, on this supposition, be entitled to plead that the deliverance of the Commission proceeded, without discrimination, on two grounds.—one of which, and the chief, was the refusal to reject Mr Middleton, on account of the dissents, without reason; the other was the refusal to receive the special objections before service of the edict. Both were stated in the petition and complaint; and on that petition and complaint indiscriminately, the deliverance is granted. Now, I must say, it appears to me that, if granting the deliverance on the first reason alone would have been a civil wrong, and founded suspension and interdict by this Court, then the granting it in this indiscriminate way, on the two grounds, does not make it change its character. Even abstracting from some of the known facts of the case, what right could the Commission have to put their deliverance in such a form, that it may, at least, proceed on the dissents and the Veto Act alone? If this Court will interdict them from doing a certain civil wrong, will it not interdict them from doing a thing which, probably at least, is a civil wrong; and that, while they, by the mode of proceeding they adopt, withhold the evidence from which it ought to have appeared, whether it was a civil wrong or not,—or, at any rate, when there is an incurable uncertainty, whether this deliverance did not proceed on these illegal, incompetent, and wrong reasons or not? I must repeat, it seems to me, that such a mode of proceeding is itself a manifest wrong, to which no man can in justice be obliged to submit; that there must be a remedy for it; and that the only remedy is to quash or suspend the deliverance.

It is necessary for me to observe here, that this case, under the supposition now made, is quite different from the ordinary case of a judgment or order granted by an inferior civil court, on various reasons, of which some are bad, and which yet, on note of suspension or advocacy, we may support. But in that case, we can judge of all the reasons. We can find such a reason to be bad, but such other reason to be good, and therefore sustain the judgment on that reason alone, making it our judgment or order. But we cannot do that here on the supposition now adopted. On that supposition, we cannot try the questions of special objections at all; for, by the supposition made, they are matter of exclusive ecclesiastic jurisdiction. If so, we cannot find them valid, and on that, support the order of the Commission. We can support it only if we can find that the Commission itself has judged them to be valid, which they have not chosen to do, and, by neglecting to do which, they leave it open to be said that their deliverance proceeded on the Veto Act and dissents only.

To these, as they seem to me, obvious considerations of justice, it is not pretended that the respondents have any Scotch authority to oppose. But some English cases are referred to. I, of course, speak of them with much diffidence; but I shall venture a few observations.

First, the case of the habeas corpus, on the committal for contempt by the House of Commons, was referred to by the respondents. But that case, as I understand it, has no analogy. For it was a case of privilege of Parliament; and in it the committal did not proceed on ambiguous grounds, but without any grounds at all, that the Court thought they had right to know. It was thought that the House of Commons had the privilege of committing, without stating their grounds, and had done so, and so the court of law could not inquire at all about the grounds of committal. That is not the fact here at all, where the deliverance is on a petition, which we are perfectly at liberty to look at. And further, it does not appear that the right of the ecclesiastical courts in this respect is similar to the privilege of the Houses of Parliament. In Lord Brougham's speech in the Auchterarder case, he says, (pages 292 and 293), "Dolus versatur in generalibus is a maxim of the civil law adopted by all our Courts, frequently referred to by the Judges,—nowhere more frequently than in the Scotch Courts, and one which I have sometimes heard cited both in the General Assembly and in the civil courts. When a quare impedit was once brought in England, where the right of the patron is precisely the same as in Scotland, for he must present a qualified person, and the bishop is to judge of his qualification for the sacred office,—that is to say, his literature, his life and conversation, and his orthodoxy, which comes within literature; nay, according to the Calvinistic creed, may come both within literature and life in Scotland,—I am alluding to Specot's case, in 5 Coke's Reports, 57, 58, a leading authority here as to the limits of the bishop's power. When Specot was presented by the patron, and refused by the ordinary, it was held not to be sufficient for the bishop to return generally, that he was non idoneus; but if he had answered, minus sufficiens in literatura, that, it was held, would be sufficient; and as the Court have no organs to say whether he is or not, the bishop shall decide it, because literature is matter of clerical qualification and clerical competence. It is remarkable, that the Judges assign for a reason why the general return, non idoneus, wanted validity, quoad dolus versatur in universalibus. If they will not allow the bishop, or the Presbytery, merely to say non idoneus, without specifying in what, much less will they allow it to be said, 'we will not have you'; they must say why; and then the Judges add, 'for if it were otherwise, the patron's rights might be prejudiced.' So that, holding the patron's rights might be prejudiced by a general answer, they require a specification."

Now, what is applicable to the Presbytery rejecting a presentee, must equally be applicable to the Commission suspending proceedings, and rescinding his admission, as soon as it is granted by the Presbytery. And what Lord Brougham says, affords, I think, a good answer to any attempt to apply the case of the commitment of the House of Commons as an English precedent here.

I see no other case that is worth mentioning at all, on this point, except the case of Hart v. Marsh. In that case, it appears that the ecclesiastical court had before it, on a suit for deprivation of a clergyman, a great number of charges that were competent, and among them some that were contended to be not competent. The Court had taken evidence, and found the charges, for the most part, proved. In these circumstances, the Court of King's Bench refused to grant a prohibition; but the ecclesiastical court there was in the usual situation of being simply willing to do its duty, whether it had erred or not. It seemed certain, in fact, that this Court must have proceeded on some of the competent charges. And it was observed by Justice Pattison, that, "supposing some of these articles to be founded on charges not within the cognizance of the ecclesiastical court, that might have been shown before sentence; and that there was no affidavit that the Court proceeded on the objectionable articles."

Now, look at this case. The objectionable article here is the Veto Act,—a law made by the General Assembly. The ecclesiastical court here was that very Assembly, under the form of a Commission, notoriously adhering to their own home-made law, and resolute to support it, to the uttermost, against the Court of Session and House of Lords,—if not also against Parliament itself. Such is the Court before which the Veto Act is pleaded as the primary and chief ground, along with an informality in not receiving objections at one time, instead of another, as a ground of suspension from office of a newly admitted minister; and they grant the suspension without saying why. Can there be one atom of doubt that they did proceed upon the Veto Act? It is said we ought to presume the contrary. No wonder recourse is had to presumption, when there is not a human being in the Commission, or out of it, who would say it was so, in fact. But how can we admit such a presumption against certain fact? It would be a defiance of truth and justice; and there is no evidence of any received maxim of law to exclude the truth. No ecclesiastical court has a right to violate Statutes, and a right to do a civil wrong, under pretence of exercising its jurisdiction, to the direct effect of excluding our power of remedying that civil wrong; and just as little, I think, can any ecclesiastical court have right to put its judgment into such a form, that it is impossible to discover whether it has done this wrong or not. But, in the present case, there is no difficulty in that respect. Most undoubtedly the Commission did proceed on the Veto Act, and want of non-dissents. And how can we believe that they proceeded at all on anything else? They who held the Veto Act to be legal, must, in consistency, have held the special objections to have been improper and useless. For why object specially to a man after he is vetoed, and so excluded absolutely, whether objectionable or not? Again, how can we know, if the veto had been out of the case, whether the Commission might not have thought that the refusal of objections then was not material, as they were called for afterwards, and not offered? How do we know that the Commission, in that view, would not have called for the objections, and, finding them frivolous, have refused to suspend, or proceed against the minister, since he, at any rate, had no blame in that matter on account of them? But the veto was conclusive. On that, if they held it legal, they of course suspended,—and they did certainly hold it legal. Consider, for one moment, what must be the effect of holding our jurisdiction to be barred in this way. Can there ever be a case, under the Veto Act, in which some objection may not be added to the veto, which may be said to be within the competency of the Presbytery or Commission? Either of these courts, then, have only to reject the presentee, or to suspend him, or to depose him the moment he is admitted, without saying expressly that they proceed upon the veto; and then legal patronage is at once defeated by the exclusion of our jurisdiction. The objection may be, that the presentee is of evil life and manners, because he is known sometimes to take a pinch of snuff. On the veto, and on that objection indiscriminately, he may be rejected; and so our power to protect the civil right of patronage is excluded. Would not that be to make law a mere driveller? I cannot yield to what appears to me such a weak and blind abandonment of our function.

I therefore think that, even assuming that the refusal of the Presbytery to receive objections was an irregularity, independently of the Veto Act, yet that the deliverance the Commission did make upon the petition and complaint was illegal,—was one which, by the civil rights of the patron and presentee, they were barred from making,—and which, therefore, we ought to interdict ad interim, while we pass the note of suspension.

Lord Fullerton.—The real importance of this case extends far beyond the interests held apparently in the result by the parties. I do not mean to depreciate those interests. But certainly the question, whether, for a few weeks or months, Mr Middleton, or the minority of the Presbytery, shall officiate in the parish of Culsamond, shrinks into insignificance compared with the other question, which we must determine before we can adjudicate on those interests,—whether this Court is entitled to suspend and review a purely ecclesiastical judgment pronounced by an ecclesiastical court? This is not the first time I have had to consider the question. But now, with all the advantage, and it is great, which I have derived from the able arguments we have heard, I have been able to come to no other conclusion, than that it ought to be answered in the negative, and that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be adhered to. One advantage I think we have here. The facts are so simple and so little susceptible of dispute, that the point is brought out nearly pure for the consideration of the Court. In saying this, however, I do so under the impression, or rather the conviction, that here nothing can come under the description of facts, but matters which are substantiated by the written papers before us. For, as to the supposed personal views, party feelings, and secret motives of the parties, the presumptions and probabilities, that what they intended was something different from that which they did, I entirely discard them from my consideration. I have no means of discovering these secret matters; they are not brought to light by proof; and not being in any way ascertained, I am not only entitled, but bound to reject them as grounds for any judicial opinion.

In stating the facts, it is needless to go farther back than the meeting of Presbytery of the 28th of October 1841. Mr Middleton's presentation had been sustained; and as he was already an ordained minister of the Church, part of the more ordinary proceedings, such, I believe, as the taking him on trials, was unnecessary. Till that meeting the proceedings had been allowed to go on in accordance with the Act of Assembly 1834, respecting calls; and had all been directed to the purpose of ascertaining the number of the dissents of the male heads of families in communion with the Church. I mention this only in the way of narrative, and to dispense with the necessity of going into the details of the prior proceedings; for I found nothing whatever on the supposed homologation by the majority of Presbytery of the Act of Assembly. At the meeting of the 28th October for moderating the call, it was ascertained that the dissents amounted to a majority of the male heads of families on the roll; and at the second diet of the meeting on that day, the proceedings took place which appear at pages 12 and 13 of minutes of Presbytery.

Here it is necessary to distinguish between the first vote, that sustaining the call, in opposition to the counter motion "to sist procedure, and report to the General Assembly;" and the second, resolving to disregard the complaints and appeals taken against the former resolution, and to proceed with the settlement, being in opposition to the amendment moved for taking into consideration the special objections, by that time tendered, to the fitness of the presentee. For there is a great, and to me unintelligible, distinction made by the majority of the Presbytery, between the mode of treating the complaints and appeals against the first resolution, and the similar steps taken by the dissentients and minority of Presbytery against the second.

The complaint and appeal against the first resolution are received, and declared by the second vote to be inept and incompetent, as founded on the Veto Act, and, "therefore, not a legal bar to the proceeding with the settlement." This, whether a good judgment or not in substance, is quite correct in form. After receiving the appeal, it might be a fit subject of determination, that the appeal formed, in the circumstances of the case, no bar to proceeding with the settlement. But when the second resolution was carried, in opposition to the amendment, that the special objections should be received and discussed, it appears clearly, both from the notarial protest and the subsequent minutes of Presbytery, that reasons of dissent, and complaint and appeal, were tendered against that resolution too, and that those reasons of dissent, and that complaint and appeal, were not received, and were not entered in the record at all.

This is expressly stated in the protest; and it is placed beyond a doubt by the minutes of the next meeting which took place on the 11th of November. (See these proceedings, p. 16, beginning, "The clerk here stated," &c.)

Now, here the Presbytery admit and record the reasons of dissent and complaint against the receiving the memorial for certain heads of families, and also those against the first resolution sustaining the call. But as to the reasons of dissent ~~shown~~, and complaint by, the minority against the second, and by far the most important resolution,—viz., that against receiving the special objections, they find they—i. e., the reasons of dissent—"cannot be competently received, because they are ex facie based on an erroneous assumption, and, moreover, that the record was closed;" and at page 18, they treat the formal appeal by the parties against the second resolution with as little ceremony. "With respect to the third paper of reasons of protest and appeal lodged, inasmuch as the said reasons are ex facie equally ill based with those of the minority, which have been already refused, the Presbytery also refuse to record these reasons, and intimated this accordingly." The distinction between complaints and appeals, I understand to be, according to the forms of the church courts, that complaints are presented at the instance of the minority of the court, and appeals by the private parties.

This is certainly, to me, a very novel and unaccountable way, to say the least of it, of treating reasons of complaint and appeals. The question, whether the reasons or grounds of appeal are "based on an erroneous assumption" or not, is matter for the Court appealed to, not that appealed from, to determine; and then, as to the record being closed, that, whatever its meaning may be, is clearly no objection either to the appeals or complaints, because the resolution that "the record be now closed," is part of the very deliverance which is appealed from and complained of.

But my reason for noticing these proceedings in such detail is, that they bring out distinctly the fact, that there were two resolutions, and two distinct complaints and appeals; the one against the resolution sustaining the call in opposition to the majority of dissents, and the other against the second resolution to proceed with the settlement, in defiance of the special objections tendered by certain of the parishioners,—a distinction which will be found to be of great importance in regard to that speciality in this case, which is referred to in the Lord Ordinary's note.

The Presbytery, then, having, on the 11th of November, carried through the settlement in terms of the last resolution of the second diet of the meeting of the 28th of October, and in defiance of the complaint and appeal taken against that resolution, as well as those taken against the former resolution of the same day sustaining the call, a petition and complaint was presented by various parties, described as male heads of families and communicants in the parish of Culsemund to the Commission of the General Assembly. That petition recited the proceedings which had taken place, terminating in the settlement, and concluded with the following summary of the three grounds on which the complaint was founded:—"That said proceedings and said settlement are in contravention not only of the recognised laws of the Church prior to the Act of Assembly anent calls, in consequence of the refusal of the said Presbytery to receive special objections against the said presentee, and of their determining to proceed in the face of the due and regular dissents and complaints of the minority of said Presbytery, and of the protests and appeals of the agents for the dissentients against their findings, but more especially of the said Act of Assembly anent calls, and of an apparent majority of dissents, received and judicially found under the same; and this, while there was no reason at all for their precipitancy,—no order, or pretended order, from any civil court, as in certain other cases,—and nothing but their own deliberate resolution so to do." And the prayer is for warrant to serve the petition on the majority, and the Rev. William Middleton, the presentee; to appoint the said parties respectively to appear before the Commission of the General Assembly, &c.

Upon this petition the Commission, by their deliverance of 17th November 1841, "grants warrant to cite the parties complained of to answer before the Commission at its meeting in March next, or, failing such meeting, before the General Assembly," and also appoints them to give in answers to the petition and complaint, in writing, either to the meeting of Commission or to the General Assembly. And, "further, the Commission, in the meantime, and until a final deliverance shall have been pronounced in regard to the proceedings complained of, did, and hereby do, interdict and prohibit the Rev. William Middleton from officiating and administering ordinances in the said parish, and authorise and enjoin the remanent members of the Presbytery of Garioch not complained of, to meet forthwith to provide for the ministration of the word and sacraments in the parish of Culsamond, in the manner which shall appear to them competent in the existing circumstances of said parish." This is the deliverance of the Commission, which is made the subject of the suspension and interdict now presented to this Court on behalf and in the name of the Rev. William Middleton, the party admitted, the majority of the Presbytery who admitted him, and Sir John Forbes of Craigievar, patron of the parish, for his interest.

The important part of the application is that which prays your Lordships "to suspend the proceedings, and particularly the sentence or deliverance of the Commission,"—to interdict the execution or intimation of the deliverance,—and to interdict the minority of the Presbytery from usurping and exercising any of the functions of the said Presbytery, by taking upon themselves the superintendence of the parish of Culsamond, and "from providing, or meeting to provide, for the ministration of the word and sacraments, &c., and from interfering with, or molesting the Rev. William Middleton in the discharge of his functions, and from preaching and administering the ordinances of religion in the church and parish of Culsamond." With regard to that part of the prayer of the suspension and interdict which relates to the molesting and disturbing the complainers, other than the Rev. William Middleton, in the performance of their duties as ministers of their respective parishes, &c., I see no room for it, as there seems to be nothing in the deliverance of the Commission of Assembly which is directed to any such object.

The chief objection on the part of the respondents, forming the three first pleas in law, truly resolves into a denial of the jurisdiction of this Court; and there is, besides, the 4th plea, "that, even if the Court had jurisdiction, which is expressly denied, the procedure of the complainers was inept and illegal, and contrary to the laws of the Church." It is obvious, both from the pleas themselves, and from the argument we have heard at such length, that the point mainly contested between the parties is the jurisdiction of this Court to entertain such an application. And, in order to arrive at any conclusive solution of this most important question, it is indispensable to keep distinctly in view, 1st, The character of the body by which the deliverance complained of was pronounced; 2dly, What that deliverance did, or was intended to do; and, 3dly, What this Court is truly called upon to do by the suspension and interdict.

Now, in the first point, considering that your Lordships have resolved to defer any determination on the competency and powers of the Commission until the bill be passed, I am entitled to assume, as the parties did in the leading part of their argument (being the only part which we are now to notice), that the Commission of the General Assembly is a recognised ecclesiastical body, entitled to exercise jurisdiction in matters ecclesiastical; and, I presume, it may also be taken for granted that its judicial orders or determinations are subject to the review of the General Assembly.

On the second point, it is clear, from the terms of the deliverance itself, that though not, properly speaking, a sentence, it is a judicial order, prohibiting the Rev. Mr Middleton from officiating and administering ordinances in the parish, and directing certain members of Presbytery to provide for the consequences of Mr Middleton's disability, until a final deliverance shall have been pronounced on the proceedings complained of. It is not a sentence of suspension: that would only apply to the case of an incumbent legally and effectually settled. This is an interdict against officiating, until it shall be ascertained whether there was any legal settlement or not. It was not, and could not, from the circumstances, be pronounced causa cognita; and consequently the Commission had no means—no opportunity of discriminating between, and deciding separately on, the different grounds assigned for the application. It was exactly analogous to those interim orders which are pronounced in our own practice, on applications complaining of breach of law or private right, and in which an interim order or interdict is, without scruple, granted, unless it appears ex facie of the application itself that all the grounds assigned for it are ill founded. And it appears to me that the remark of the Lord Ordinary, founded on the practice of the Bill-Chamber, was here perfectly relevant and well founded. It was made in answer to the charge of the supposed injustice of punishing a party by interdict before he had been heard,—an answer, I think, perfectly conclusive, as showing that the justice and necessity of such interim orders is recognised in the practice of our own Courts. And when it is asked, as was done in the course of the argument, what Statute authorised any kind of Bill-Chamber in the ecclesiastical courts, I rather think it will be found (though this is, perhaps, more appropriate to the reserved point—the power of the Commission), that the Bill-Chamber itself had originally as little statutory authority as the Commission, and that it, in all probability, takes its origin solely from the delegation, by the authority of the Court itself, of its powers to a part of its own members,—a delegation certainly anomalous in principle, but introduced and sanctioned in practice, on the ground of the necessity or expediency of preventing an absolute denial of all justice, while the body of the Court was not sitting. But without going further into this, all that it is necessary to remark here is, that this is a judicial order, pronounced by a body entitled to exercise jurisdiction.

As to the third point, namely, what is sought by the present suspension and interdict, it appears to me equally clear, that what is demanded is a review, in the form of suspension, of the judicial order pronounced by the ecclesiastical court. That is the true object and meaning of every suspension of a judgment of a court. It is true there is also an interdict craved; and, in the ordinary case of a suspension and interdict directed against a private party, the suspension is little more than introductory. It is the interdict which is the principal matter. The suspension is only the accessory, being the form of stating the claims of right on which the interdict is rested. But in a suspension and interdict directed against the judgment of a court having jurisdiction, there is a prima facie ground of right adverse to the interdict,—viz., the judgment itself; and that must be taken out of the way by a review and reversal, before the interdict can be finally sustained. The suspension there is the principal matter, and the interdict only the accessory. Before finally imposing the interdict, the Court called upon to suspend, must review the judgment complained of; and it is only on finding upon such review that the reasons of suspension are good,—in other words, that the judgment complained of is bad, that the interdict can be granted. Lord Stair, in describing reasons of suspension, says,—“It is termed a reason to difference it from defences proposed in ordinary actions, because a reason of suspension is a defence in the principal cause, and the answer is a reply thereto.” In short, here the reasons of suspension which this Court is called upon to take cognisance of, just express, under a different name, those defences or considerations which ought to have led the Commission to withhold the deliverance complained of. It is true the only interdict at present asked is interim interdict. But if the permanent imposition of the interdict, in such a case, necessarily imports the actual review of the judgment complained of, the laying on even of the interim interdict must assume, at least, the jurisdiction of the Court to review the judgment. As the judgment on the note, when passed, is necessarily a review of the judgment complained of, the passing of the note, without any qualification, and the granting of the interim interdict, is as clearly a rejection of the pleas against the jurisdiction. So that the question of passing the note and granting the interdict, necessarily raises the question of the jurisdiction of review.

And it is hardly necessary to observe, that the true legal character of that which is sought from this Court, cannot be affected by the name which the complainers choose to give it. All that they ask of the Court is, as they say, to quash the deliverance,—an expression which proves nothing; for, in order to quash any sentence or judicial order of a court entitled to exercise jurisdiction, it is indispensable to review it, in order to determine whether there were good grounds for pronouncing it or not. Indeed, it is evident from the very terms and object of the most important part of the application, that it does necessarily import a review and reversal of the order pronounced by the Commission. The interdict applies only to those positive acts which are authorised by the deliverance. But what is to be said to the negative or prohibitory part of the deliverance,—that interdicting Mr Middleton from officiating? It does not follow, from the parties complained of being debarred from interfering with Mr Middleton, that he is entitled to officiate in the face of the interdict of the Commission. The restoration of his right to officiate, in so far as it can be assisted by any judgment in this suspension, must rest, not on the interdict, but on the leading part of the prayer to "suspend the proceedings complained of, and particularly the sentence or deliverance of the Commission against the complainers, of the date of 17th November 1841."

I am the more anxious to place this in a clear point of view, because the true character of the relief sought enters deeply into the question of jurisdiction. It excludes entirely the application of all those cases and principles which touch merely the competency and admissibility of determining, incidentally, in questions confessedly within the jurisdiction of the Court, points in themselves beyond it, but necessary for the extrication of the matter at issue in the principal action. Thus the civil court, though originally possessing no jurisdiction, and though, till very lately, possessing no jurisdiction prima instantia in Consistorial cases, had, when questions of marriage and legitimacy were raised in proper civil actions, the power to determine those matters, as the means of reaching the conclusions in the principal cause. In the same way, the fact of theft, or any other crime, when touching merely civil interests, must be taken cognizance of when urged in the civil court. Other illustrations of this well-understood principle might be offered. One of the most striking is the case of Lord Caithness, in which the Court of Session had no scruple in determining a question of peerage, on which a point competently brought before them, and within their jurisdiction, depended,—viz., whether or not a party was entitled to be enrolled as a freeholder? And, in relation to the matter in dispute in the present case, it might be granted, in argument, that even points settled by the decision of a court fell under the same principle. If, for instance, any question of civil right were raised in a civil process in this Court, and if the decision of that question of civil right depended on the legal effect and validity of the deliverance now under consideration, it might possibly be a competent subject for determination, whether that judgment was truly to be held conclusive or not. I think it would be difficult to say that it was not: I see no cases to the contrary. That of Kilbucho, referred to, is certainly not of that kind; for there the Court evidently did not go on the invalidity or illegality of the sentence of deprivation, but on the different ground, the legal defect in the evidence that any such judgment had been pronounced. But it is quite unnecessary to go into this here, because there is here no civil action,—no action clearly and legitimately within the jurisdiction of the Court, in which the point of the legality or validity of the sentence of the Commission is merely incidental, and its determination necessary for the determination of the principal cause. The legality or validity of that sentence or deliverance of the Commission, is the only point before the Court. The sole object of the suspension is the review and reversal of that deliverance; and the single point, in so far as jurisdiction is concerned, is, whether this Court has power to review that deliverance or not?

Holding, then, these premises to be fixed,—that the order complained of is the judgment or judicial deliverance of a body having jurisdiction, and that the remedy sought by suspension, truly and necessarily involves a power of review of that judgment or judicial deliverance,—I now proceed to consider the principles on which the jurisdiction of review always must rest. And here, I confess, I should have held these principles to be so elementary, and so well understood, as to require no formal exposition, had it not been for the doctrines, on this matter, propounded with such confidence, and enforced with such energy on the part of the suspenders. It seemed to me to be assumed that there was, in this Court, an inherent jurisdiction to construe all Statutes, and, in general, to expound authoritatively all law, in so far as that was necessary, to prevent other courts from committing what was called wrong. I know of no such principle,—which, on the contrary, I think is directly adverse to our constant practice in cases strictly analogous to the present.

The challenge was repeatedly given by the opening counsel for the respondents,—“How do you account, on that principle, for the supreme fiscal jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer, and the supreme criminal jurisdiction of the Court of Justiciary?” I could not observe that the counsel for the suspenders, in his reply, did respond to that challenge; unless we could hold it to be answered by the counter questions put,—“Is it no civil wrong to be deprived, even temporarily, of the exercise of the rights and functions of the ministry, and to be subjected to the intrusion of other parties substituted in the discharge of those functions against our will?” I am afraid this somewhat declamatory mode of dealing with the point will not do. If such considerations as these were admitted, there would be at once an overthrow of all the barriers by which the distinct jurisdictions, recognised by our system of policy, are separated. With all respect for the dignity and importance of the clerical functions, I think there could be little doubt that, tried by this test of civil wrong, the prohibition of preaching, for a few months, by the Commission of the Assembly, is somewhat lower in the scale than the infliction of penalties, to any amount, by the Court of Exchequer, or the pains of imprisonment, transportation, or death, inflicted by the criminal court. And if such a loose view of the matter would be laughed at, if offered as the ground for interference by the Court of Session with those separate jurisdictions, the same rule must apply to the equally distinct jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical court. For, as to any distinction supposed to be founded on the superior efficiency of the executorial powers possessed by those supreme tribunals, compared with those competent to the church courts, I entirely disregard it. In the question of jurisdiction, it affords no argument one way or other. If it operates at all, it creates only an additional obligation on the strong to be the more scrupulous how they encroach on the right of the weak. It is true we have artillery strong enough, in the shape of interdicts, and diligence, and fine, and even imprisonment,—and the church courts are now despoiled of the weapons of offensive warfare, once strong enough in their hands,—but what is that to the purpose in a question of right? The defensive armour of argument, reason, and justice, at least, are at their command; and I trust those are the arms by which every judicial contest in this Court is, and ever will be, decided. It is clear, when particular subjects of judicial inquiry are appropriated to different judicial institutions, the only point for the civil court to determine, in a question of jurisdiction, always must be, not whether the thing complained of is hurtful to the feelings, character, fortune, or person of the complainer, but whether the form and means through which those supposed injuries are inflicted, are within the cognizance of the Court.

The question, then, of the competency of a jurisdiction of review must be investigated by a somewhat stricter rule; and, with great submission, it appears to me, that if there be one rule which can be considered as fixed, both in principle and in practice, it is this, that no court can exercise a jurisdiction of review, unless it possess jurisdiction in the subject of the judgment which is sought to be reviewed. There are cases, no doubt, in which a court may possess a power of review, though it is debarred from exercising jurisdiction in the matter prima instantia. But those will all be found to involve—not an extension of the jurisdiction of review beyond that which is otherwise inherent in the Court, but a limitation of the inherent jurisdiction of the Court from considerations of expediency, requiring that certain matters should, in prima instantia at least, be investigated in an inferior tribunal of the same class. Such, for instance, are causes proceeding on brivies; because, according to Mr Erskine, “brivies must be directed to inferior judges,” and causes regarding sums under a particular amount, and others of the same kind. These give no countenance to the principle, that a court may have the jurisdiction of review in matters not falling within its own proper competency; but are merely instances of the limitation of the jurisdiction competent to them, to the exercise of a power of review; for the practical reason, that the matters can be more conveniently discussed, in the first instance, in the inferior court. In this way, the greater number of civil causes cannot be taken up by this Court until they have been investigated by the Lord Ordinary; and the House of Lords can proceed only by review of judgments pronounced by this Court. But there cannot be a doubt that the jurisdiction of review rests, in all of these cases, on the inherent jurisdiction of the court of review, in the subject of the judgment appealed from.

And the principle does not rest merely on theoretical views; it is completely borne out in practice. It has, indeed, been very seldom attempted to suspend, in this Court, the judgments of any separate supreme tribunal. The questions of most frequent occurrence arose in attempted suspensions of the judgments of inferior courts; and, even in those questions, the mode in which the matter was contested, affords a confirmation of the rule and principle already alluded to. As those inferior courts frequently had a mixed jurisdiction, civil, fiscal, and criminal, and as this Court has in certain matters a criminal jurisdiction, the point taken by the suspender generally was, not that the Court of Session had, from its general power to redress wrong, a jurisdiction of review in all matters, but that the special matter of the judgment suspended truly was itself civil, or, if criminal, was within the criminal jurisdiction of the Court of Session. The distinction attempted in such cases frequently involved points of great nicety and difficulty; and certainly they seem, in our older practice at least, to have been ruled sometimes on very questionable grounds. Thus, for a long time, it was held that the Court of Session had a right to review criminal sentences pronounced by the Sheriff, if they had been pronounced without a jury, upon the somewhat loose notion that these were matters of police. But the rule was set on its right footing, and has ever since continued so, by the case of Berry v. Walker and Rodgers (17th January 1809), in which a suspension of the sentence of a Sheriff, condemning to pillory and imprisonment, was found incompetent in the Court of Session, though the sentence proceeded on a trial without jury. And certainly, if irregularities in procedure could have let in the jurisdiction of the Court of Session, there were irregularities enough there to justify the application. The whole procedure seems to have been one course of irregularity, beginning with the complaint itself, offered without the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal.

Since that time various other cases have been determined on the same principle, which it is unnecessary to quote. But there are two pronounced on the same day, the 15th May 1810, which I cannot pass over, because they place, in the clearest light, the principle on which the jurisdiction of review in this Court truly rests. Those are the cases of Johnstone against Guthrie and Finlay. The first was an advocacy from the sentence of a Sheriff on the Statute of Usury, in an action at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal for the triple penalties, ad vindictam publicam. There the Court sustained its jurisdiction. The second was an advocacy of a sentence of fine and imprisonment pronounced by the Sheriff without a jury in a complaint against the same party for subornation of perjury; and this advocacy was dismissed as incompetent.

Now, what was the reason of this difference?

In the first case, it is clear from the report, that the defenders, the advocates, put their case on this, that the judgment must be viewed as involving matter falling within the jurisdiction of the Court of Session. They maintained that the offence charged did not amount to usury, but that, at all events, the complaint demanding penalties alone must be viewed as a civil action, or at least an action cognisable by the civil court, and had been uniformly so treated, as, according to Mr Hume, there had not been a prosecution of the kind, in the Supreme Criminal Court, for more than a century. Whether considering the matter then as civil, or, if criminal, as falling within the criminal jurisdiction of the Court of Session, the jurisdiction was good according to the principle already laid down.

But in the other case, in which the subject of accusation, subornation of perjury, was a crime not cognisable by the civil court, unless under peculiar circumstances, which did not there exist, "the Court was unanimously of opinion, that wherever the fine was solely ad vindictam publicam, they had no jurisdiction." Nothing can be imagined so well calculated to bring out the principle. In the one case the jurisdiction of review was sustained; and in the other it was disclaimed; the test for determining the point in both cases being, whether the Court of Session had or had not inherent jurisdiction in the matter forming the subject of the judgment complained of?

And the principle is not in the slightest degree affected by the circumstance of alleged irregularities in the procedure. If the matter of the judgment be out of the resort of the civil court, and be appropriated by law to a different class of tribunals, the civil court is not understood to know either the law or the forms of those separate tribunals. The irregularities committed by an inferior court are cognisable only by the higher tribunals of the same character. If committed by a court absolutely supreme, they are not reviewable at all, and can only be considered as unfortunate instances of that occasional failure to which all human institutions are liable.

Again, when the right of review, or of annulling the sentences or judgments of courts of a different character of jurisdiction, is put on the alleged excess of power or transgression of their due limits, it is necessary to make a distinction. The proposition will be found to be true or false according to the meaning attached to the terms; for "excess of power or jurisdiction" has two meanings. It may mean that the inferior tribunal has, without going out of the province of the courts of the same class, exceeded its power in regard to other and higher tribunals of that class; as, for instance, in the case of an inferior criminal court pronouncing sentence for a crime which is withheld from its cognisance, and reserved for the higher tribunals, or inflicting a punishment more severe than it was entitled to do. In another sense, excess of power may mean the transgression of those limits by which the jurisdiction of that class of courts is separated from that of another and totally distinct class of courts.

The necessity of this distinction is obvious in this question. Because the excess of power of the first kind will not open the power of review to any court but a superior court of the same character of jurisdiction. The infliction of a punishment by an inferior criminal court, severer than it had the power to inflict, or for a crime which was reserved from its cognisance, would never open the power of review to the Court of Session, but only to the higher criminal court. On the other hand, the excess of power, in the other meaning of the term, would open the power of review or challenge to the court, on whose peculiar province the judgment had transgressed. And why? for the very reason which I have assigned above,—viz., that the subject of the judgment complained of was a subject in which the Court complained of had no jurisdiction, and the Court complained to had. This admits of being brought to a simple but conclusive test. If the fiscal courts happened to pronounce a judgment encroaching on the criminal court, or vice versa, there would be no room for a suspension, or any kind of review in the civil court, but only in the court whose jurisdiction the judgment infringed. I hold it, then, to be established, as firmly as any point can be established, both by theory and by the most authoritative practice, that the general power of the Court of Session to redress all wrong committed by other courts, has no existence in the law and constitution of this country. The pure and sole ground for interference in any way of the Court of Session, with the proceedings of any separate class of courts, is not that those courts have committed wrong, and exceeded their proper jurisdiction, but that they have done so by encroaching on ours.

Holding these principles, then, to be fixed, and I really regret that I have found it necessary to explain my views of them at such length, let us apply them to the present case. A judicial order has been pronounced by the Commission of the General Assembly, which is to be considered as an inferior ecclesiastical tribunal, inasmuch as its deliverances are subject to review by the General Assembly. By that order Mr Middleton is interdicted from officiating and administering ordinances within the parish of Culsemund, till the merits of the complaint are disposed of; and certain members of the Presbytery, to the exclusion of certain others, are directed to take measures for supplying his place.

Now, on the principle which I have already submitted, there are but two grounds possible on which the right of review, by suspension or otherwise, in this Court, can be sustained. Either the judgment of the Commission must be considered as not in re ecclesiastica, and as involving matters properly civil; or the Court of Session must be held to have, in this particular matter, proper ecclesiastical jurisdiction. These are the issues to which the question of jurisdiction is necessarily brought.

But, can either the one or the other of these propositions be made out? Can they be even plausibly maintained? I confess it appears to me that they cannot.

In regard to the first, can anything be well considered more purely, more exclusively ecclesiastical, than a prohibition against one clergyman preaching and administering the sacraments, and a direction to certain others so to officiate for him? If this be not in re ecclesiastica, I do not know what can fall under the description. For, as to the remark that civil consequences may follow from that order, it is here quite irrelevant. It will be time enough to discuss the validity of the order to that effect, when any question as to civil consequence is raised in a civil action. Here, in this case, as to the competency of review, we are confined to the consideration of the order itself, whether it be in re ecclesiastica or not. And if that question be, as I think it must be, answered in the affirmative, there only remains the other point, forming, on that view, the indispensable condition of our power of review,—has the Court of Session any ecclesiastical jurisdiction whatever?

Now, I should have thought that that question admitted of little doubt. This Court was, in its original character and constitution, a purely civil court. In some particular cases it has acquired, by usage or otherwise, criminal jurisdiction; but I am not aware of any authority, in principle or practice, for holding that it has even the slightest shred of any ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Indeed, all the authorities are directly the other way. It is expressly laid down by Mr Erskine, (B. I. tit. 5, § 24,) that "it is the business of Presbyteries to inflict Church censure on offenders, plant ministers in vacant churches, and ordain them, translate them from one church to another, suspend them from the exercise of their office, and deprive them of the office itself." And though he proceeds to state, that, in civil or criminal causes, churchmen are, since the Reformation, equally subject with laymen to the jurisdiction of the magistrate, he closes with the observation,—“Yet no act of a spiritual nature can to this day be exercised, nor any spiritual censure inflicted, either on the clergy or the laity, but in the church courts.” And it evidently follows, from the same principle, that no spiritual censure imposed in the church courts can be withdrawn or suspended but by the same courts.

But it would be doing injustice to this part of the case to confine ourselves to these mere general and theoretical views of the question. It admits of, and indeed requires to be more closely grappled with. For to me it does, with great submission, appear, that the absolute jurisdiction of the church courts in such matters, and the positive exclusion of all other courts whatever, is the subject of positive enactment by the Statutes of this realm—enactments far more explicit and unequivocal than could be advanced in support of many of the powers exercised without question by the Court of Session. Of course, in discussing the question upon this ground, I throw out of view, as entirely misplaced here, those theological propositions upon which the Church, naturally enough, perhaps, sometimes prefers to rest her pretensions. I may be permitted, however, to make one remark: When a religious system embraces particular theological dogmas in regard to the exclusively spiritual supremacy or headship of the Church, from which certain practical consequences, in regard to the independence of the church courts on all similar tribunals, necessarily flow, and when the Legislature sanctions and adopts that system as the established religion of the State, it would be difficult to deny that it eo ipso adopts and sanctions those practical consequences as to jurisdiction, which are inherent parts of the system.

That implication itself would go far to sustain in this country the absolute independence of the church courts in re ecclesiastica. But the matter is not left to stand on this implication. It has been made the subject of express and positive enactment. It would appear that, as early as the year 1567, the jurisdiction of the Kirk had engaged the attention of the Scotch Parliament and of the General Assembly. In the collection of the "Acts of Parliament," (fol. edit. Vol. III. p. 87,) there are various articles which seem to have been drawn up by the General Assembly for the consideration of Parliament. One of these is,—“That to this our Kirk be granted, and by this present Parliament confirm, sic freesome privilege, jurisdiction and authoritie, as justly appertains to the true Kirk, and that na other face of religion be permittit; and that na jurisdiction ecclesiastical be acknowledged within this realm other than that quhilk as sall be within this Kirk, or flows frae the same.”

There is one marginal note to this which is scored; but the note, appearing to be ultimately adopted, is simply "approvit." This evidently was the foundation of the twelfth Act of the Parliament 1567, entitled, anent "the Jurisdiction of the Kirk," (fol. edit. Vol. III. p. 24,) which, for some reason or other, is omitted in the small edition of the Acts. It begins,—“Anent the article proponet and given in be the Kirk to my Lord Regent, &c., anent the Jurisdiction justly appertaining to the true Kirk,” &c. The enactment is,—“The Kingis grace, with advise of my Lord Regent, and thre Estatis of this present Parliament, hes declarit and grantit jurisdiction to the said Kirk, quhilk consistis and standis in preicheing of the trew word of Jesus Christ, correctioun of maneris, and administratioun of holy sacramentis; and declaris that there is na other face of Kirk, nor other face of religioun, than is presentlie by the favour of God establischt within this realme; and that thair be no other jurisdiction ecclesiasticall acknowledged within this realme, other than that quhilk is and sall be within the same Kirk, or that quhilk flows thairfrae concerning the premisses.” And it concludes with a commission to certain lords and ministers “to seirche furth mair speciale, and to consider quhat other speciall points or clauses suld appertaine to the jurisdiction, privilege, and authority of the said Kirk; and to declair their mindis thairanentis to my Lord Regent and the Estatis of this realm at the next Parliament.”

The meaning of this enactment I think clear. It is not that preaching of the word, correction of manners, or Church censures, and the administration of sacraments, are exercises of jurisdiction; that would be absurd. The meaning evidently is, that they are the matters or subjects to which the exclusive jurisdiction of the Kirk relates; that the authority to exercise those functions, as it flows from the Kirk, so it can only be bestowed, suspended or withdrawn, by their sentence. And, accordingly, the enactment is, that there be “nae uther ecclesiastical jurisdiction within the realm uther than that quhilk is within the same Kirk, or that which flows therefrae concerning the premisses,”—i. e., concerning the preaching of the word, correction of manners, and administration of sacraments. And the object of the commission is to inquire what other points should appertain to the jurisdiction, privilege, and authority of the Kirk. Calderwood, in giving an account of this Statute (pp. 43, 44), describes it as ordaining “that there shall be no other jurisdiction ecclesiastical but that which is, and shall be, within this same Kirk concerning preaching of the word, correction of manners, and administration of the sacraments;” and concludes—“So ye see what points they acknowledged clearly to appertain to the jurisdiction of the Kirk, and how they gave commission to search more specially, and to consider what other special points and clauses could appertain to the jurisdiction, privilege, and authority of the said Kirk.”

This Act is repeated in the sixth Parliament of James VI., 1579, containing a renewal also of the commission. Cap. 7 of the Acts of Parliament, folio edition, and cap. 69 (p. 137) of the common edition of the Acts, with this difference only, that the latter omits the commission, and gives the title of the Statute, “Quhairin consistis the Jurisdiction of the Kirk,” instead of the true title, “Anent the Jurisdiction of the Kirk,” which, like the former Act 1567, it bears in the more authentic copy of the record in the folio edition.

The next Statute which it is necessary to notice, is that of 1581, cap. 99 (small edition). It ratifies and approves “all freedoms whatever, privileges and immunities, &c., given by his Hienesse or his regents to the true and haly Kirk presently established, &c. &c., all and whatsumever Acts of Parliament, Statutes made of before by his Hienesse and his regentes anent the liberty and freedom of the said Kirk.” Various Statutes are particularly enumerated, and, among others, one entitled “Anent the Jurisdiction of the Kirk,” which, from the title and the position which it holds in the enumeration, is clearly that of 1567; and another, with the same title, which is as clearly that of 1579.

Then comes the well-known Act 1592, cap. 116. This Statute, besides its various provisions respecting the gradation of Church judicatories, ratifies all the Statutes made before in favour of the Kirk, "and specially the first Act of the Parliament holden at Edinburgh the 24th day of October 1500 four score and one years, with the hail and particular Acts therein mentioned, quhilk shall be as sufficient as gif the same were here exprest." This is the Act 1581, quoted immediately above, being the first printed Act in the small edition. There is here clearly, then, through the medium of the Act 1581, what is equivalent to an express ratification and re-enactment in this Statute 1592, of the Acts of 1567 and 1579, "anent the Jurisdiction of the Kirk," which were two of the particular Acts mentioned in the Act 1581.

The Act 1592, as it is well known, fixes the government of the Kirk by certain gradation of church courts, and when combined with the general ratification already alluded to, I think it amounts to a positive enactment that church government shall be absolute, and the church courts exclusive, at least in all matters declared to be within the "jurisdiction of the Kirk," by the Acts 1567 and 1579, or any of the other Statutes, expressly ratified and confirmed through the medium of the Act 1581, and the special ratification of it and all the Statutes mentioned in it.

This view is confirmed by other parts of the Statute. It abrogates and annuls all Statutes made at any time before, "against the liberty of the true Kirk, jurisdiction and discipline thereof, as the samin is used and established within the realm;" and it declares, "that the Act 1584, c. 129, shall nowise be prejudicial nor derogate anything to the privilege which God has given to the spiritual office-bearers in the Kirk concerning heads of religion, matters of heresie, excommunication, collation, or deprivation of ministers, or any siklike essential censures, speciallie grounded and having warrant in the Word of God."

It is unnecessary to enter into a detail of the changes made on these Statutes regarding jurisdiction, by the introduction of Episcopacy in the after period of the reign of James VI. That system of Church policy being held to be not inconsistent with some degree of secular supremacy, changes were introduced in regard to the jurisdiction of the Church, considered not unsuitable to that change of system; and, as the Church government connected with it fell under the sweeping enactments in the latter Parliaments of the reign of King Charles I., and as these again fell under the general rescissory Acts passed after the restoration of King Charles II., it is sufficient to come down to this latter period when Episcopacy was re-established. And on that occasion there was, besides the general rescissory Acts applicable to the Statutes passed from 1639 to the Restoration, an express abrogation of the Act 1592, and the various other Acts passed in favour of the Presbyterian Church government in the time of James VI. These rescissory or negative enactments, the declaration in them of what once was, and is, declared to be no longer law, affords the strongest confirmation of what I conceive to have been law in regard to jurisdiction, under the former Presbyterian government of the Church.

The Act 1662, cap. 1, small edition, Vol. II. p. 283, is entitled, "An Act for the restitution and re-establishment of the ancient government of the Church by Archbishops and Bishops." It sets out with stating, that "the ordering and disposal of the external government of the Church doth properly belong unto his Majestie as an inherent right of the Crown, by virtue of his royal prerogative and supremacy in causes ecclesiastical." And again,—"And his Majesty considering how necessary it is that all doubts and scruples which, from former acts or practices, may occur to any concerning this sacred order, be cleared and removed, doth therefore of certain knowledge, and, with advice foresaid, rescind, cass, and annul all Acts of Parliament by which the sole and only power and jurisdiction within the Church doth stand in the Church, and in the general, provincial, and presbyterial assemblies and kirk-sessions; and all Acts of Parliament or Council, which may be interpreted to have given any church power, jurisdiction, or government to the office-bearers of the Church, their respective meetings, other than that which acknowledgeth a dependence upon, and subordination to, the sovereign power of the King as supreme. And particularly, his Majestie, with advice foresaid, doth rescind and annul the first Act of the twelfth Parliament of King James VI., holden in the year one thousand five hundred and ninety-two, and declared the same, and all the heads, clauses, and articles thereof, void and null in all time coming." By the first Act of the twelfth Parliament of King James VI., 1592, is clearly meant the first printed Act, being the well-known Act 1592, cap. 116, ratifying the Presbyterian form of government of the Church. I think the fair, and even necessary inference from this description of the laws terminating in the Act 1592, declared to be annulled, is, that, by the law as it stood under the Act 1592, and prior Acts, the "sole and only power and jurisdiction in the Church did stand in the Church, and in the general provincial Presbyterian Assemblies and kirk-sessions, and that that jurisdiction was not dependent upon, and subordinate to, the sovereign power, as supreme," or of his ordinary courts of justice,—being the declarations exactly equivalent to those in the Acts 1567 and 1579, "anent the jurisdiction of the Kirk."

The next Act to be noticed is that of 1669, cap. 1, by which it is declared, that "his Majesty hath the supreme authority and supremacy over all persons, and in all causes ecclesiastical, within this his kingdom;" and it concludes, that "his Majesty, with advice and consent foresaid, doth rescind and annul all laws, acts, and clauses thereof, and all customs and constitutions, civil or ecclesiastical, which are contrary to, or inconsistent with, his Majesty's supremacy as it is hereby asserted." Various other Statutes were passed under the same reign, and directed to the same object,—such as the Act 1681, cap. 6, termed an Act "anent religion and the test," in which the oath to be taken by all functionaries, civil and ecclesiastical, bears, amongst other things, that "the King's majesty is the only supreme governor of this realm, over all persons, and in all causes, as well ecclesiastical as civil."

By these laws, then, the Presbyterian government of the Church was annulled; and the whole Acts, including the Act 1592, establishing the principle, which is understood to be inseparable from it,—viz., that the only ecclesiastical jurisdiction stood within the Church itself,—were rescinded.

So stood matters until the Revolution, when the restoration of the Presbyterian government was one of the objects which first attracted the attention of the Legislature. By the third Act 1689, cap. 3, Prelacy is abolished, and the Statutes restoring it are rescinded. Then, by the Act 1690, cap. 1, it is declared that the first Act of the second Parliament of King Charles II., entitled Act "asserting his Majesty's supremacy over all persons, and in all causes ecclesiastical, is inconsistent with the Church government now desired, and ought to be abrogat: therefore their Majesties, with the advice and consent of the Estates of Parliament, do hereby abrogat, rescind and annul the foresaid Act in its whole heads, articles, and clauses," &c.

Then comes the Act 1690, cap. 5, by which the Presbyterian Church government, as ratified and confirmed by the Act 1592, was restored; all the Statutes,—many of them specially enumerated,—"contrary or prejudicial to, inconsistent with, or derogatory from, the Protestant religion and Presbyterian government established, are annulled, rescinded, and made void." The special enumeration of the rescinded Acts includes the Act 1662, cap. 1, being that introducing Episcopacy, and which rescinded all the Statutes, declaring the only ecclesiastical jurisdiction to be within the Kirk and its courts. The Act 1690 also rescinds the Act "anent religion and the test," 1681, cap. 6, and ratifies the government of the Church as ratified and established by the Act 1592, "received by the general consent of this nation to be the only government of Christ's Church within this kingdom, and reviving, renewing, and confirming the foresaid Act of Parliament in the whole heads thereof, excepting that part of it relating to patronage,—a matter which does not touch the present question respecting jurisdiction.

Such, then, is the constitution of the Church government, which has been since frequently confirmed, and is now fully established; and I think it fairly warrants the following inferences:—In the first place, it may well be doubted whether the Court of Session, though possessing supreme and universal jurisdiction in all civil causes, can be considered, like some supreme courts in other systems, as the general depository of the whole judicial supremacy vested in the Sovereign, not otherwise expressly delegated. But even if it could be so considered,—and it is the only ground for holding that it could possess ecclesiastical jurisdiction,—all claim of the Court of Session to ecclesiastical jurisdiction of any kind, on this ground, is completely excluded by the existing laws, declaring that there is no supremacy in causes ecclesiastical vested in the Sovereign. Such supremacy is, by the Act 1690, cap. 1, expressly declared to be inconsistent with the establishment of the Church government, then described as desired, but afterwards definitively fixed by the Act 1690, cap. 5, which forms the existing law of the land.

2dly, Not only are the whole Statutes, annulling and rescinding those, by which “the sole power and jurisdiction in this Church doth stand in this Church,” themselves annulled by the Act 1690, but, by the same Act 1690, the Act 1592 is expressly ratified and renewed, revived and confirmed, “in the whole heads thereof.” Now, one of the most important heads of the Act 1592 was that ratifying and approving all liberties, privileges, immunities, and freedoms granted by his Hiennes, &c., to the trew and halie Kirk, and declared in certain Statutes there referred to,—and all and whatsoever Acts of Parliament made by his Hiennes and his regents anent the “liberty and freedom of the Kirk, and specially the first Act of the Parliament holden at Edinburgh the 24th day of October the year of God one thousand four score and nine years, with the hail particular Acts there mentioned, quhilk sall be als sufficient as gif the same were here expressed.” So that all the particular Acts mentioned in the Act 1581 are declared, by the Act 1592, to be as effectually ratified as gif the same were here expressed. And again, the Act 1690 ratifies the Act 1592 in all its heads, and thus ratifies and re-enacts all the Statutes in favour of the Church mentioned in the Act 1581. Now, it has been already shown, that, besides various others, two of the particular Acts, specially mentioned in the Act 1581, are those “anent the jurisdiction of the Kirk,” of 1567 and 1579. So that it appears to me clear to demonstration, in so far as that term can be applied to investigations of this kind, that, by the statute law of Scotland, there is no other jurisdiction ecclesiastical acknowledged within this realm, than that quhilk is within the said Kirk, concerning the preaching of the true word of Jesus Christ, the correction of manners, and the administration of the sacraments,—being the declaration of these Acts 1567 and 1579.

Then, again, see how this is confirmed by other Statutes. By the concluding clause of the Act 1693, c. 22, it is enacted,—“That the Lords of their Majesties’ Privy Council, and all other magistrates, judges, and officers of justice, give all due assistance for making the sentences and the censures of the Church, and judicatories thereof, to be obeyed, or otherwise effectual.” And the concluding passage of the Act 1695, c. 22, recommends to her Majesty’s Privy Council to take some effectual course “for stopping and blundering those ministers who are or shall be deposed, by the judicatories of this Established Church, from preaching or exercising any act of their ministerial function, which they cannot do after they are deposed without a high contempt of the authority of the Church, and the laws of the kingdom establishing the same.”

If this deduction of Statutes be correct, and I am not aware of any flaw in it, it seems to me to determine, and that upon the unanswerable grounds of statute law, that neither the one requisite nor the other here exists, for opening the power of suspension to the Court of Session. To warrant this, I have submitted, that either there must be some civil matter in the judgment sought to be reviewed, or this Court must have some ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Now, as to the first, there is absolutely no civil matter at issue. The only point is, who shall preach the word, and administer the sacraments within the parish of Culsamond, and who shall not, until the questions raised in the petition and complaint are finally determined. It humbly appears to me, that if there be meaning in language, these are the very matters which are declared by the Acts 1567 and 1579, and by the whole spirit and tenor of the other Statutes referred to, to fall within the jurisdiction of the Church, and to be matters ecclesiastical. 2dly, It is as explicitly enacted in these Statutes, that there be no ecclesiastical jurisdiction within the realm,—i. e., no jurisdiction which can take cognisance of such matters, other than that which is within the Kirk, or flows therefrom.

My reading of these Statutes, then, is, 1st, That by the statute law of this realm, the subject of the sentence or judicial order complained of is properly ecclesiastical; and, 2dly, That the civil court, possessing not a particle of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, either by usage or Statute, but being expressly excluded by Statute, cannot possibly have, upon the principles universally recognised in all analogous cases, any jurisdiction whatever to interfere with, suspend, review, or reverse that judicial order.

Indeed, in this view, the present application presents a strange inconsistency with the clauses which I read from the Acts 1693 and 1695. By those enactments, all courts and judges are required to assist in carrying into effect the sentences and censures of the Church judicatories, and making them to be obeyed. By the latter Act it is declared, that no minister can preach, &c., “after being deposed” (and the same rule must apply to preaching or exercising ecclesiastical functions after being suspended or interdicted), “without a high contempt of the authority of the Church and the laws of the kingdom.” Now, what is asked in this suspension and interdict, but to obstruct and defeat the order or sentence of the judicatories of the Church, directly in the face of the Statute; and to authorise, so far as this Court can authorise, Mr Middleton to preach, though interdicted,—i. e., to do that which the Act 1693 declares to be “a high contempt of the authority of the Church and the laws of the land?”

While it humbly appears to me that this is clear on the Statutes, I think it equally clear that it is confirmed by practice, in so far as the infrequency of any similar attempts could justify the use of such an expression. There is hardly to be found an instance of any attempt to interfere with the peculiar ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the church courts; and when any such attempt has been made, it has been uniformly unsuccessful. Even in the elaborate argument which we have heard, I do not think one case has been pointed out prior to the case of Strathbogie, 14th February 1840, in which the Court of Session have ever interfered with a strictly ecclesiastical sentence. That case I shall afterwards take occasion to notice. In the meantime, I may further observe, that even on those very occasions on which the Court of Session did, in consequence of the questions of civil right involved in the judgments of the church courts, review, to a certain effect, those judgments,—that was always done solely on the ground, and to the extent, of the civil rights so involved in them, and on many occasions under an express reservation of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the church courts.

But I think it unnecessary to go into a detail of those older cases, because the whole question of the rights of the civil court to control, in certain matters, the church courts, and the true grounds upon which that control rests, are clearly brought out in the case of Auchterarder,—a case which, strangely enough as it appears to me, is founded upon by the suspenders. As I understand that case, it is, if not in express terms, at least by clear legal implication, an authority against them and in favour of the respondents.

To get at the true bearing of the case, we must not be satisfied with a merely popular view of it, but scrutinize the true object of the action and grounds on which it was determined.

It was an action brought by the patron and presentee against the Presbytery, setting forth that they had rejected the presentee, and refused to take him on trials, solely on the ground of the veto or dissent of the majority of heads of families in the parish, and without any special objections to his qualifications; the leading declaratory conclusions being, that the “Presbytery were bound to take him upon trial, and, if qualified, to admit him.” “That the rejection of the pursuer by the Presbytery, without making trial of his qualifications, and without any objections having been stated to his qualifications or against his admission, and solely in respect of the veto or dissent of the parishioners, was illegal and injurious to the patrimonial interests of the pursuers.” Though the summons also contained petitory conclusions, they were for the time waived by the pursuers. It was admitted on the record by the defenders, that “the rejection of the presentee proceeded exclusively on the ground of the veto, or dissents exercised by the alleged majority of heads of families or parishioners of Auchterarder.”

The chief defence for the defenders, contained in their first plea in law, was very general. "By the laws of the Church of Scotland, which are also sanctioned by those of the State, all matters relating to the trial and induction of ministers" (which they evidently construed as meaning all matters relating to the settlement of ministers,) "are subject to the jurisdiction of the church courts, whose sentences are final and conclusive."

Now, if the Court had sustained this, forming the major proposition of the syllogism involved in the defenders' argument, viz., that all matters relating to the settlement of ministers are ecclesiastical, and subject to the jurisdiction of the church courts, and had, upon that assumption, sustained their own jurisdiction to control the proceedings of the church courts, that might have been held an authority against the suspenders. It would have been an instance of the Supreme Civil Court controlling and reviewing the ecclesiastical court in re ecclesiastica, in a matter properly within the resort of the latter. But the course of reasoning there followed, and which led to the decision against the defenders, was very different. The major proposition was denied. It was maintained by the pursuers, and ultimately held by this Court and the House of Lords, that all matters relating to the settlement of ministers were not subject to the jurisdiction of the church courts: that, on the contrary, there was one point at least there involved—namely, the right of presentation—which was strictly a civil right; and that that civil right was infringed by the Presbytery giving effect to their only ground for rejecting the presentee, according to their own admission, namely, the dissents of the majority of the heads of families. The true ground of the control exercised by the Supreme Court in the case of Auchterarder was, not the assertion of any right to control the ecclesiastical courts, or review their judgments in matters properly ecclesiastical, but that the Presbytery of Auchterarder had determined, and wrongfully determined, a matter civil, by holding the right of the patron to be dependent on the will of the majority of the heads of families—a point which this Court and the House of Lords held to involve no properly ecclesiastical matter whatever. In order to support the jurisdiction of the civil court, it was found necessary to make out, as a preliminary, that the church courts had gone wrong, not in re ecclesiastica, but in re civili—a matter clearly within the inherent jurisdiction of the civil court, and therefore warranting them, according to the very principles I have already taken the liberty to submit, in reviewing and controlling the proceedings of the ecclesiastical court.

That this was the true ground of the decision must be perfectly apparent, not only from the opinions of the majority of the Judges in this Court, but from those of the learned Lords who moved the affirmance in the House of Lords. In the opinions of all the Judges who composed the majority in the Court of Session, sustaining the jurisdiction, the distinction was made between the proper ecclesiastical power and duties of the Presbytery in the settlement and induction of ministers,—being the determination of the qualifications of the presentee,—and the merely ministerial duty of receiving and acting on the presentation. In regard to the first point, it seems to have been admitted on all sides, that the determination of the church courts would have been by the force of the Act 1567, cap. 7, final and conclusive, as a proper exercise of ecclesiastical jurisdiction; while, in regard to the second, it was held that the rejection of a legal presentation, or the abridgement of its operation, by giving effect to dissents, without cause assigned, was an infringement of a civil right. Indeed, it is curious enough, that one of the special grounds of the declarator, on the part of the pursuers, was, that the Presbytery had committed error or wrong, not in the exercise of their proper ecclesiastical jurisdiction, but in refusing to exercise it, by delegating that duty to the majority of heads of families. Summons, p. 9. 2d and 4th pleas in law for pursuers. P. 25, Report Auchterarder Case, Vol. I., and App. p. 25.

The same distinction is also taken in the House of Lords. (See Lord Brougham's opinion, pp. 19 and 20-24.)

He admits the right of the church courts to determine finally on the qualifications; but he denies their ecclesiastical right to adjudicate on the right of presentation, which he takes pains to show they did do, and did wrongfully do, by letting in the dissents of the majority. (See passage, p. 32 and p. 38.)

The same inference as to the grounds of the judgment, in so far as concerns jurisdiction, is to be drawn from the opinion of the Lord Chancellor. (See passages, pp. 51, 59, 60, and many others. Report of Supp. to Auchterarder Case: Edin., 1839.)

Nothing can be clearer than the ground on which jurisdiction was in that case sustained. It was one which, in sound principle, could not be denied,—viz., that the act complained of was, in the opinion of the majority of the Judges here, and of the House of Lords, no exercise of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, but an erroneous and wrongful adjudication on a question of civil right. It was held that the operation of the dissent of the majority was the same in principle, and nearly the same in degree, as if the Presbytery had resolved that part of the right to nominate was truly vested in that majority. That being clearly a question of civil right, the ground of decision is clearly inapplicable to the present case, in which no particle of civil right is involved.

It is true there was another point determined in the Auchterarder case; but it is one which is not here disputed, and which does not touch that which is disputed. It was held as clear, and most justly, by the Court here and by the House of Lords, that as the jurisdiction of the Court depended on the point whether the particular matter was civil or ecclesiastical, the Court had jurisdiction to determine whether it was the one or the other. That, there is no room to dispute. It is only saying, in other words, that this Court, like every other, has jurisdiction to determine the preliminary point, whether it has jurisdiction in the proper matter of the action or not. But it would be a strange conclusion to draw from this, that therefore the Court had such jurisdiction in the matter of the action. Every court must have the power to determine whether it has jurisdiction in a particular matter or not; but having got so far, it must deal with the question according to the rules of law. If it has jurisdiction, the Court will sustain it; if it finds the contrary, it will so determine. Now that is just the course which is to be taken here. I admit that this Court has the power to determine whether it has jurisdiction or not. Nobody denies it. But then the conclusion I arrive at is, that, according to the law as declared in the Statutes, and even according to the principle of the case of Auchterarder itself, this Court is bound to find that it has no jurisdiction, and, therefore, ought to refuse the note of suspension.

The case of Lethendy was a corollary from the principle adopted in the case of Auchterarder. One presentation had been rejected by the Presbytery on the ground of the dissents of the majority. The rejected presentee brought a declarator similar to that in the case of Auchterarder. In the meantime, the patron gave a second presentation to another person. The Court granted an interdict against the Presbytery settling the second presentee till the competition of rights should be determined; and this interdict was ultimately found to be within the jurisdiction of the Court. There being there a competition of civil rights—there being in fact two presentations—the Court held themselves entitled to interdict the Presbytery from acting on one of those presentations till it was determined by the civil court, clearly the only competent court in that matter, which was the legal and valid presentation.

As I said before, the case of Strathbogie, February 1840, is the only case in which this Court has ever interfered with the judgment of a church court in a matter purely ecclesiastical. There it certainly was so. It was the temporary suspension of certain clergymen from the exercise of their functions; and your Lordships did, on that occasion, sustain the jurisdiction by passing the note and granting the interdict as craved. But I may be allowed to remark, that that judgment was pronounced in absence, and I understand that it is now under reduction. On that occasion, I took the liberty of dissenting from the opinion of the majority; and the view I then took of the case has been only further confirmed, informed as I now have been by that which is the most important, indeed the only satisfactory source of judicial information—the collision of debate between the contending parties. After obtaining and considering that information, I have rested in the opinion which I held in the case of Strathbogie, that this order of the Commission was strictly and purely ecclesiastical, and that there is no jurisdiction in the civil court to review or reverse it in the form of suspension, or any other form.

With regard to the second Strathbogie case (Dec. 18, 1840), it has no application;—it went solely on the consent of certain of the defenders. Four of the defenders objected to the jurisdiction, while seven did not object to decree being pronounced in terms of the libel,—viz., that the Presbytery, of which they were all members, should be decerned and ordained to admit the pursuer, the presentee. The Lord Ordinary did not repel the objection to the jurisdiction, but allowed a record to be made up, including this very point of jurisdiction. And the question came to be, whether the Court could grant decree against seven members of the Presbytery, while the question of jurisdiction was in dispute at the instance of the other four defenders? The majority of the Court thought it competent, and decerned accordingly. But that was, and could be, only a judgment of consent; for, in so far as the matter was under discussion in foro contentioso, the jurisdiction was then, and still remains, undetermined in that case.

But the mention of the first case of Strathbogie leads me to consider the single and special ground on which the jurisdiction of the Court was there rested, for I agree fully with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that there is a peculiarity here which takes this out of the principle of the case of Strathbogie; or, to speak more correctly, that the specialty which truly ruled the Strathbogie case does not exist here.

In that case, Mr Edwards had obtained a presentation to the parish of Marnoch. It was ultimately rejected by the church courts on the dissents of the majority of heads of families. The judgment in the case of Auchterarder had fixed that that ground of restriction was illegal, and the presentee ultimately obtained declarator similar to that in the case of Auchterarder, and an interdict similar to that of Lethendy, against the Presbytery proceeding on another presentation in favour of Mr Henry. The majority of the Presbytery of Strathbogie conceived themselves bound to proceed in terms of the judgment of this Court and the House of Lords, in opposition to the injunction of the Commission of the General Assembly. And the Commission, holding this to be an act of contumacy, suspended the majority of the Presbytery until they should submit to the jurisdiction of the Church. This led to the suspension and interdict on the part of the majority of the Presbytery, calling on this Court to suspend the order of the Commission, and to interdict its execution.

Now, I think it impossible to read the opinions there expressed by the majority of this Court, without seeing that the true and only ground of decision was the illegality, on the part of the Commission, of holding an act of obedience to the civil court to be an ecclesiastical offence. It was not laid down as law that every sentence, purely ecclesiastical, was subject of suspension by the civil court, but that that particular sentence was so reviewable, because it was pronounced against parties for carrying the order of the civil court into execution. This circumstance was held to let in the jurisdiction of the Court to set it aside. Even in that view, I could not concur in the judgment, because I thought the question as to the jurisdiction of review necessarily depended on the subject of the judgment itself, and not on the rationes decidendi of the Court, whose judgment was attempted to be reviewed. It appeared to me then, and does so still, that if any procedure at all could have been taken on the supposed abuse of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, to the end of embarrassing and impeding the course of civil justice, it must be procedure for contempt, and by petition and complaint, and not by suspension and review. But again, the incompetency of even this last mode of procedure was fixed in a very strong case indeed, that of M'Queen, 21st December 1791; (Mor. 1791.) But without going further into this, what I meant to observe is, that there is no room in this case for the application of the principle which was the ground of decision in the case of Strathbogie. Here the order of the Commission did not rest on grounds which were illegal. It must be at once apparent, from looking at the procedure in this case, that there were grounds for the Commission issuing the order in question, without touching, in the slightest degree, on any one matter fixed by any judgment pronounced by your Lordships or the House of Lords.

The petition and complaint on which the deliverance of the Commission was granted, contained three heads of objection against Mr Middleton's settlement,—first, the refusal of the Presbytery to receive special objections against the presentee; secondly, the dissents and complaints of the minority of the Presbytery, and the protests and appeals of the dissentient parishioners against their different findings; and, thirdly, the majority of dissents of heads of families declared to be conclusive against the presentee by the Act of Assembly, generally termed the Veto Act.

Now, assuming, on the authority of the judgment in the case of Strathbogie, that this latter ground of complaint having been declared illegal by the Court and the House of Lords, could not warrant the Commission of Assembly in founding on it any order, though in itself ecclesiastical, which was not voidable by the civil court; and though it were further admitted that the appeal against the resolution of the Presbytery on that head were tainted with the same illegality, there would still remain two other grounds for supporting the application,—namely, the absolute rejection of the special objections, and the disregard by the Presbytery of the complaints and appeals against that rejection. And if these two latter points involve no illegality—no infringement of the judgment of the Court—there can be no room for questioning the exercise of the ecclesiastical authority of the Commission in acting upon them by the temporary interdict, till the merits of the petition and complaint were disposed of. For, independently of the English cases alluded to on this point, on the part of the respondents, it seems to me little short of an absurdity to maintain, when a judgment, or rather interim order, is pronounced, of which the competency or incompetency depends on the legality or illegality of the grounds of the application for it, that the judgment must be held incompetent, if only one ground out of the three assigned for the application is bad. I am inclined to hold the contrary, that, both in law and common sense, the competency of the order must be sustained if any one of the grounds assigned for the application is good. And that is the course invariably followed in our own practice as to interim interdicts. The strange assumption involved in the contrary opinion,—viz., that a court must be held to have gone on the bad ground alone, and not on the good,—is too extravagant to require a formal refutation.

Here, then, the question arises,—Where was the illegality of the parties and the minority of Presbytery, requiring the Presbytery to consider the special objections? And if there was no illegality in that, how were the majority of the Presbytery entitled to reject the special objections, and to refuse to admit the appeal, and to proceed with the settlement contrary to the express provision of the Act of Assembly 1732? For it is in vain to refer to the authority of Bankton as to the reasons for passing this Act of Assembly. Whatever may have been the object or motives of those who introduced it, its enactments are unequivocal, unqualified, and imperative. It declares, that after appeal, all procedure shall stop short of the actual settlement. As yet, I have seen no satisfactory answer on the part of the suspenders to the above-mentioned questions. It is said, indeed, that the right of parishioners to tender special objections is part of the Act of Assembly 1834; that these provisions are merely subsidiary to the main object of supporting the dissent of the majority of heads of families; and that the whole of this Act was declared illegal by the judgment of this Court and the House of Lords in the case of Auchterarder. This does seem an extraordinary misapprehension. We have only to read the Act itself, and the proceedings in that well-known case, in order to satisfy ourselves of the contrary. So far from the clauses of the Act being subsidiary to what is termed the veto, the regulations are totally distinct in their object and nature. In the event of a majority of dissents, the presentee is to be rejected. But if there be not a dissent of the majority without reasons,—if there be no veto, and any one or more of the heads of families state special objections, those special objections are to be received and disposed of according to the rules prescribed by the 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th articles of the regulations. And it is only in the double event of there being no special objections, and no dissent by a majority of heads of families at the meeting for moderating a call, that the Presbytery is entitled to proceed with the settlement. How can it be said that the tender of special objections is subsidiary to the veto, when the former are contemplated only in the case of the veto not taking place?

But, again, where is there any ground for the statement, that the judgment of this Court and the House of Lords, in the case of Auchterarder, determined the general illegality of the Act of Assembly 1834? Why, in so far as I can see, the Act of Assembly, though fully commented on in argument, is never once mentioned in the summons. The single ground taken there, and I think most properly taken, was the rejection of the presentee on the ground of the majority of dissents; and that is set forth in the summons without any mention whatever of the Act of Assembly, of which it happened to be a part. Nay, further, the summons seems evidently to imply that no exception could be taken, or was intended to be taken, to the regulations of the Act respecting special objections. One of the grounds of the summons is, that the Presbytery refused to take the pursuer on trials, though duly qualified, &c., "and though no objections had been stated against his qualifications." And, again, that the Presbytery, by rejecting the pursuer without making trial of his qualifications, and without any objections having been stated to his qualifications, acted illegally; and, as the pursuer had been rejected before trials, and at meetings of the Presbytery, long before there were any means for letting in all and sundry to make objections, after the edict was finally served for admitting him, I think the summons very fairly implies an admission, that there would have been no illegality in the tender of special objections at those meetings. This appears still more strongly from the pleas in law, and particularly the third: "As no objections were stated to the qualifications of the presentee," &c., "the Presbytery were bound to take him on trials,"—expressions which clearly imply that special objections were competent before taking him on trial. And this is set completely at rest by the express admission made by the opening counsel for the pursuers in the case of Auchterarder,—my friend, Mr Whigham, who, of all persons, both as a member of Assembly and counsel, was least likely to misapprehend the true object of the action. He expressly states (p. 55),—"If your Lordships will turn to the 4th, 5th, and 6th sections of the regulations of the General Assembly of 1834, you will find they just carry out this general principle of the general law of the Church; and, so far, these regulations are not now excepted against."

I cannot help thinking, therefore, that if the Commission went wrong in holding the tender of special objections, at that period of the proceedings, to be legal, and the rejection of them, without consideration, an unwarrantable act on the part of the Presbytery, they have been strangely misled—not only by the case of Auchterarder, but by the concurring authority of all parties in the General Assembly. For, in the year 1833, prior to the passing of the Act "anent Calls," it was carried by a vote of the Assembly—"That in all cases, it is competent by the law of the Church, sanctioned by the law of the land—competent for the heads of families in full and regular communion with the Church,—to give in to the Presbytery objections, of whatever nature, against the presentee, or against the settlement taking place; that the Presbytery shall deliberately consider these objections; and that, if they find them unfounded, or originating from causeless prejudice, they shall proceed to the settlement; but if they judge they are well founded, that they reject the presentation, the presentee being unqualified, it being competent for the parties to appeal from the sentence." (Report of debate 1833, p. 43: Edinburgh, 1833.) And a committee was ordered to draw up the necessary regulations.

In the following year, when the report ordered by this vote had been given in, the motion made by Dr Mearns, in opposition to that which ultimately sanctioned the veto, was, that the "report of last year's committee be approved of, and sent to all the presbyteries of the Church, with a view to its being declared the law of the Church in reference to calls." But the committee's report contains regulations as to special objections, almost identical with those on the same subject, in what is called the Veto Act. (Report of Proceedings of General Assembly 1834, pp. 61, 62: Edinburgh, 1834.) And as all the members of Assembly supported either one measure or the other, the result is obvious, that the competency of tendering special objections before taking the presentee on trials, and at the particular period which the Church thought most convenient, was recognised as the law of the land and the law of the Church by the whole members—churchmen, lawyers and Judges—of which the General Assembly was composed.

And what reason could possibly be given against this? It is said that, by law, the proper time for tendering objections by the parishioners was after the edict intimating the settlement, and at the meeting finally held for that purpose. But, in the first place, though the edict was employed for the purpose of publishing the opportunity that all the parishioners might have of stating objections, I see no authority for holding that special objections might not, by the law of the Church, have been given in at any time. That, at least, is the law laid down by all parties in the General Assembly. But, secondly, when it is said that the tendering of special objections only after the edict, was the law of the land, it is forgotten that it was the law of the land, only because it was the law or usage of the Church. If the Church was entitled to receive and dispose of special objections, there was surely no unreasonable stretch of power in fixing the time when those special objections could be most conveniently received, and most satisfactorily investigated. And, again, to try this by another test, although it be now fixed that the patron has a civil interest in his right of presentation, to the effect of preventing the church courts from communicating, through the medium of dissents without cause assigned, any part of his right to the majority of the parishioners, can it be held, on any intelligible principle, that either he or his presentee has a jus quæritum, a civil interest, in holding the Church bound to investigate special objections only after, and not before serving the edict? And if the case of Auchterarder had been put, not on the rejection of the presentee in virtue of the dissents of the majority, but on the circumstance of the Presbytery receiving and considering special objections before, instead of after, the final serving of the edict, can any one—churchman or lawyer—seriously believe that either this Court or the House of Lords would have sanctioned the action? I think this question is sufficiently answered—not only by the general considerations above alluded to, but by the record, the argument, and the opinions delivered in the case itself.

With regard to the contents of the special objections, I can say nothing. Whether they were good or bad, I have no means of knowing. It rather appears to me that they cannot be much worse than the reasons assigned by the majority of the Presbytery for refusing to receive and consider them. But their soundness or sufficiency is not, and cannot be before us. The ground of the petitioners' complaint to the Commission was, not that the Presbytery rejected, causa cognita, objections which they ought to have sustained; but that they had refused to receive them, and to consider whether they were sufficient or not. Such being the nature of the complaint, these parties were not called upon,—indeed, I do not think it would have been in form for them to bring forward their special objections in this procedure.

I may here notice, however, another, and I think a very extraordinary exception, taken to the competency of tendering those special objections to the Presbytery at the particular time when they were tendered. It was said that, even by that new law of the Church, special objections are not to be received, unless there be no dissent by a majority of heads of families; and that, consequently, even by the Act of Assembly, special objections could not be received, because, in this case, there was a majority of dissents. I am not sure that I understand the argument, but that seemed to me to be its meaning. This does seem a strange perversion. True, if the Presbytery had given effect to the veto by rejecting the presentee, there would have been no occasion for investigating the special objections. But as they did not, is it not quite clear that, in fair construction and sound sense, the special objectors just stood in the same situation as if the power of dissent, without reasons assigned, had failed, from the deficiency of number, or any other cause? The object of the resolution was, that, even if there were not a sufficient amount of dissent, without reasons, the presentee should still be exposed to special objections; and the argument involves the strange proposition, that the presentee must escape from the special objections, because he had also been refused, without reason assigned, by the majority of the heads of families.

Upon these grounds, I think it perfectly clear that the tender of special objections in this case stood opposed to no law, and to no points fixed by the judgments of the civil court. Consequently, the refusal of those special objections, and the rejection of the appeals founded on that refusal, seem to me to have been a perfectly justifiable ground for the Commission entertaining the petition and complaint. In the first place, in so far as I can judge of the laws of the Church, the absolute refusal of the objections, without consideration, was illegal by that law; and, 2dly, the proceeding to the settlement, in the face of the appeal, was directly in violation of the Act of Assembly 1732. But really I do not feel myself authorised to go into the inquiry as to the law of the Church. Whether the Presbytery were, according to their own law, right or wrong in taking the course they did, will be determined by the Church Courts,—by the Synod or by the appeals,—or by the Commission, in disposing of the petition and complaint. It cannot surely be held, that, if the church courts go wrong in their own law, or their own procedure, we are entitled to set them right. On the contrary, the only ground for the judgment in the case of Strathbogie was, that they had abused their own law and procedure to defeat ours; so that it is enough for my view of the case, that the interdict or order of the Commission here, did not proceed, as in the case of Strathbogie, upon grounds hostile to points fixed by your Lordships or the House of Lords. There were grounds which were good, in so far as I am informed, according to ecclesiastical law, and which here were, at all events, no violation of the judgments of any civil court; so that, even assuming the principle on which jurisdiction was supported in that case of Strathbogie to be correct, that principle does not apply to the present, inasmuch as there is here a purely ecclesiastical sentence or order, resting on grounds which had never been determined by any civil court to involve any violation of civil right.

But I have already given my reasons for deciding this case on the broader ground. I think this order of the Commission was purely ecclesiastical. It related exclusively to the discharge of ecclesiastical functions, the preaching of the word, and the administrations of the sacrament, in the parish of Culsamond,—points in which this Court never had jurisdiction, and, in regard to which such jurisdiction appears to me to be denied to this Court, and confined to the church courts, by express Statutes, and the whole object and spirit of the Church government established by law in the country.

On the more general grounds, then, maintained by the suspenders, I think the jurisdiction cannot be sustained, and that the note, if resting on those grounds, ought to be refused, as was done by the Lord Ordinary.

As to the power or competency of the Commission as a court, there can be no objection to the course your Lordships have suggested, of reserving that point till the bill be passed “to try the question.” But as that course necessarily implies that the jurisdiction of the Court, on that ground, is questionable, I think the interdict must, even on that view, be in the meantime refused.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

“Alter the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary reclaimed against, and remit to his Lordship to pass the note of suspension, and grant the interdict as craved.”

Note of authorities referred to by the counsel in their pleadings.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 163.—The COMMISSIONERS for the HARBOUR and DOCKS of LEITH, Pursuers, v. The TRINITY HARBOUR COMPANY, Defenders.

Process.—Jury Trial—Statute—Verdict—A verdict by a jury, summoned under a Statute which required them to fix both "price and damages" payable to parties having an interest in the lands and heritages dealt with under the Act, quashed, on the ground that the jury had only fixed the price, and "declined" to estimate the damages.

By royal charter, 15th March 1603, commonly called the Golden Charter, and other charters and grants, the city of Edinburgh acquired right to the ports and harbours of Leith and Newhaven,—the latter extending from St Nicholas Chapel at Leith, westward to Wardie Brow, and including, inter alia, the whole of the sea-shore which lies to the northward of the lands of Trinity. Besides the right of collecting dues within these limits, the charter conveyed certain links which then lay along the sea-shore, but which have been gradually washed away by the sea. Any part of them said to be still remaining, is covered by the tide at high water. It having been proposed to erect a harbour at a place situated to the north of the lands of Trinity, the city of Edinburgh raised an action of declarator and interdict, in which they concluded to have it found and declared, both that their right of harbour excluded the erection of any other within the same bounds, and that the property of Mr Scot was not bounded by the sea or sea-shore, and that he had no right to use and occupy the shore adjoining his lands for any purpose whatever. Interim decree was pronounced in the declarator, finding that the claims of the pursuers were well founded as regarded the erection of a new harbour, but leaving the question as to the property of the sea-shore undecided. Shortly after the Statute 7 William IV. c. 51, was passed, incorporating the Trinity Harbour Company, and empowering them to construct a harbour at Trinity, but expressly providing by the 11th section,

"That nothing in this Act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend to take away or to interfere with any right or claim which the Lord Provost, Magistrates and Council of the city of Edinburgh, as representing the community of the same, or the trustees for the creditors of the said city, under a certain Act of the 3d and 4th years of the reign of his present Majesty, have or may have to the shore adjoining the lands of Trinity, or any part thereof, nor any right or claim to exact or levy shore, harbour, or other dues on goods and vessels loaded or unloaded on or at the shore or any part thereof, or within the limits of the said harbour, dock or docks, piers, and other works and premises, or any part thereof, either for or on behalf of the community of the said city, or as trustees for the clergy of the said city, or for any other persons whatsoever: Provided always that the commencement and execution of the works of the said harbour, dock or docks, piers and premises, or any part thereof, shall not be in any manner interdicted or prohibited by reason of any action or suit for the purpose of ascertaining the liability of the owners of vessels or goods frequenting or carried into the said harbour, dock or docks, piers or other works, or of any person or persons, corporation or company whatsoever, for such dues as aforesaid, or for ascertaining the right of property on the said sea-shore, or by any judgment or decree in such action or suit: Provided also, that nothing herein contained shall extend, or be construed to extend to take away, alter, abridge or lessen, change, or infringe on any jurisdiction which the said Lord Provost, Magistrates and Council, of the said city have or may have as Admirals of Leith or otherwise on the sea or shore of the Frith of Forth, or any part thereof, unless in so far as the same is hereby altered or abridged."

By the 44th section power was given to the directors of the company to treat with owners and occupiers, or reputed owners and occupiers of lands and other rights, conformable to a schedule appended to the Act; and it was provided by section 46, that in case of refusal or inability by the parties to treat, it should be lawful for the directors

"to apply by petition to the Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute of the county of Edinburgh, setting forth this Act, and that the parties interested have refused or neglected to treat or contract, or are prevented from treating or contracting for the sale of such lands, grounds and heritages, or have not produced or evinced a clear title to the premises they are in possession of, or to the interest they claim, and therefore praying him to fix and ascertain the just amount and value of such lands, grounds, and heritages respectively; and it shall and may be lawful for the said Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute, and he is hereby empowered and required, upon receiving such petition, to order notice thereof to be given by advertisement in some one of the particular newspapers usually circulated in the city of Edinburgh, and also notice to be given to the owners and occupiers of the several lands, grounds and heritages, or their known agent or factor as aforesaid, if they reside within the county of Edinburgh, personally, or by a written notice left at their dwelling-houses; or if they reside without the said county, such persons being cited by letters of supplement from the Court of Session in the usual form, and upon leaving, together with the said notice, a copy of the said letters of supplement and a full copy of the said petition, with an order to give in their answers or objections, if they any have, within ten days after such notice; after which time is elapsed it shall and may be lawful for the said Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute, and he is hereby empowered and required to issue his precept or precepts for summoning and empannelling a competent number of substantial and disinterested persons, in number not less than twenty nor more than thirty, which persons so to be summoned and returned are hereby required to come and appear before the said Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute at such time and place, or times and places, as in the said precept or precepts shall be directed and appointed, of which time and place, or times and places for assembling the jury, the said parties interested shall have notice given them by advertisement in the said newspaper, at least six days previous to the said meeting; and out of such persons so to be summoned and returned, the Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute shall appoint, by ballot, a jury of twelve persons, before whom the said directors and the parties interested may bring a proof by habile witnesses for estimating and ascertaining the just and real value and price to be paid by the said company for the said lands, grounds and heritages, including such damage as may be suffered by the proprietors of the ground or their tenants, or in any manner of way; and the said Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute is hereby authorised to summon before him such person or persons as shall by either party be thought necessary to be examined as witnesses before the said jury touching or concerning the premises, and shall and may administer oaths to such person or persons as shall be examined as witnesses on the matters aforesaid; and the said Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute, before proceeding to take the evidence, shall administer an oath to the jury to return a true verdict, and shall examine, or allow to be examined on oath in their presence such witnesses as shall be summoned for either party, and upon the depositions of the witnesses or other competent evidence, such jury shall determine the price or damages to be paid by the said company; and after verdict is pronounced as aforesaid, the said Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute is hereby required to adjudge payment of the value and amount of the loss, price, or damage thereby awarded to the persons having a right thereto; and the said proceedings and orders of the said Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute shall be final, and not removable by bill or letters of advocacy or suspension to, or subject to reduction by, any court whatever, any law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding."

In April 1839, the clerk of the Trinity Harbour Company addressed a letter to the clerk of the Commissioners for the Harbour and Docks of Leith (these commissioners now standing in right of the city of Edinburgh), "intimating that it was the wish of the said company to treat and contract for the purchase of those parts of the sea-shore of the Frith of Forth, and rights pertaining thereto, which would be required for the purpose of constructing the harbour of Trinity, and which lie within the boundaries of the harbour, as described in the Act of Parliament incorporating the company," and offering, "on behalf of the Trinity Harbour Company, to pay the sum of £200 Sterling to the Commissioners appointed for the superintendence and management of the Harbour and Docks of Leith, or to whosoever else should be found to have right to the same, as the full value and price of the said property and others, including all damages, on the company receiving a valid and unencumbered disposition thereto." The commissioners having declined to treat, a petition was presented to the Sheriff, praying him to take the requisite steps, by choosing a jury, &c., in terms of the Act of Parliament, "for estimating and ascertaining the just and real value and price, and damages, if any, to be paid by the petitioners for those parts of the sea-shore of the Frith of Forth, and rights pertaining thereto before mentioned, and particularly described and referred to in the said Act of Parliament, schedule and notices, and for the other purposes particularly specified in the said Act of Parliament; and in general, to proceed in the said matter in terms of the foresaid Act of Parliament, and to decern in the whole premises."

The Sheriff-substitute granted warrant accordingly, and the trial took place on the 5th June 1839, when the commissioners adduced evidence to show "that the said Trinity Harbour Company, by depriving the said commissioners of their right to the said subjects and others mentioned in the said petition, and using the premises for the purposes set forth in the said Statute, would create loss and damage to a great amount to the commissioners, beyond the value or price of the premises so proposed to be appropriated; and more particularly, by injuring the existing harbour of Leith, and the means of improving and enlarging the same, and by depriving the pursuers of the loss of dock and flag dues; and by increasing the expense of collecting the dues to be leviable by the commissioners at Trinity." After this evidence had been led, the commissioners lodged a minute, in which they

"consented that the verdict of the jury, and the judgment following thereon, shall be subject to be suspended or reduced in the Court of Session or House of Lords, in the event of the jury sustaining and assessing their claim of damages for injuring the existing harbour of Leith, and the means of improving and enlarging the same, and for the loss of dock and flag dues, and for the increased expense of collecting the dues to be leviable at Trinity, and in the event of it being found in said Court of Session or House of Lords that that claim was not competent in the present action."

The following verdict was returned:

"In the petition the Trinity Harbour Company, incorporated under the Act of Parliament 7 William the Fourth, c. 51, and the directors of the said Company against the Commissioners appointed by the Act 1st and 2d Victoria, cap. 55, for the superintendence and management of the harbour and docks of Leith, and for other purposes connected therewith"—(Names of jury).—"The above jury being enclosed, they made choice of the said Charles Cowan to be their chancellor, and the said James Craig to be their clerk; and having considered the evidence adduced on the part of the petitioners, and also the evidence adduced on the part of the respondents, and writings and plans produced by both parties, admissions of parties, and whole procedure, they find, 1st, That £60 is the value for the nine acres of ground as marked in the plan, No. 6-8 and 7-7.—2d, It having been left to the jury to consider the propriety of awarding damages in terms of the minute for the respondents, they respectfully decline doing so, reserving to the respondents all rights which they may possess, and claim for compensation for any injury which may accrue to the harbour and port of Leith from the erection of the works at Trinity: In witness whereof this verdict, written on this and the preceding page, by the said James Craig, our clerk, is subscribed by the said Charles Cowan, our chancellor, and by the said clerk, at Edinburgh, the 5th day of June 1839."

(Signed) "JAMES CRAIG, Clk., CHAS. COWAN, Cr."

The Sheriff pronounced the following interlocutor:

"The Sheriff-substitute having considered the foregoing verdict of the jury, and whole procedure, approves of the verdict, and finds and decerns in terms thereof; and farther, in respect that the verdict of the jury has been given for a less sum than had been previously offered by the pursuers for the ground in question, finds the defenders, the Leith Dock Commissioners, liable in one-half of the expenses of process, in terms of the Statute; allows an account to be given in for taxation, and decerns."

(Signed) "JA. MACDONALD."

The commissioners brought a reduction of the verdict on the following grounds:—(1st, formal).

"Secundo, The said pretended verdict or deliverance, and interlocutor following thereon, were ultra vires of the said jury and Sheriff, and were altogether unwarrantable, and null and void, in respect that, at common law, the said jury had no power to pronounce a verdict, and the Sheriff had no power to pronounce a judgment, in the said action or proceeding; that the only powers which either the said jury or the said Sheriff had in the said action or proceeding were those conferred upon them by the said Statute 7 Will. IV. c. 51; that by that Statute the jury were empowered only to pronounce a verdict for the amount of the just and real value and price to be paid by the said company for the lands, grounds, and heritages, including such damage as may be suffered by the proprietors of the ground or their tenants, or in any manner of way, and were not authorised to pronounce any verdict for such price or value, exclusive of such damages; and the said Sheriff was empowered to pronounce judgment only for the loss, price or damage, which might be estimated by a verdict pronounced in conformity with the Statute: That the foresaid pretended verdict or deliverance, however, was not pronounced in conformity with the said Statute, inasmuch as, in the first place, the jury, while they thereby estimated the value of the nine acres of ground therein mentioned at the sum of £60, failed to estimate the value of the rights pertaining thereto, although these rights, which are of great value, were expressly set forth in the foresaid notice and petition of the defenders as part of what they were to acquire, and of which the price or value ought also to have been ascertained by the verdict of the said jury; and in the second place, the said jury not only failed to ascertain the amount of such damage as may be suffered by the foresaid commissioners, or their tenants, or in any manner of way; but they expressly declined to perform this part of their duty, although they did not find that no damages were due to them, but, on the contrary, expressly reserved to the said commissioners all rights which they possessed, and their claim for compensation for any injury which might accrue to the harbour and port of Leith, from the erection of the works at Trinity: That the said pretended verdict or deliverance of the jury having thus been at variance with what was prescribed and required by the Statute, the same, and the interlocutor of the Sheriff following thereon, are altogether unwarrantable, inept, and null and void. Tertio, The said pretended verdict or deliverance and interlocutor following thereupon, are likewise null and void, in respect that the same are at variance with the grounds and warrants whereupon the same bear to have proceeded; and, in particular, that although the petition of the said Trinity Harbour Company, as well as the interlocutors of the Sheriff remitting the same to the jury, expressly directed them to include the damages, yet the said jury disregarded the terms of the said petition and interlocutors, and of the foresaid Act on which they were founded, and did not return a verdict in conformity thereto."

The commissioners, on these grounds, concluded not merely for reduction of the verdict, but also to have it found and declared "that the powers conferred on the said Trinity Harbour Company, defenders, by the 46th section of their said Statute, have, in terms of the 107th section of that Act, ceased, determined, and become utterly extinct, and that the said defenders have now no right or title to acquire, by compulsory sale, any part of the foresaid shore ground."

The pursuers pleaded—1. The verdict under challenge not having been duly authenticated, it, and the judgment of the Sheriff thereon, are null and void. 2. The said verdict and judgment are null and void, in respect that, while the jury and the Sheriff had no power or jurisdiction to pronounce the same, excepting under the Statute 7 William IV. c. 51, the same were not pronounced or returned in conformity with what is prescribed and required by that Statute, and it was ultra vires of the jury and Sheriff to return or pronounce such a verdict and a judgment as those under challenge. 3. The verdict and judgment are likewise null and void, in respect that the same are at variance with the petition of the company, and remit by the Sheriff, being the grounds and warrants upon which the same bear to have proceeded. 4. The powers conferred on the company by the 46th section of the Statute having expired, in terms of the 107th section thereof, the company have now no right or title to acquire, by compulsory sale, the subjects in dispute. 5. The subjects in dispute being the property of the pursuers, as commissioners for the harbour and docks of Leith, they ought to be protected in the peaceable possession thereof, in terms of law.

The defenders pleaded—1. The whole proceedings under the trial were correct and legal, and in terms of the Statute, and they are final, and not subject to review in this or any other process. 2. The verdict of the jury, in so far as it referred to the special claim of damage advanced by the pursuers, was rendered necessary by the minute of the pursuers, and no objection can arise to the verdict upon that ground. 3. Even if the verdict of the jury were objectionable, that could not vitiate the prior proceedings held under the Statute, and entitle the pursuers to the interdict which they crave, or to a decree of declarator that the powers of the defenders under the Statute have ceased. 4. No protest or objection was taken to the verdict at the time, and therefore it cannot now be challenged. 5. The pursuers have not yet established their right to the shore in question, and unless they do so, they have no interest in bringing the present action. 6. If the shore belongs to Mr Scot of Trinity, the pursuers are ultroneously interfering with the operations of the defenders, and their right to the shore ought to be established in the first instance. Lastly, The directors are not personally liable for any act done by them in behalf of the company, and cannot be found liable in expenses.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"2d December 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the record, repels the defences, and declares, reduces, and decerns, in terms of the libel: Finds the defenders liable in expenses, allows an account thereof to be given in, and, when lodged, remits the same to the auditor to tax and report.

"Note.—There are many reasons why parties engaged in contests like this should have the whole subject of dispute, in so far as it depends upon a jury, settled by a single verdict. It is sufficient to mention, that value and damages are frequently incapable of being strictly separated; and that every fair party has an interest in not being harassed by separate trials.

"But whatever the reasons may be, the fact is, that this Statute plainly directs that the juries shall dispose of both the damages and the value at once,—the 46th section ordains them to settle the value of the ground, 'including such damage as may be suffered by the proprietors of the ground, or their tenants, or in any manner of way.'

"The petition by the defenders for a jury, and the interlocutor of the Sheriff for summoning one, proceed either on the express statement that they were to exhaust the whole matter in dispute, or on a general reference to their duty, as prescribed in the Statute; and if the Sheriff and the parties had decided on the principle of settling the matter piecemeal, by a successive series of trials, they would have been unwarranted by the Statute. The effect of a clear agreement, in barring the parties from objecting, need not be considered, because no such agreement was made. On the contrary, the minute lodged at the trial implied that the damage was before the jury; for it consented that the verdict should be liable to suspension or reduction, if damages 'to the existing harbour of Leith' should be found due; and it is admitted that evidence on this subject was laid before the jury (condescendence and answers, article 12). Accordingly, the jury were aware that this matter was submitted to them, for their verdict states, that 'it had been left to them to consider the propriety of awarding damages,' and that 'they respectfully decline doing so.' There was no authority whatever for this fancy, which seems to have proceeded from a mistake of the meaning and object of the pursuers' minute.

"In this situation, the Lord Ordinary conceives that the case has been mistried. It has not been tried as prescribed by the Statute. In principle, the verdict is just as much out of the Act of Parliament, as if the jury had only given value for four out of the eight acres, and left the rest to be valued by another verdict. The Sheriff should not have taken the verdict; or if, after it was signed and given in, he could not avoid receiving it, he should not have acted upon it."

The defenders reclaimed. At advising,

Lord President.—After hearing the subject fully discussed, and looking at the way and manner in which the Statute prescribes the duty to be performed by the Sheriff as to the summoning of the jury, and carrying out the other purposes of the Act, I am of opinion that the verdict cannot be sustained. It is impossible to read the Statute without perceiving that there was no authority in the Sheriff or jury to do any thing but what was expressly prescribed, viz., not merely to fix the value of the ground, but also to assess the damages. Now, on the face of the proceedings, it is obvious that the jury have not done what the Act required. Had they said that £60 was the value of the land, including damages, there would have been an end to the matter. But what is the fact? The Commissioners, in the course of the trial, lodged a minute, consenting to a suspension of the verdict by the Court of Session, in the event of the jury assessing damages, and the jury unfortunately interpret this to mean that it had been made optional for them to assess damages or not, as they saw fit. Accordingly, they tell distinctly in their verdict that they "decline" to assess damages. The lodging of the minute seems to me to have been a very unhappy interference with the proceedings of the jury; but its effect having been to mislead the jury, and make them expressly decline to perform part of their statutory duty, I think it is impossible that the verdict can be sustained. I am not prepared, however, to adopt all the conclusions of the summons. One is, that the trial having miscarried, and the time for carrying the Act into effect having expired, the defenders are now precluded for ever from acquiring the ground in question by a compulsory sale. The miscarriage of the trial was owing in a great measure to the minute lodged by the pursuers; and I am not prepared to adopt a conclusion which would give them all the advantages, and burden the defenders with all the disadvantages of that miscarriage. The utmost length that I can go, is to find that the verdict has proved abortive, and that the parties must begin de novo.

Lord Gillies.—I am clear that the verdict must be quashed. The Statute expressly provides that both the price and damages must be estimated; whereas the jury, instead of doing so, expressly exclude the damages. Had they said nothing on the subject, it might possibly have been inferred that the damages were included in the price; at least, they might have said that they meant the damages to be so included, and then there would have been no room for any question. They have done the reverse of all this; and their proceedings being in consequence contrary to the Statute, must be quashed. I agree, however, with your Lordship, that it is impossible to go farther, and find that the defenders have forfeited all their privileges under the Act.

Lord Mackenzie.—If it were apparent, or could be clearly proved, that there was no possibility of any damage, I am not prepared to say that the jury were bound to insert an express finding to the effect that no damages were due. Here, however, they have inserted an express declination of part of their statutory duty, and I therefore think it impossible that the verdict can stand.

Lord Fullerton concurred.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Recal the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary: Find that the verdict returned by the jury in this case was not in terms of the Statute; and therefore, reduce, decern and declare, in terms of the reductive and first declaratory conclusions of the libel; and, quoad ultra, sustain the defences; absolve the defenders, and decern, and find no expenses due."

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 164.—RODERICK MACKENZIE, Pursuer, v. THE MAGISTRATES OF FORTROSE, Defenders.

Process—Jury Trial—Property, Right of Common—Possession—Competing Title—New Trial, motion for, on the ground of Surprise—The pursuer took an issue, whether, as proprietor of certain lands, he possessed as common proprietor along with the defenders, a portion of land called the Ness of Chanonry? Ruled at the trial, that the pursuer was bound to establish that he had possessed the lands in dispute in the character of proprietor of his lands, and not merely as a burgess or inhabitant of the community. A verdict for the defenders having been returned, the pursuer moved for a new trial, when the Court held that the fact of possession was properly left to the jury; that no complaint having been made at the trial against the admission of evidence or the charge of the Judge; and surprise not being made out, and being excluded by the course taken—Rule for a new trial discharged.

Roderick Mackenzie of Flowerburn raised an action of declarator against the Provost, Magistrates, and Town-council of Fortrose, setting forth that he was proprietor of certain lands described in his summons, and that, in virtue of his titles to those lands, several parcels of land, in particular the Ness of Chanonry, possessed by the Magistrates and Town-council of Fortrose, and their feuars, belonged exclusively to him in absolute property; or otherwise, that the pursuer “and his predecessors and authors, have had a common and pro indiviso right of property in, and pasturage over, the said land called the Ness of Chanonry, along with the feuars and burgesses of Fortrose and others, and have been, in common with them, in the peaceable possession of the said common property and pasturage beyond the years of prescription, and past the memory of man; and they have been in the custom of preventing the adjacent heritors and neighbours from encroaching thereon, and of hindering the said feuars and burgesses of Fortrose, and others, from occupying or possessing any part thereof as their exclusive property.”

The defenders denied that the pursuer had any right of property in common in the Ness of Chanonry, or that he or his predecessors ever possessed the same as proprietors in common along with the defenders and others, or that they have ever been in the custom of preventing others from occupying or possessing any part of these lands as their exclusive property; and they maintained that, by ancient royal grants, the property now claimed belonged exclusively to the burgh, and was, for time immemorial, possessed without interruption or challenge as part of the property of the burgh.

The following issue was sent to trial:

“Whether for forty years and upwards, or for time immemorial immediately preceding the year 1816, the pursuer, or his predecessors and authors, proprietors of the said lands (the pursuer's lands, described in the schedule annexed to the issues), or part thereof, by themselves, or others, possessed as common property, along with the defenders and their predecessors, or their feuars, a certain triangular portion of land, called the Ness of Fortrose, extending to about 120 acres, bounded towards the south and north by the Moray Firth, and toward the west by a line running along the marches of old cultivated land, of the following names, viz.—Cummer's Croft, the Nine Riggs, the Middle Riggs, the West-water Furrows, the Easter-water Furrows, lands belonging to Junors, the Longhands, and the Head Riggs of the Long-Ness?”

SCOTTISH JURIST.

The jury found for the defenders. A new trial was moved for on the ground of (1.) surprise; (2.) that the verdict was against evidence, and (3.) against law or substantial justice.

The nature of the case is sufficiently disclosed in the speech of the Lord Justice-Clerk.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—This rule for a new trial requires, I admit, deliberate attention; and the great care bestowed on the case at the trial, renders it fitting that we should bestow equal attention to the case. I am not at all prepared to concur in the views pressed upon us by the defenders, as to the grounds on which alone it would be competent or proper for the Court to grant a new trial, as against evidence, if dissatisfied with this verdict. The issue sent to the jury respects an heritable right, viz., the possession as common property, under heritable titles, of a piece of ground of some extent, and in regard to which valuable interests may arise. It is not a case in any degree analogous to simple actions of assault, or other pure or simple matters of fact in which it has been often and justly said in England, that as you have generally all the witnesses cognisant of the facts, the first trial commonly brings out the truth with less prejudice and colouring than any subsequent inquiry. The issue involves an inquiry as to possession of common property for forty years before 1816,—of possession as common property, which undoubtedly implies important considerations in regard to the character and quality of the possession. Again, the issue has reference necessarily and most directly to the titles in the pursuer, in respect of which the common property was claimed; and on this part of the case there is not the least doubt that there are also very material considerations which much enter into the trial of the issue. In such a case, then, I do not think that the Court are compelled to deal with the verdict with the same tenderness with which they must look to verdicts in the ordinary class of cases coming before them. If, on the whole, I had been satisfied that due attention had not been paid by the jury to the case, or to any important consideration applicable to any point in the case,—that there was any reason to suppose that they had not given due weight to the legal presumptions and views stated to them by the Judge, and bearing upon the case; or if, on the whole, it would have been more satisfactory to my mind, that a question of this description should be farther and again investigated and submitted to another jury—nay, even if, as to a question of heritable right, it were seen that more evidence might, with due time for preparation, accidentally not enjoyed, have been obtained, I would have had no difficulty in proposing to make the rule absolute. Again, if in a case of this description, my learned brother who tried it had been dissatisfied with the result, and on the whole wished the matter to be retried, that would with me have been a conclusive reason for a new trial in such a case as the present, even if my own opinion had been decidedly different. I have thought it right to make these introductory remarks, because it really would be very injurious to the system of jury trial, extended with us so much more widely than in England, and of which the process of review is a very necessary and important provision, if it were imagined that the strong expressions used in refusing new trials in the ordinary cases of simple fact were applicable to such cases as the present, or that we did not recognise a distinction which has been acted upon in England even to the extent of allowing a third trial before a permanent loss was to be permitted in perpetuo to an heritable right. But, on the other hand, it is to be kept in view that the question to be ultimately disposed of under this issue is, after all, brought to a proper question of fact, and when rightly prepared for the consideration of a jury, a question of fact of that character which they are peculiarly qualified to judge of.

There may be a good deal of law to explain to a jury in order to prevent error and misconception, or to obviate views pressed by the parties; and there may be important directions to give them as to the nature, bearing, and effect of certain legal rules founded upon the titles—not so much legal presumptions, as Mr Anderson termed them, as rules or directions respecting the burden of proof. But when all this is rightly and fully done—when the case is so prepared for the jury, the ultimate question is distinctly an issue upon fact, and an issue upon facts of that very description, which the understanding and minds of jurymen are best qualified to dispose of, viz., the possession of a piece of common in the vicinity of a small burgh. Observe what the ultimate and proper question is—(Read issue). This must be well and anxiously prepared for the consideration of the jury on the part of the Judge, more or less fully, according to the nature of the particular case. But still it is a proper question of possession—and of possession proposed to be proved in this case by plain simple overt acts—not by legal presumptions. Now, in considering whether the jury rightly considered this case, the first point is, were they fully enabled to do so by receiving all the aid which it was necessary for them to obtain, and which the parties had a right to expect from the Judge? On that point the pursuer makes no complaint. He does not complain of any thing the Judge stated or omitted. Nay, farther, he does not say, which might not have been a very clear ground of exception, and yet might have been a very fatal miscarriage in the case, and a good ground for a new trial—that the Judge treated it too much as a matter of fact; and though he satisfied the letter of the law by an oral explanation which a lawyer might understand, that he did not sufficiently instruct the jury as to the nature of the points to which they were to attend. No word of complaint is stated, even in the shape of remark, on the charge; and to us who have seen the very full notes, prepared by his Lordship after the adjournment of the trial, of the directions and explanations, in point of law, which he was to state, and did state to the jury, for the purpose of enabling them rightly to consider the facts, it is most apparent that no jury were ever sent to the discharge of that duty more fully, anxiously, distinctly and usefully instructed. The jury then were fully enabled and prepared by the Judge for the discharge of their duty; but with that preparation, his Lordship farther distinctly left the question to be answered to the jury, as ultimately and necessarily a proper question of fact, whatever explanations it was necessary to give them. Now, that course is not complained of, although there is no better ground of exception than that the Judge leaves a question to the jury which has turned out, on the trial, to be one of law, at least in part, and requiring the question left under the issue to be at least restricted and varied, if there is any question of fact left at all. I must hold, therefore, in the absence of any objection, and most certainly must hold, upon the case as I view it, that the question was ultimately left to the jury as a proper jury question, after being rightly and fully prepared for their consideration. This is no unimportant part in the present motion.

Accordingly, the greater and more forcible part of Mr Anderson's speech was more appropriate to enforce upon the Judge at the trial, and on the jury, their respective duties; for all the general part of it was of no use whatever upon the question, whether the opinion of the jury on the facts is wrong, when the jury were rightly instructed. Accordingly, Mr Anderson could not state his point without running invariably into the expression, that there was not legal or admissible evidence to control his title, and the rights under it; but he really meant and urged, as we know, nothing more than that the evidence was not, in point of fact, sufficient to warrant the verdict. We have no legal question before us except that to be presently noticed, which the issue presents, and to which the pursuer, in his argument, never attended. We are wholly upon a question of evidence. I must farther observe, that the very nature of the system of jury trial implies, that when any legal rules or presumptions as to the burden of proof, or the character of the evidence which ought to be given in any particular case, are stated by a Judge to a jury, and he does not declare the evidence in law to be insufficient, it is part of the proper province of the jury to apply these presumptions; and we must be very careful that we do not encroach upon that most valuable part of jury trial which brings the common sense of mankind to bear upon the practical decision of the actual case in hand, and materially benefits the system and genius of the law, by bringing their good sense into the actual application of legal presumptions to individual cases. No doubt the jury may err in that as in any other part of their duty. But if the legal presumption or rule is rightly and fully stated to them, while the case is still left to them as one of fact, it is their province to apply these presumptions and rules; and of the application of them, in most instances, they are in fact the best judges, as they are in law the judges in the first instance. Throughout the whole argument, the pursuer did not attend, nor did the defenders sufficiently in the argument, or at the trial, to the character of the question raised by the issue, and to the requisites with which the pursuer must comply. The defenders seem to have put in their own titles, and thereby given a pretence to the pursuer of introducing at least observations quite out of the case. The defenders had no concern with their own titles. The alternative conclusion of the summons admits the defenders to be proprietors of the ground in question, if a common property shall not be established in the pursuer. But the issue puts this more precisely and distinctly. The right of the defenders to the ground in question is admitted upon the face of the issue. The pursuer found he could not get judgment against them, because they had no right and title to resist decree, or in case they could exhibit no title to the ground in question. Hence his position under the issue is this—that the defenders standing prima facie the absolute proprietors of the ground in question, he is driven, and undertakes to prove, that notwithstanding their right and title, he has actually possessed the ground in common with them as proprietor of certain lands, so as to qualify the right and possession otherwise absolute in them. Now, this is a very important view of the issue, to which attention has not been fully paid. The pursuer did not obtain an issue of this description, which I have sometimes seen: It being admitted, or found, that the Ness is possessed in common by such and such defenders, whether the pursuer has also possessed in common with them as a common property proprietor? He could not contend upon the titles that the Magistrates stood only in the situation of parties possessing in common with somebody or other: it being matter of inquiry who the common proprietors were, that would have been a most important point for him to have established. Whether he could have made it out, I cannot tell, for I have no information upon the subject. I have little doubt, that if the titles of the burgh had shown that their right was one of commonalty alone—I mean, of commonalty with other adjacent proprietors—not, of course, commonalty for the burgh,—the pursuer would have insisted, and he would have been well entitled to a judgment in the first instance, finding the third plea in law in the defences not maintainable, viz., that the lands formed part of the property of the burgh, but were only held by them as common proprietors. The issue, then, would have been very different, the pursuer's position quite different, and the burden on him very inferior to what the issue puts on him. That course has been frequently adopted in the discussion of such cases in the Outer-House, and in the division of commonities; and it materially affects the point to be decided—often terminates the discussion. But as the issue stands, that which the pursuer is to do is this, namely, to take from the admitted proprietor, by force of proof of his possession, that which otherwise belongs absolutely to the defenders,—however, they, and those for whom they hold, may enjoy it among themselves. Accordingly, even in the trial, the pursuer did not attempt to use or produce any of the defenders' titles in order to say,—here I begin by showing that your right in common with somebody or other, and my possession, is to be judged of in reference to that fact. I do not think this would have been competent under the issue, which admitted the defenders' right to be absolute, if the pursuer did not prove common possession; and I allude to it, in order to show more clearly that the point at issue was this, viz., that the pursuer was, by proof of possession, to take out from the defenders, to the extent of giving him common property, a part of the heritable estate ex facie belonging to them exclusively. This view of the matter is extremely material in reference to the argument of the pursuer, and still more in considering the character of the case; for I think it rides over the whole case in its progress to the close of the trial.

The pursuer, then, does not begin in the favourable way in which the case was pressed on us in the reply. The leading feature in the whole case—not a presumption to be applied by a jury in his favour on the title, but a point fixed against the pursuer;—the leading feature, I say, in the case is this, that the ground is taken and deemed by the issue to be the exclusive property of the defenders, unless he can establish by satisfactory evidence that he has had possession, as a common proprietor, upon a competing title. He is to take then, by proof, out of the defenders, a part of the estate, admitted otherwise to be in them, and as to which his title alone avails him nothing; for he has been obliged to undertake the burden of proof. The true point then is, has the pursuer been enabled to do this by such strong evidence that it would be at least satisfactory to have the judgment of another jury upon the case? This view of the subject obviates, to a great degree, the whole strength and force of the observations and argument in the reply; the greater part of which I do not think, as I shall afterwards explain, at all applicable to the case under this issue. Another very important point is that raised and ruled at the trial without objection, and surely most justly ruled, viz., that the issue imports that the possession to be proved must be shown to be in the character of proprietor of the lands in the schedule, or of part of them. How any other notion could be taken up is very singular; because, when a party is to prove common property, that implies in him the title of a proprietor; and if he is described in the issue as proprietor of lands, it would be extraordinary if that was not inserted with a view to the right of common property claimed. But this point is of the uttermost importance (as the parties were well aware) in estimating the value of the evidence adduced of common property; for, if the possession was not shown, by proof satisfactory to the jury, to be solely as proprietor of the lands, if reasonable doubt was raised whether the possession was not upon another and different footing, if there was reason, even in the pursuer's own showing, for thinking that he or his predecessors might have possessed in another character, then the jury could not be asked to affirm that the possession was, as common proprietor under the titles, to the lands in the schedule, or part of them; for that very proposition, in point of fact, was on that view left by the pursuer in doubt. Hence, this matter of fact, viz., that the possession was in the adverse and competing character of proprietor in the lands in question, and also that it was a possession, not of pasturage, but of common property, were matters for the pursuer to establish as a part of the burden incumbent on him, so that the jury might be enabled to affirm both. If either was left in doubt, his case failed. I must further notice, that the point thus raised by the pursuer at the trial, to escape from the obligation of showing that his possession was in the character, and by virtue of his title as proprietor,—rather in contrast to the line of argument pressed upon us in the reply,—contrasts still more, and in a very singular manner, with the ground of surprise now urged as one ground for a new trial; for, if the pursuer contended at the trial, and was prepared to establish that his possession was general, and not connected with his title to other lands, it does not occur to me how he could consistently maintain that there could be any surprise in the defenders stating that very view of the case in answer to the question put on him by the sound construction of the issue. His object in trying to alter the issue by this view was very plain; first, to say, as Mr Innes began by saying, that the evidence of the Rev. Mr Wood proved the pursuer's case, since any possession on any ground was sufficient for him; and, 2d, not to be limited to small portions of land, but if he got it under this issue, as for all his lands quo cunque modo, to claim in the division of the commonity a large share. These were his objects. And the first shows, that whether his counsel knew the case before the trial, the party well knew that it would be a great matter to be allowed to prove possession alone, irrespective of any title.

Three grounds have been stated for a new trial,—1. Surprise. 2. That the verdict is against evidence. 3. Against law or substantial justice.

1. Surprise, in the proper sense of the term, is a most solid ground for granting a new trial, when it is made out, and when stated, ought always to be carefully examined; for if there was truly surprise, the other party had got the verdict in a way more or less unfair, whether intentional or not. But we must be careful not to allow want of due knowledge, or previous preparation and actual surprise to the counsel,—especially when, as I think, Mr Anderson stated, and which is too often the case as to the leader, he had no previous knowledge of the cause,—to be confounded with surprise, in the legal sense of the term. This case is a declarator, with two conclusions,—one claiming the Ness as the sole property of the pursuer, the other asserting that the pursuer, in virtue of the titles libelled, had a common and pro indiviso right of property in the Ness along with the defenders, and had, in common with the burgesses, possessed in common. The pursuer referred to the record in explanation of this plea of surprise, and I am inclined to think he may do so, if the surprise was not matter which required to be raised at the trial, which, in some cases, it might not be—here certainly it was.

The record, up to revival, contained no allegation of possession whatever as to alternative possession. Then the only averment made is,—“under the said titles the pursuer and his authors have had such possession as the situation of the subjects for the time permitted.” The answer to this is as short, but certainly all that the defenders were called on to state; see § 15 of the defenders' statement. The defenders had, in their defences, p. 5, stated expressly, that the Ness was disposed to them for the inhabitants as well as burgesses; and they had also stated, that they gave notice of the intention of feuing, in 1817, to the inhabitants as well as to the burgesses. On this record the question was at once changed, and limited to that in the issue. That a party who was prepared to prove possession, and, under a certain title, being bound to show that the possession was in that character, of proprietor, was not called upon to consider well, and examine into the nature and origin of that possession which he was to instruct, and to be prepared for that being referred to a ground or right quite inconsistent with that to which he undertook, as matter of fact, to show to the jury that it must be referred,—seems to me to be quite untenable. He must prove, as matter of fact, that the possession was in the character of common proprietor, under the titles which gave him a prima facie title as common proprietor. He must inquire into the character of his possession, and that of others possessing along with him. He must consider whether he can prove that his possession is different from others. And I cannot conceive a plainer, more obvious, and clearer answer, or an answer which the pursuer was more called upon to consider and be prepared for, than this: Your possession is under us, and as one of those for whom we, in whom you admit the right to be, if you cannot prove a competing right, hold it in trust. It was necessarily the counter view to his, if he had any possession at all, which he said he had. But then it was farther urged, that he could not be prepared for any connection between his lands and the right granted to the burghs of Rosemarkie or Ross, now Fortrose, in respect that his lands were not within the walls or precincts of the burgh,—Whether duly considered before the trial or not,—I say that, because Mr Anderson stated to us, that to him, new in the case, the answer was surprise,—it is quite plain that the pursuer ought to have been prepared for all views founded on the fact, that his own titles, as to the three parcels of land containing rights of commonities or common pasturages, expressly bear that the lands are within the burgh of Ross. Whether the effect of that in law, or on the facts of the case, had been duly considered, is not the question.

Then it was said, how could we be prepared for any distant line of boundaries of this burgh? Now really this is the assertion the pursuer is the least entitled to make of any; for in his titles—the most distant of the only three parcels to which it is necessary to attend—the hill of Rosemarkie, or Thomson's Hill, is expressly declared to be within the burgh of Fortrose,—so is the bit, called the Ness, at the other side of the common. Hence, his own titles told him that the lands to which alone he could ascribe his possession, were within the ambit of the burgh. Then again, in his entail, many other lands lying runrig with these are actually held of the burgh, and so within its proper territory. And really when that is the case, and the defenders had a grant, as he knew, of the Ness, for the burgesses and inhabitants, it was a strange inattention to the most obvious answer to the pursuer's case, or very great confidence in his own notions of his case, if he never thought of the effect of so striking a fact, or even attended to the fact itself, that his lands, at a distance from the burgh, were described as lying within the same. The fact is the more remarkable, as it occurs as to lands got from various proprietors, lying in most opposite directions;—indeed, the remark is applicable to nearly all the lands in the schedule, for which he originally claimed under the issue. When in his titles, also, some of the lands are founded by the common muir of Chanonry Ness on the one side, I think he was most specially called on, by his own titles, to consider the very point which he says he never did.

But farther, the plea of surprise is completely excluded by the course taken at the trial, and I see very well why taken at the trial. I think the question, as to the possession of all the occupiers, was raised by the pursuer himself in the second witness, (p. 15); certainly in the examination of the third, fourth, and fifth. He was, I think, fully prepared,—that is, his witnesses on the point;—nay, he tried to give the case in 1838, in the examination of Sinclair, the very turn which the defenders have since done. Then the matter is raised in a very marked manner at p. 19, (reads). Now, if there was surprise,—that is, if there was matter proposed to be introduced in evidence, not being within the record, according to the meaning and understanding of parties, and not within the scope of the issue as understood, the evidence should have been objected to on that ground; and if admitted, the objection noted as an exception. This has always been done. See Gye v. Hallam, 24th March 1832, before Lords Cringletie and Medwyn. That was not done. The evidence was admitted as a proper, fitting, relevant, and pertinent inquiry in the trial,—that is acquiesced in;—we cannot alter it; nay, we are not entitled to think the evidence should not have been admitted, even if we differed from the Judge, which most certainly I do not. I think this excludes, of itself, the whole matter of surprise. But, still more, it was admitted that this evidence was never objected to to the Judge on the ground of surprise, but of general irrelevancy. It was admitted that surprise was never stated to Lord Moncreiff. How then can we listen to surprise now, when none was alleged at the trial? No doubt facts may come to a party's knowledge after the trial, which may entitle him to state the ground of surprise, or, more correctly, perhaps deceit. But surprise, as to a line of inquiry, and an answer to the pursuer's case, not once complained of at the trial on that ground, is perfectly new to me. But I perfectly understand why surprise was not stated. The pursuer wished to have two strings to his bow, and did not choose to give up one to rest solely on the other. He had still the plea which he pressed to the last,—so much so, that it was prominently referred to in the charge, that he might prove the mere fact of possession, and was under no obligation whatever to show that such possession was had in the character of proprietor; and that, without being under the necessity of establishing that point, he was entitled to a verdict if he proved possession, no matter what was its origin, or whether any origin or character could be given to it,—nay, that on the very evidence of the defenders as to possession, by all within the boundaries, he was entitled to a verdict, as Mr Innes argued to us. Having that plea to urge, it would have been rather inconsistent to allege at the trial that it was surprise to him to find that his possession could be ascribed to any other origin,—he wishing to shake himself free of origin under his title. I have thought it right fully to consider this point; and I have no difficulty in stating, that on these and many other grounds which might be explained, I can refuse the motion on that head with most perfect satisfaction to my own mind.

But then the motion for a new trial was supported and rested on the other two grounds stated: 1. That the verdict is against evidence: 2. That it is against law or substantial justice. These grounds may be taken together, as, more or less, they involve the general consideration of the verdict, and necessarily run into each other. I have not, indeed, been able to understand on what ground the verdict is said to be against law—taken as a separate ground of challenge. When a Judge directs a jury that they are bound in point of law to find either on the whole case a verdict for one party, on the ground that there is no fact to go to them, as in Wood v. Venables before the late Lord President, or upon particular points, that they must hold one party to be in the right, and the verdict is either against the general or the special direction,—then the verdict is against law. Or if the verdict cannot be explained upon the facts, except upon the assumption that the jury had taken up a notion as to the law different from the Court,—say, for instance, in a question for the recovery of goods shipped, and it turned out, on the evidence, that in law the title was not in the pursuer, yet a verdict should be returned for him. In these and such cases the verdict is clearly against law. But then there is a distinct and plain ground stated. But when the case of the pursuer is considered, it comes simply to this,—that in considering the evidence, the jury are said not to have applied correctly, or given due weight to certain presumptions as to the burden of proof which they were undoubtedly, in the first instance, to apply. The case was wholly left to them, with the aid of these presumptions; and therefore, even if the jury may have erred to such an extent as to require a new trial, yet still the verdict in this case would not be one challengeable as against law. The other grounds, that it is against substantial justice, or against evidence, are in this case truly identical.

Now, what is the general nature of the case? The pursuer is to take out of the right and title of the defenders what otherwise belongs to them, and that by proof of possession upon a title not expressly mentioning the Ness as granted in common. The burden of proof is, in the first instance, wholly upon the pursuer. Was it ever shifted so as to call upon, or warrant the Judge to say that the verdict must pass against the defenders? That is not pretended. He has to show that the title is applicable to the alleged common, and then that his possession was on that title, in which it will be an immense point for him that there is no other right to which it can be ascribed. But upon the pursuer's case, certain facts were established which, I think, rivetted down upon him the burden of proof to the close of the case; though I admit that the full weight of these facts in favour of the defenders have appeared more in the course of this discussion than perhaps they did at the trial. 1. There is the fact that the pursuer's lands all lie within the ambit of the burgh. That was proved by his own witnesses, to whom the facts were quite familiar. The boundaries were distinctly proved. That the boundaries of the burgh include much property beyond the buildings, could be no matter of surprise, but is most important with reference to the present question, viz., possession of the common by those living within the ambit of the burgh; for there the description in his title puts him exactly within the same case as all others who possessed. 2. His titles describe the lands as lying within the burgh,—a fact of leading importance on the point, whether his use of the common was on a competing title or not, in reference to the general and prior grant to the burgh. 3. A considerable part of his lands lie between the two towns, which are confessedly one burgh, and to which also the issue admits that the Ness belongs, though it may be for the common use of the inhabitants. Hence, lands lying between the two parts of the burgh evidently are connected with it. 4. The general understanding and belief that the Ness was a common to the inhabitants within the ambit of the burgh, including the tenants in the grounds in question, was proved on the face of the pursuer's case. This is distinctly established, I think, by the pursuer's evidence, confirmed by that of the defenders, especially the Rev. Mr Wood. But when proved by the pursuer's evidence, it seems at once to exclude him from asking the jury to affirm the issue. 5. The pursuer's titles contain common pasturage as well as commonies, and one of the three parcels only parts and pertinents. Thus, then, upon the pursuer's own case, there were raised most important facts which might give to the possession a character wholly different from that of a competing proprietor holding pro indiviso with the burgh. Has the pursuer cleared this up? If he has not, he does not satisfy the issue, and the burden which it imposes upon him. He will have the benefit of the subordinate right, but cannot get the higher. That parties entitled to the use of the common moor under the defenders should naturally insert in their titles the privileges of commonies or common pasturage, was a very natural occurrence, and in no degree proves that their right is not part and parcel of the general right of the burgh, especially as I think we have no original Crown grant produced by the pursuer. That the lands, though within the ambit of the burgh, hold of the Crown, is also of no importance. There are lands in the town of Edinburgh,—in the heart of the burgh of Brechin, which hold of the Crown, and within the territory of the burgh, that is even more common. Another important fact is, that all the acts of possession referred to are quite reconcilable with the alternative view raised by the pursuer's own case, viz., a right of pasturage and use, in respect of the general right of the town. No doubt, in the common case, where two or more proprietors are maintaining that they have ground in common, the acts of possession upon equally good titles may often only be acts of pasturage. But then, in such a case, there is no alternative view to take of the matter, and the one has as good a right to give to his possession the character of a common proprietor as the other. But then the peculiarity of this case is, that the pursuer's own witnesses present a view of his possession different from that of a common proprietor, and perfectly reconcilable with his alleged acts of possession. How, then, can it be contended that the jury went wrong in this case? First, the pursuer was to prove possession as common proprietor, solely in respect of his own titles. If he leaves doubt upon that matter on the facts, then the jury were right without going farther.

Again, on the evidence, it was a point to be solved, whether the proof he led was of possession in any different character, and of any different kind from that which was common to him, with the other occupiers of land within the ambit of the burgh. That double view of the case being raised, I think the presumptions pressed upon us by Mr Anderson no longer availed the pursuer. If there was great difficulty in solving the point, that was a difficulty raised upon the face of the pursuer's own case, and that of itself the less entitles him to dispute the authority of the verdict. But who could be so good judges of the real character of the joint possession of a bit of common near this burgh as the jury, who not only heard all the witnesses, but whose habits of thought and knowledge of such matters make them infinitely better judges than the Court. It is in this double or alternative view of the pursuer's possession that we are to consider the importance of those acts proved by the Magistrates, such as the lease to MacRitchie, a tenant of Seaforth's, and whose agent was prompt, as the kind-hearted nobleman for whom he acted was ever prompt, to protect all who applied to him for redress, and who had recently before taken up the case of one of his tenants against the Magistrates. How long MacRitchie or his widow paid rent, is not very important. The fact is, that the Magistrates, without dispute, and openly, exercised the character of exclusive proprietors against Seaforth's tenant, and on the ground that they are entitled to regulate and control the pasturage as they like. There are other circumstances leading to the same conclusion, which I need not go over. Neither is the fact as to the kelp unimportant. It is not pretended that the town have an express grant of the kelp, as the pursuer has of the salmon-fishings; and their possession of the kelp was, therefore, in respect of their general right, and against the pursuer's pretension.

I thought it unnecessary to look to the minor point, viz., that possession for forty years before 1816 is really not proved; and the remarkable thing is, that the three or four old witnesses for the pursuer—I think the only old witnesses, Clark, Sinclair, McIver and Dunoon, and also Reid,—are those who seem the most clearly to establish that the Ness was a common for all within the boundaries of the burgh. I need not however go farther into the case upon the facts, for I think it was one very clearly for the jury—upon evidence peculiarly of a character for their consideration—that their view of it was a most natural and reasonable view, even if others should differ from them—that there is nothing to lead me to think that they did not address themselves to their duty with calmness and impartiality; and no trace of prejudice is shown. The place of trial was, I presume, chosen by the pursuer himself. He had long preparation for trial, for the issue had been settled in November 1840, and the deposition of Sinclair, taken in September 1838, opened up the whole case of the defenders to the pursuer,—and what is more, his own examination of that witness, at the foot of page 41, shows that he was perfectly aware of that very answer to his case which he now says was surprise. Nay, that at that time he wished to make out his own possession without reference to his title, and on the very ground which formed the answer to his issue. But not only am I not dissatisfied with the verdict, but I am bound to add, that I most thoroughly and entirely concur in the result at which the jury arrived. I would, on the proof, negative this issue. It is very plain to me that the pursuer has wandered backwards and forwards as to his own case. He seems originally to have thought in 1838, as he wished to do at the trial, that it would answer the purpose of this action to prove possession in the same manner as other occupiers of land. That may answer, for aught I know, his object in preventing farther feuing, but it was not enough under this issue or under this action. I am of opinion that we must discharge the rule.

The other Judges concurred, and the Court refused the motion and discharged the rule.

Act. A. Anderson, Innes; Wm. Mackenzie, W.S., Agent.—Alt. Whigham, E. S. Gordon; J. and J. Macandrew, S.S.C., Agents.—[G.D.F.]

11th March 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 165.—CHARLES DUFF, Appellant.

Bankrupt—Sequestration—Statute 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41—Composition—Offer, Notice of—The cautioners proposed by a bankrupt as security for a composition, which the creditors had agreed to accept at a meeting duly called for that purpose, declined to sign the bond of caution. Thereafter the bankrupt proposed an individual cautioner, of whom the creditors, at a meeting called only by advertisement, approved—Held that, in terms of the 113th section of the Statute, this second meeting ought to have been called by letter as well as by advertisement, and that the omission to do so was fatal to the composition-contract.

The estates of Charles Duff having been sequestrated on 9th October 1839, under the Statute 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41, a meeting for the election of a trustee was held on the 8th November thereafter, when the bankrupt offered a composition of 6d. in the pound, and named four individuals as his securities. The creditors present unanimously agreed to entertain the offer, and accordingly the trustee gave notice by advertisement in the Gazette, and by letters to the creditors in the manner prescribed by the 113th section of the Statute. A meeting was afterwards held on the 12th December, when the creditors present “unanimously approved of the composition offered by the bankrupt and securities, and authorised and empowered the trustee to take the necessary steps for obtaining his own and the bankrupt's discharge, on the cautioner's executing the necessary bond for the composition and the expense of sequestration.”

The cautioners named refused to subscribe the bond of caution, and the bankrupt having, in consequence, named Mr David Miller as his cautioner, the trustee inserted a notice in the Gazette intimating the refusal, and the offer of new security, and calling a meeting of the creditors on 27th January to decide on the security offered, but no notice was given to the creditors by letter. The meeting was accordingly held, and the creditors present unanimously approved of the cautioner, and “authorised and empowered the trustee, on the said David Miller granting the necessary bond for said composition, to take the necessary steps for obtaining his own and the bankrupt's discharge, provision being made for the expense of the sequestration.”

It does not appear when the bond was subscribed, but it was not lodged with the clerk of Court till the 26th June 1840.

The trustee on the sequestrated estate having given in his report to the Sheriff, stating that the composition-contract had been carried through, his accounts audited, and the balance paid, appearance was entered by Robert Robertson, a creditor who had not been present at the meetings when the composition was agreed to, and who objected that it had not been carried through in terms of the Statute,—both because no intimation had been given to the creditors, by letter, of the refusal of the first cautioners, and the subsequent offer of another; and also, because the bond of the last cautioner had not been subscribed and lodged with the trustee “forthwith.” The Sheriff pronounced an interlocutor, in which, after various findings in fact, he found,

“that if the said composition offer is to be held throughout as one and a first offer under the 113th and 114th sections of the Bankrupt Statute before cited, the same was not perfected in terms thereof; because, first, there were no letters sent to the creditors of the change in the essential matter of the caution for payment; and, second, the bond of caution was not ‘forthwith’ lodged in the hands of the trustee, and ‘thereafter’ reported to the Court: Finds, that if the said first composition offer is to be held as having become ‘ineffectual’ because of the refusal of the cautioners named therein to subscribe the bond (and to which view the Sheriff-substitute is strongly inclined), then the contract has not been perfected in terms of the 121st section of the Statute foresaid; in respect, first, that the meeting of 27th January 1840 was not preceded by the written assent of nine-tenths in number and value of all the creditors ranked on the estate; second, that there was no offer subscribed by the cautioner proposed; and, lastly, of the delay in reporting to the Court: Therefore, finds that the composition-contract has not been duly and regularly made, and carried through, in terms of the Statute.”

The bankrupt appealed, but the Court refused the note, and affirmed the Sheriff’s judgment, on the ground that notice ought to have been given to the creditors by letter.

Act. Mackenzie; William Wishart, S.S.C., Agent.—Alt. Patton; , Agent.—[H.B.]

11th March 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G. D. F.)

No. 166.—JAMES MILNE, Defender and Advocate, v. MARY COBBAN or BLACKLAWS, Pursuer and Respondent.

Aliment—Parent and Child—Filiation—Bastard—Semiplena Probatio—Proof—Evidence held insufficient to constitute a semiplena probatio in a question of filiation, and along with the oath of the mother, emitted thereafter in supplement, not sufficient to establish the alleged paternity.

The nature of this case of aliment, at the instance of the mother of a bastard child, is sufficiently explained in the following interlocutors and notes of the Sheriff, and of the Lord Ordinary in the case.

“30th June 1841.—The Sheriff-substitute having considered the closed record, so far as relates to the question of the paternity of the pursuer’s child, mentioned in the libel, together with the judicial declarations of the parties, the proof adduced on both sides, and the minutes of debate, Finds facts and circumstances proved, amounting to a semiplena probatio of the defender’s being the father of the pursuer’s child, and entitling the pursuer to give her oath in supplement thereof; allows the pursuer to give her oath accordingly, and assigns 14th July next for her appearing to depone.”

(Signed) “HUGH FULLERTON.”

“Note.—It appears from the proof, that for a considerable time prior to the occasion on which the pursuer’s child is said to have been begotten, the defender had an eye to the pursuer; that he had her in his thoughts, and felt an inclination towards her; and as he states upon his oath, that he entertained no purpose or idea of marriage, the nature of his penchant for the pursuer cannot admit of much doubt.

“Mrs Kinnear, and her son John Kinnear, prove, that on one occasion, soon after the pursuer’s husband’s death, the defender was in their house in Laurencekirk, and after having had some drink, and paying his reckoning, mounted his horse and rode away; but having met the pursuer on the street, he returned with her to their house, which the parties entered, and had some whisky together, and a good deal of jocular conversation passed between them.

“The defender, on two different occasions after the pursuer’s husband’s death, spoke to the witness, Ann Croll (Mrs Hutcheon), about the pursuer, calling her a fine ‘widow wife,’ and expressing himself in a way denoting that he admired her; and the witness, Mrs Croll (Mrs Hutcheon’s mother), repeatedly heard the defender speaking about the pursuer since her husband’s death, and on one occasion heard him say to Mrs Hutcheon ‘that he knew few young women like the pursuer.’

“The pursuer states that the child in question was begotten on her by the defender in her own house in Laurencekirk, on the evening of 1st August 1839, being the day on which the market of Saint James’ Fair of Garvock, in that neighbourhood was held. It appears in evidence that the defender, who had been in that market, left it in the afternoon, and proceeded along the road through Laurencekirk, having been preceded by his friend Mr Durie, farmer at Muirlyon, whom (according to the defender’s statement) it was his object and expectation to overtake. In this pursuit, however, he does not seem to have been very zealous. Having fallen in with one David Clark, a ditcher, the defender went in with him to George Henderson’s public-house in Laurencekirk, where they sat for some time, and drank one or two gills of whisky together. From Henderson’s, the defender proceeded westward to another public-house in Laurencekirk, kept by John Kinnear, where he put up his pony and entered the house. Margaret Walker, who was then in charge of the house, deposes that the defender, on coming in, asked her ‘if any of her folk (meaning the Kinnears) were come home from the market;’ and on her answering in the negative, the defender said ‘he would away down and see Mrs Blacklaws (the pursuer), and thereupon left the house.’ And the witness farther states ‘that she does not recollect that the defender said anything about Mr Durie of Muirlyon.’

“The defender then proceeded straight to the pursuer’s house, where he found her alone, and having fastened his pony to the paling in front of the house, went in. He states in his declaration that his purpose in calling at the pursuer’s house was to buy some snuff, and to see if his friend Mr Durie was there; but it does not appear that he either bought snuff or inquired about Mr Durie; and from what he had said just before to Margaret Walker, his real object was ‘to see Mrs Blacklaws.’

“That the defender, on this occasion, was alone with the pursuer in her own house; and that, after being either in the kitchen or the front room, he retired with the pursuer into a small back bed-room, where they remained some time in privacy together, appears to be satisfactorily established. No doubt there are some discrepancies in the proof; but the evidence of Margaret Laurence, George Croll, and George Charles, seems to the Sheriff-substitute sufficiently to instruct the material facts, and to outweigh the evidence of the defender’s witness, Charles Robertson (in itself suspicious), so far as his evidence is at variance with theirs. Now, what possible reason, except one, could the defender have had for retiring with the pursuer into this back bed-closet, where they were shut up together? The pursuer’s front room, where her customers were usually received and entertained, was empty; and if the defender only wanted drink, he could have got it in that room with much more convenience and propriety than in a back bed-closet, into which, for that purpose, he had no earthly occasion to retire. There is the strongest ground for presuming that the defender had another purpose, and that he accomplished it at that time, and in that place (viz., the back bed-closet), by having carnal connection with the pursuer, as averred by her. Previous inclination, temptation, and opportunity, all concurred—add to which the incitement occasioned by liquor; for it is proved that the defender was, to a certain degree, intoxicated.

“After leaving the pursuer’s house on that night, the defender never entered it again; and between eight and nine calendar months thereafter the pursuer was delivered of the child mentioned in the libel, the paternity of which, at an early period of her pregnancy, and uniformly and solemnly, she imputed to the defender, and to him alone.

"Considering the whole circumstances then as appearing in evidence, and taking also into view the terms of the defender's judicial declaration, the Sheriff-substitute is humbly of opinion that a semiplena probatio is established, and that the pursuer is entitled to give her oath in supplement."

"Stonehaven, 4th August 1841.—Having considered the reclaiming petition for the defender, with the answers thereto for the pursuer, refuses the desire of the said petition; adheres to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and decerns; and prorogates the term for the pursuer's appearing to give her oath in supplement till the 18th instant." (Signed) "HUGH FULLERTON."

"Stonehaven, 21st August 1841.—The Sheriff having advised this process, dismisses the appeal, affirms the interlocutors complained of, and appoints the pursuer to appear and depone on the 6th September 1841."

(Signed) "GEORGE DOUGLASS."

"Note.—This case having resolved itself into a mere question of paternity, instead of a complicated action of damages for breach of promise of marriage, the said action becomes reduced to a very narrow compass, and must be entirely decided according to a fair construction of the evidence adduced, as well as the general conduct of the parties towards each other. The Sheriff has therefore, after mature consideration, come to the conclusion that there are, upon the whole, sufficient grounds for finding a semiplena probatio established, and the petitioner entitled to give her oath in supplement. In the first place, the statements of the defender, contained in his deposition and declaration, betray obvious inconsistencies, and are at variance with the proof adduced on both sides, which circumstances go far to support the pursuer's plea; and in the second place, the total absence of any evidence of the charges against the pursuer's moral character, so profusely thrown out by the defender, tends much to render his veracity questionable, in so far as the circumstances of this case are concerned."

"6th September 1841.—On the motion of parties, prorogates the term for the pursuer's appearing to depone in supplement till the 9th instant." (Signed) "HUGH FULLERTON."

"14th September 1841.—Having considered the pursuer's oath in supplement, and advised with the Sheriff-depute: Finds that the same supports the previous semiplena probatio adduced by the pursuer, and completes the proof of the defender's being the father of the pursuer's child mentioned in the libel: Therefore repels the defences stated on the head of paternity, and decerns against the defender for £3 of modified inlying expenses, and also for alimony for the said child at the restricted rate of £7 Sterling yearly, payable quarterly, and in advance, and with interest as libelled, until the said child attain the age of ten years complete: Decerns also for the dues of extract: Finds the defender liable to the pursuer in expenses of process, so far as incurred by her in establishing the paternity of her said child: Finds the pursuer liable to the defender in the expenses incurred by him in defending himself against that part of the pursuer's action which relates to damages; and in regard to which a decree of absolvitor was pronounced in his favour on the 3d day of February last; and appoints the parties to give in accounts of these expenses respectively against the 28th instant."

(Signed) "HUGH FULLERTON."

Thereafter in the advocacy:

"18th December 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel in this advocacy, and thereafter considered the proof adduced in the Inferior Court, and whole process, finds it established by the proof, and the oath of the pursuer in supplement thereof, that there was carnal intercourse between the pursuer and defender on the evening of the 1st of August 1839, and that the pursuer was delivered of the child libelled on, upon the 13th of April 1840, being only a few days less than nine lunar months, posterior to the said connection: Therefore approves of the interlocutor of the Sheriff complained of, finding that the defender was the father of the said child: Repels the reasons of advocacy, and remits the cause simpliciter to the Sheriff: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses, as the same may be taxed by the auditor, and decerns.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary coincides almost entirely in the views of this case expressed by both of the learned Sheriffs, in the interlocutors and notes now brought under review. He conceives it to be established—1. That the previous character of the pursuer was unblemished, and more especially that the advocator has totally failed to prove (as he averred) either any looseness, or even levity of behaviour on her part, towards other men. 2. That the defender had previously expressed that sort of general attachment or penchant towards the pursuer, which was likely to seek indulgence when the parties were off their guard. 3. That on the evening when the child was probably conceived, the defender, after being considerably excited with drink, went to the pursuer's house, found her alone, even her children being absent from the house, and remained in a room containing a bed, alone with her, for a space varying from half an hour to an hour; and 4. That the oath of the pursuer (which the defender allowed to be taken before advocacy) is positive and consistent in itself, and completes the proof of the pursuer."

"The anxious pleading for the defender in this Court, was chiefly directed to various supposed inaccuracies in the deposition of Margaret Lawrence, who, from her residence as a lodger in the pursuer's house in 1839, and the charge she took of her children on the night of the fair, was necessarily a material witness for the pursuer. Her evidence is attempted to be impeached by an appeal to the testimony of Charles Robertson, the principal witness for the defender. But on a careful perusal of the testimony of both witnesses the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that Margaret Lawrence is the more credible of the two. Robertson is a person in the occasional employment of the defender; his very call at the pursuer's house on the night in question, seems to have been suggested by suspicion or curiosity; and his refusal, when precognosed, to tell the agents of this poor woman what he could say on oath, was not consistent with the feeling of a fair and impartial witness."

"At the same time, it would be going too far in this, or in any case of the kind, to hold that any of the witnesses could be exempt from a few mistakes, as to minute particulars of what passed in a house, on an evening, at the distance of many months prior to the investigation. When it is kept in view that the witnesses were not called on to swear as to the facts for nearly two years after they happened, no one tasking their own recollection as to the minute incidents after a long interval, will hastily ascribe trifling discrepancies in the testimonies of such witnesses as were necessarily adduced here, to a wilful breach of veracity."

"With a small allowance, however, for errors in the calculation of time, the proof on both sides is perfectly reconcilable, and the Lord Ordinary has been much impressed with two circumstances mentioned by the witnesses of the defender, which have appeared to him to corroborate very strongly the statement of the pursuer and her witnesses. Thomas Durie, a near neighbour and friend of the defender, who was at Garvock fair with him on the 1st of August, swears that the defender and he agreed on that afternoon to ride home together, but that the defender was detained by speaking to another man, and 'desired Durie to ride on and he would soon overtake him.' And the witness adds, he thinks it may have been between four and five o'clock when he left the market. If a quarter of an hour be allowed for the detention of the defender, he must have left the market (which is said to be about two miles from Lawrencekirke) at or about five o'clock. This being fixed, the next witness, James Watson (the defender's own servant), swears that he looked his watch when the defender came to his farm on the night of the fair, and he found 'it was about half after seven o'clock on said evening he first saw the defender arrive at his own house.' Thus, between the time that the defender left the fair, and the period that he reached home, a space of between two and three hours elapsed. After making all allowance, therefore, for the time passed by the defender in Henderson's public-house, and for the usual pace at which horses generally return to their own stable, there was left more than half an hour for him to pass with the pursuer on the night in question."

"A separate point was urged here, of some importance in

Nothing could be more contrary to equity, or more pernicious. It would just be holding out a premium to unwarrantable litigation. In this way, if there were two or three very large claims on an estate, the rest of the creditors, by laying their heads together to resist the ranking, on grounds however untenable, might contrive, out of the interest accruing in the meanwhile, substantially to increase their dividends. But, then, it is maintained that the Statute excludes all demand for interest, by providing, that in such a case as the present, the interest arising on the deposited sums belongs to the creditors at large, and not to the successful claimants. The 46th section of the Statute will not bear out the plea which is thus founded upon it. That section provides, "that no creditor shall draw any share of the different distributions, unless his grounds of debt, and oath on the verity thereof, shall have been lodged with the trustee previous to the respective times before mentioned;" but that, in the next distribution, after the grounds of debt are so produced and proved, he shall be entitled to draw, out of the first of the remaining fund, a sum equal to the former dividends on his debt, "with deduction of the interest obtained on the said dividends, which is to be retained by the trustee for the common behoof, on account of the creditor's delay." The trustee maintains, that though the pursuers produced an affidavit, no grounds of debt were produced along with it, and that the 46th section of the Statute is therefore fatal to their claim. The first answer to this plea is, that it is at variance with the judgment which has already been pronounced. If, as the plea implies, the pursuers were not entitled to be recognised as claimants till 1841, the judgment finding that the trustee was bound to have set apart a sum equal to the dividends on their claim in 1828, must be erroneous. It is now too late to impugn that judgment. Besides, there is nothing in the plea itself. The 46th section does not refer to the case where a claim, after being lodged, is disputed by the trustee, but to the case where the creditor does not come forward at all. The section properly applicable to the present case is the 45th, which provides for the lodging of a sum in bank equal to the utmost amount of the dividends on the disputed claim. Even if the 46th section did apply, it would not avail the trustee, for grounds of debt were lodged, and vouchers tendered, at the same time with the affidavit. As to the accumulation of interest, the claim for it seems equally good as that for interest simply. It is the practice to settle bank accounts once a-year, accumulating principal and interest into a balance carried forward to next year's account. Had the trustee deposited the dividends in bank, it must be presumed he would have settled the account, and accumulated the interest yearly. This was his duty; and the pursuers must be put in the same situation as if the duty had been done.

Pleaded by the defender—

The 45th and 46th sections of the Bankrupt Statute contain a general enactment, to the effect that no creditor shall draw any share of the different distributions, unless his grounds of debt (which, in the 45th section, are used as synonymous with vouchers) shall be lodged with the trustee previous to the times when the dividends are declared, but that in the next distribution, after his grounds of debt are produced, he shall draw an equalizing dividend, but expressly without interest, which is to be retained for the common behoof. The pursuers produced no vouchers with their affidavit—none with their petition—none till June 1841. The utmost, therefore, which they could demand under the Statute is, that in the next distribution subsequent to that date, they should have had an equalizing dividend, putting them on a footing with the other creditors, but without any interest. But, independent of the Statute, there seems to be no principle of law or justice on which the pursuers can claim interest. By neglecting to produce these vouchers, they never put themselves in a position to claim payment of the dividends. There was therefore no mora in paying them; and there being no mora as to the principal, it is impossible to understand on what footing interest can be demanded. There is no instance, in the practice of this country, under the Bankrupt Act, where interest, in such circumstances as the present, has been allowed; and from the case of 1 Montague and Ayrton, 670, it would seem that in England such a demand has been invariably refused. Besides finding interest due, the Lord Ordinary has also found that the trustee was bound to accumulate the bank interest yearly. The Statute has not prescribed any such duty. By the recent Statute, the bank in which unclaimed dividends are deposited, must accumulate the interest yearly, but no duty, as to the accumulation of interest, is laid upon the trustee. Unless a new rule of law is to be introduced, it is impossible that that part of the interlocutor, which allows accumulated interest, can be supported.

At advising,

Lord President.—The question here raised is of considerable importance, and the Court judged it proper to have it discussed in minutes of debate. After attentively considering these minutes, and the whole circumstances of the case, the doubts I at one time entertained as to the soundness of the interlocutor have been removed, under this qualification, that I think it cannot be sustained as to the accumulation of interest. A great deal of argument is employed by the defender in impugning his liability for the principal sum. But it is impossible to give any effect to that argument against a deliberate finding of the Court that he was bound, as soon as funds came into his hands, to set apart a sum to meet the pursuers' dividends, and to supply the loss which had been caused by the misconduct of the former trustee. It must be presumed that this judgment is good; and I am bound to say, after reconsidering it, that I see no cause to doubt its soundness. As far back as 1816, when the claim and affidavit were lodged, the trustee, though objecting to them, had laid aside funds to meet the first and second dividend. The objection to the claim led to long litigation both here and in the Court of Chancery; but ultimately it was found that the claim was good to the extent of more than £20,000, and that the pursuers were entitled to be ranked for that amount. As to the objection to the claim of interest founded on the terms of the Bankrupt Act, I cannot see that it ought to be sustained. It is said that, by the terms of the 45th section, the dividend is not payable until the vouchers are lodged, and that de facto the vouchers were not lodged till 1841. Various considerations diminish the weight of this objection. In the first place, though the 46th section speaks of vouchers, the 45th speaks of grounds of debt. Now, it appears that here there was produced, along with the affidavit, a copy of the account-current. In the second place, the 46th section appears to apply to the case of creditors neglecting to claim at all within a certain period, in which case it postpones their right as a penalty for the delay. In the third place, the true question here is, if there was any delay, in the proper meaning of the Statute, on the part of the pursuers? It is impossible to maintain that there was. On the contrary, their complaint against the trustee was presented so early as 1816. The delay was occasioned entirely by the obstinate litigation of the trustee. Besides, it is not easy to see how it can be said that the vouchers were not lodged; for it appears that, when recovered from the hands of a third party, they were handed over to the trustee, and remained with him for some time, and were again returned. This fact is sufficient to obviate this very critical objection. There may be some technical difficulty in their not having been lodged in the process of sequestration, and docketed and marked; but when they were lodged in the process in England—a process between the very same parties—it would be a hard construction to hold that the parties had failed to establish their claim by not having them lodged at the same time in the process in Scotland. The trustee never states this objection to the non-production of the vouchers. He denies the right of the pursuers to rank, but on different grounds altogether, and the delay which followed was occasioned entirely by the discussion of this objection. In these circumstances, the trustee cannot be allowed to resist the payment of interest on a debt which was all along due. I am not prepared, however, to adopt the principle of accumulated interest. That principle is not much countenanced, and we have received impressive hints on the subject from the House of Lords, to the effect that unless the claim for accumulation is of the most plain and palpable nature, we are not to be guided implicitly by what is called the usual practice of bankers. For the regularity of their proceedings, banks may have adopted this practice; but I don't find that, in the general case, so rigid a rule must necessarily be applied, and I therefore think that the interlocutor must be altered, so far as regards the accumulation of interest.

Lord Mackenzie.—The Statute is explicit in requiring vouchers or grounds of debt. It uses these terms as if they were synonymous; and I cannot therefore think it possible to draw a distinction between them. In the present instance, it appears to me that there was a failure on the part of the pursuers to produce such grounds or vouchers; and I am not able to get over the provisions of the Statute. Certain things were laid before the trustee, but they were not such as I can consider sufficient to supply the place of vouchers. On the second point I agree with your Lordship. A great difficulty has been always felt as to the allowing of accumulated interest. I have never been able to discover the principle; and were I left to speculate on the matter, I would rather be favourable, in many cases, to accumulated interest; but the tendency of the law, as it now stands, is unquestionably to discountenance it.

Lord Fullerton.—I agree with your Lordship on both points. The chief argument of the defender is truly directed against the former interlocutor; for the ground on which he maintains his non-liability for interest, would equally prove his non-liability for the principal sum. The trustee having become aware of an objection to the pursuers' claim, states his determination to strike it out, unless the securities which they had obtained were abandoned. Then a suggestion is made, that a petition and complaint should be presented against the trustee's decision, but nothing is said of the want of vouchers. On the contrary, the trustee sets apart a sum to meet the disputed claim, and a protracted litigation takes place. At last the claim is sustained by the decision in Chancery. But then the dividends which had been set apart were improperly drawn out by the original trustee; and action having been brought against the next trustee for not having replaced them, he was found personally liable; and this liability applies just as much to the interest as to the principal. We might easily suppose a case in which the only objection to a claim was, that the vouchers were not produced in proper time. Here the objection was totally different, and the parties accordingly treated it as totally different. The language of the trustee was, that he would not rank the claim unless the securities were abandoned; and this obviously implied, that if they were abandoned, there was no objection for want of vouchers. In the circumstances, I think the trustee is barred from now urging this objection. But though I have no doubt that the trustee is liable in interest, I am not prepared to say that it ought to be accumulated. Liability to that extent would require a very strong case indeed.

Lord Gillies absent.

The Court recalled the interlocutor in so far as it decerned for accumulated interest, but adhered quoad ultra.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G. D. F.)

No. 169.—MRS ISABELLA CLEPHANE or MINTO and JOHN MINTO, Pursuers, v. JOHN KIRPATRICK, Defender.

Legitim—Parent and Child—Personal Exception.—A parent executed a general settlement in favour of his son, of all his personal and heritable property, and under burden of paying an annuity to the donee's sister. The deed contained no exclusion of the legitim, in consequence of which the daughter brought an action, and was found entitled to draw her legitim—Held, in a separate action to recover the annuity, that though the right to legitim could not be affected or taken away by the settlement of the parent, the deed necessarily imported an intention on the part of the maker to exclude any such claim, but that this intention was thwarted, and the settlement itself in so far frustrated, by insisting and prevailing in the claim for legitim, and consequently, that the daughter having thereby impugned and repudiated the settlement, could not thereafter take benefit, or maintain any claim under it, for the annuity or otherwise.

John Sime, senior, who was a shipbuilder in Leith, died in 1777, survived by a widow, and a son and daughter. By his settlement he conveyed to his son, John Sime, junior, his whole real and personal property, under burden of paying his mother certain provisions, and in particular, of paying to his sister, Margaret, an annuity of £50 Sterling. The settlement contained no clause excluding the legitim of either child, or providing that the annuity to the daughter should be taken as a satisfaction of her claims on that ground.

Sime, junior, survived his father till 1796, and up to that period he and his sister lived in family together. On his death he left a trust-settlement, by which, and after payment of certain provisions, he constituted the defender his residuary legatee, who accordingly intro-mitted with, and took up the succession.

During Sime junior's life, the annuity to the sister had never been paid; and after his death in 1797, she raised an action against her brother's trustees, and the defender as residuary legatee, to enforce payment of it and the arrears, which was met by various defences of compensation, &c. After the action had been brought into Court, Miss Sime appears to have then discovered her claims under the head of legitim, and she accordingly, after setting forth that she had never homologated her father's settlement, she gave in an amendment of the libel, which had the effect of converting the conclusions for payment of the annuity into the alternative conclusion, that if she failed in enforcing her claims of legitim which she concluded for, she should be found entitled to the annuity. The Lord Ordinary; and afterwards the Court in 1800, found that she had not homologated her father's settlement, and that she was entitled to legitim; and this decision was affirmed on appeal to the House of Lords, 22d July 1811.

Miss Sime died in 1816, having executed a settlement in favour of trustees, whom she also constituted her sole executors, of all her means and estate, but there was no destination over to the heirs of the trustees. In virtue of her settlement, James Clephane, the pursuer's father, who was one of, and the survivor of Miss Sime's trustees, sisted himself in the action, but he died in 1825. Thereafter his widow, Mrs Clephane, who was a cousin-german of Miss Sime, as executrix-dative qua nearest in kin to her, but without having made up any title by confirmation, and John Gavin, as an adjudger on a bond by Mrs Clephane and her daughter the pursuer, the wife of John Minto, sisted themselves in the action, and proposed to insist therein; but this was opposed by the defender. The title, however, of Mrs Clephane and of Mr Gavin were sustained in this Court, but the case was appealed to the House of Lords, at which stage of the proceedings Mrs Clephane died, but the instance, so far as she was concerned, was taken up by Mr Minto, her executor-nominate, and he was accordingly sisted as a pursuer in the Court of Appeal, and their Lordships, on 30th May 1826, sustained the title of Mr Minto and Mr Gavin to carry on the action.

When the case returned to this Court from the House of Lords, the Lord Ordinary found the pursuers entitled to the claim of legitim insisted for in Miss Sime's action, but his Lordship pronounced no decision in reference to the alternative conclusion of the action for the annuity. His Lordship, in his note (see case as reported ante, Vol. V. p. 376), observed, that it was "unnecessary to inquire what decision the Lord Ordinary might have come to as to this claim, for he does not find any plea in law applicable to this claim. This omission might have been obviated by allowing such a plea yet to be added; but it would be incompetent under the summons, which only claims payment of this annuity alternatively, and if the pursuer should be unsuccessful in her claim as heir, executrix, or nearest of kin of her father, to the share of his effects and estate due to her in such character, her claim on this account being sustained, it is incompetent for her to claim also the annuity under this summons."

The Inner-House adhered to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary; and afterwards, on the report of an accountant, and by interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary (Jeffrey), the claims of legitim were ascertained to amount, as at 7th March 1835, to £1622. This sum was consigned in bank by the defender on 7th March 1835, under authority of the Lord Ordinary, "subject to the orders of the Lord Ordinary or the Court—the pursuers' executing and delivering a valid discharge and assignation in favour of the defender, before drawing payment of the money;" and the Lord Ordinary (7th July 1837) pronounced decree therefor in favour of Messrs Minto and Gavin, and granted warrant of payment in their favour on the bank, on their joint receipt. This decree became final and was extracted.

The present pursuers—who, on the one hand, were Mrs Minto, the daughter of Mrs Clephane, and executrix-dative qua nearest in kin of the late Miss Sime, and Mr Minto (her husband), as curator bonis upon the trust-estate of the said Miss Sime—now brought this action, subsuming, that in consequence of the alternative conclusion introduced into the summons at Miss Sime's instance, it had been found only competent to decern for the legitim in that action, and not for the annuity, and, accordingly, they now concluded against the defender for payment of £1900, as the sums of annuity due to the late Miss Sime under her father's settlement, for the period of time she survived after her father's death, being thirty-eight years and a-half,

Pleading, inter alia.—1. The obligation to pay these annuities still subsisted,—the said annuities never having been paid or satisfied in any way, and having never been discharged or abandoned. 2. The claim to the annuities was not affected by Miss Sime, and her representatives having claimed her legitim, the former having been granted without reference to or prejudice of the other.

In defence it was pleaded.—1. The present action was cut off by the negative prescription. 2. The claim of Miss Sime and her representatives for legitim, successfully maintained in the former action against the defender, and given effect to by payment, was directly at variance with, and in opposition to, her father's settlement in favour of the defender, and was and could be maintained only on the hypothesis that she reprobated and rejected that settlement. 3. Miss Sime and her representatives having rejected and repudiated her father's settlement, the pursuers, as in her right, are not now entitled to insist in the conclusions of the present action, which are founded exclusively upon the said deed of settlement.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"14th July 1840.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties on the closed record, productions, and whole process, and made avizandum, finds that the settlement of the late John Sime the elder, by which the annuity of £50, now pursued for, was provided for his daughter Margaret Sime, was a total or general settlement of his whole means and effects, in favour of his son, John Sime the younger, who was thereby expressly burdened with the payment of the said annuity: Finds, that though the said Margaret's right to legitim could not be affected or taken away by this settlement, it necessarily imported an intention on the part of the maker to exclude any such claim; and that this intention was thwarted, and the settlement itself in so far frustrated and disappointed, by the claim afterwards successfully made by the said Margaret for her legitim: Finds that, by insisting and prevailing in this claim, the said Margaret did directly impugn and repudiate, and, to a certain extent, defeat the said settlement; and could not therefore take benefit from, or maintain any claim under it, and that the claim now insisted in by the pursuers, as in her right, cannot be sustained; and therefore sustains the defences, absolves the defender, and decerns: Finds expenses due; allows an account thereof to be given in, and remits to the auditor to tax and to report.

"Note.—The decisions in the cases of Henderson in 1782, and Collier in 1833, seem of themselves sufficient to settle the principle on which the interlocutor proceeds. But the solemn and unanimous determination of the whole Court, in the very recent case of Lord Breadalbane's trustees (5th March 1840), takes away all ground of hesitation.

"There was a separate defence on the ground of the negative prescription, which the Lord Ordinary would have thought entitled to very serious consideration, if it had been necessary to go into it. But as it was evidently liable to much more question than that which was thought clearly sufficient to entitle the defender to absolvitor, it was thought better not to come to any decision with regard to it."

The pursuers reclaimed, but the Court unanimously adhered.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 170.—THE RIGHT HON. VISCOUNT MELVILLE and MESSRS WHYTOCK, Suspenders, v. WILLIAM DENNISTON, Respondent.

Property.—Water.—Servitude.—Conterminous Proprietor.—A party having right, in common with the inhabitants of a village, to lift water from a well for domestic purposes, laid a pipe for the purpose of supplying certain houses with water from the surplus which escaped from the well—Interdict against this operation granted at the instance of an owner of property bounded by a stream which was partly fed by the water escaping from the well.

A spring rises in the march between the glebe of Lasswade and a property belonging to William Denniston of Oakmount, and a stone cistern of two feet square, sunk in the glebe, receives the water of the spring. From this cistern the inhabitants of Lasswade have been accustomed to supply themselves with water by dipping in pithers. To allow the surplus water to escape, a hole has been made in the cistern about five inches from its top, and the water which runs through it, falls shortly after into a small stream, called the Spout Burn, which, a little lower down, bounds a property belonging to Lord Melville, and on which a carpet manufactory has been erected by his tenants, Messrs

Whytock and Company. At a short distance from the cistern in the glebe, Mr Denniston has sunk, on his own property, another cistern four feet long, three feet wide, and two feet deep. Its upper side is about an inch and a-half below the hole in the glebe cistern; and by means of a pipe placed at this hole, the surplus water which runs through it, and used to fall into the Spout Burn, is carried into Mr Denniston's cistern, from which a leaden pipe, three-fourths of an inch interior diameter, has been laid to convey the water to two new houses which Mr Denniston has built on other property belonging to him, and situated at a considerable distance from the spring. Into these houses three branch pipes have been laid, furnished with brass stop-cocks, to be turned by the hand. To carry off the surplus water remaining after supplying these houses, a waste pipe has been placed in Mr Denniston's cistern, to carry it, as formerly, into the Spout Burn. To prevent Mr Denniston from completing these operations, two actions were raised,—the one a declarator by McGill and others, inhabitants of the village, in which Mr Denniston was assuizied, on the ground that his operations have no tendency to diminish their supply,—(vide ante, Vol. XIII. p. 550); and the other the present suspension and interdict at the instance of Lord Melville and his tenants, Messrs Whytock.

The suspenders pleaded—1. Conterminous and successive proprietors have the use of the water of a running stream as it descends, and no one proprietor is entitled by any opus manufactum to carry off or diminish the supply without the consent of the others. 2. The proprietor of a stream which flows into a brook or rivulet, is not entitled to divert its waters, or to appropriate them to his own purposes. 3. The respondent is not entitled to extend his use of the waters of the spring in question beyond the limits which custom has fixed, without the consent of the other parties interested.

The respondent pleaded—1. The suspenders have no right, title, or interest to challenge the operations of which they complain. 2. The operation complained of being perfectly lawful, the suspenders are not entitled to challenge the same. 3. The respondent being entitled to a supply of water for all domestic purposes to the inhabitants of his properties in Lasswade, and according to immemorial usage,—and the operations complained of being formed merely to facilitate the conveyance of water to these properties for these purposes alone,—that operation is unchallengeable.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"7th July 1839.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties, and considered the closed record, continues the interdict, and decerns; finds the respondent liable in expenses; appoints an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits the same to the auditor to tax and to report.

"Note.—The effect of the respondent's operations is, that, by carrying away and appropriating what he calls the surplus water, he cuts off part of the main feeder of the Spout Burn, and thereby diminishes the quantity of water which would otherwise flow through the property of the complainers, who are inferior heritors. He does not divert the whole burn, but he diverts part of it, and he does this, not for the use of any property of his conterminous to the stream, but of a property at a distance.

"It is quite clear that, under the general rules, this is illegal. No justification of it is to be found in the cases of Ogilvie, 24th November 1791, or of Ritchie, 15th February 1822, relied on by the respondent. In both of these the person taking the water was an heritor along the stream, and he only took it for the domestic purposes of the adjoining property.

"But the respondent says that the water which he withdraws is contained in a well, which is open and common to the whole inhabitants of Lasswade—that he is one of them—that he only takes it for fair ordinary domestic purposes; and that this being the case, he is not obliged to resort to the well with pitchers, but may economise time and labour by making its water flow to him through a pipe. This is his case. It rests upon his right as one of the inhabitants,—a character in which the complainers are equally entitled to meet him, for they or their people are inhabitants also, and they are entitled to protect the privileges attached to their properties. Now,

"1st, The respondent does not merely draw from the public well. He prevents it from ever being filled. His pipe is fixed into it five inches below the top of the well, (stat. 5,) so that the water can never rise above this till his houses be served—all above this he calls surplus water. But how is it surplus? Or if one inhabitant may pierce the side of the well five inches from its top, why may not another pierce it lower, or even at the bottom, and call all the water surplus?

"2d, The doctrine of conterminous heritors taking water for domestic purposes, and taking it in any way they like, whether by pipes or vessels, has no application to this question. This is the case of a public village well—that is, of a spring collected into a built receptacle, to which the people resort with such vessels as they have, and after serving them, the spare water ought to flow in its natural course to the lower heritors. So long as the people use the well in the old way, it supplies them all impartially; and the very awkwardness or simplicity of their mode of taking the water is a security that the poor will have their share as well as the rich. Is a wealthy man entitled practically to destroy their comfort and rights, by coming with his pipes, and scientifically sucking the whole water away without moving a step? It is plain that, with so small a supply as this is admitted to be, this would just be an extinction of the well. For if one person uses it in this way, another may, and the public fountain is made a mere reservoir for the few. The respondent says he leaves the fountain full to within five inches of the top. But his legal principle entitles him or others to withdraw every drop of it. A conterminous heritor may perhaps use a stream for domestic purposes, though this may exhaust it. But the Lord Ordinary is not aware of any law which enables a distant owner who, as one of a community of villagers, has a right to make a common use of a public well, to exhaust it, as in competition with his fellows by machinery inconsistent with their enjoyment of it."

Denniston reclaimed. At advising,

Lord President.—It appears from Mr Jardine's report, that the effect of the respondent's operations is to divert from its present course a quantity of water, estimated at forty gallons a-day; and the question is, whether the respondent is entitled by means of a novum opus,—by laying pipes and forming communications through ground which is not his own property, and that without the consent of other parties having an equal interest and title by use and wont to the enjoyment of the water—to draw off a larger supply than formerly. I have always understood that, in questions of this nature, the Court are not influenced by the quantum of injury, but that if there is any violation at all, they will maintain the old state of possession. I recollect well the case of Lord Glenlee, where his Lordship complained of the attempt of a party to interfere with the river of Ayr, by collecting and detaining the water in tanks. The Court held that this was a diversion of the stream, and on that principle, without regard to the quantum of injury, granted interdict. The diversion, in the present instance, amounts only to forty gallons a-day; but if once this is allowed, it is not easy to see when it is to stop, as all the other inhabitants have an equal right to make similar constructions. The Spout Well is one of the supplies of the Spout Burn. The effect of the respondent's operations is to diminish that supply; and holding the principles of law applicable to such cases to be fixed by a series of decisions, I am clear for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Lord Mackenzie.—The present question has nothing to do with the well; for if there were no well, the objection to the respondent's operations would be the same. The question relates only to the extra water which flows through the hole in the cistern. This water Mr Denniston has endeavoured to carry off by means of a long pipe communicating with certain houses which he has built; and the question is, is he entitled to do so? I am clear that he is not. Even a neighbouring proprietor is not entitled to divert the water to a different channel; and these houses are situated on a property not connected with the houses at all. It is admitted that the effect of the respondent's novum opus is to increase the consumption of the inhabitants of those houses, and diminish the supply which falls into the burn. The extent of this diminution can scarcely be calculated. Is Lord Melville to appoint a party to watch the proceedings of the respondent's tenants, and see that not more is taken by the tenants than the estimated quantity? On the grounds stated by your Lordship, I think the interlocutor must be affirmed.

Lord Fullerton.—I am of the same opinion. The present question is between parties having an interest in the spring, and Mr Denniston, who is not a conterminous proprietor. He has nothing more than the common right of the inhabitants to take water from the well; but here he is actually endeavouring to divert the stream, by carrying part of it away to houses built on property which has no communication with the stream. I concur entirely with your Lordship.

Lord Gillies absent.

The Court adhered.

No. 171.—THOMAS MATTHEW, Advocator, v. ROBERT FAWNS, Respondent.

Diligence—Arrestment—Title and Interest to Object—Circumstances in which held, that the manager of a public company, in whose hands an arrestment had been used, which was alleged to be ex facie unwarranted and informal, was found entitled to resist the delivery of certain goods thereby attached, until the issue of a process which would determine the question as to the competency and validity of the use of the diligence.

Fawns presented a petition to the Magistrates of Dundee in these terms:

"That there arrived at the port of Dundee yesterday (the 2d day of June 1841), on board the vessel called the Forth, belonging to the Dundee, Perth and London Shipping Company, of which company Mr Thomas Matthew is the manager, and party from whom delivery of goods on board the vessel is got, thirty-seven packages of furniture and effects addressed to the petitioner, and in which packages there are a variety of goods and clothes, and other articles, the property of the pursuer's wife, and as such belonging to the pursuer.

"That the petitioner called upon the said Thomas Matthew for delivery of the packages addressed to him, and was willing to pay the freight thereof, and is still willing to pay the freight of the same, but the said Thomas Matthew declined to make delivery to the petitioner, in respect of a copy of an arrestment which he showed as having been used in his hands for behoof of the company at the instance of Adam Fisher, shoemaker, residing in Kilmarnock, against David Crom, shoemaker there, and a copy of which arrestment, given to the petitioner by the said Thomas Matthew, is herewith produced.

"That the arrestment so used is not a legal warrant of interpellation or of attachment, so as to authorise the said Thomas Matthew refusing delivery to the petitioner of the said thirty-seven packages, which were brought for him in the said vessel the Forth, as aforesaid, and the petitioner is entitled to get delivery of the said packages upon payment of the freight, which he is still willing to pay.

"That the petitioner is suffering great inconvenience, loss, and injury by the said packages being kept from him, and his wife also is suffering greatly thereby; and the petitioner is therefore obliged to present the present application.

"May it therefore please your Honours" "to find that there has been no legal attachment or interpellation to prevent delivery of the packages to the petitioner; and that the petitioner is entitled to get delivery of the same on paying the freight thereof; and to decern and ordain the said Thomas Matthew to deliver up to the petitioner the foresaid packages on receiving payment of the freight of the same; or may it please your Honours to do otherwise and farther in the whole premises as to you may seem just."

The advocator, in his answers, stated, that he "has no knowledge of the actual rights of the parties claiming the effects in question. He herewith produces a copy of the arrestment referred to in the petition, whereby he is specially interpellated from delivering the effects to the petitioner, until surety be found to make them forthcoming to Adam Fisher in Kilmarnock, as being in reality the property of David Crom, shoemaker there, a debtor of Fisher's. The respondent is perfectly ready, on payment of the freight, to deliver the goods to any party whatever having the best right thereto; but, under the circumstances now stated, he cannot do so without judicial authority. He deems it proper to call the attention of your Honours to the fact, that although there are here competing parties, neither the arrester nor Crom has been called into the field. He submits to your Honours for consideration, whether this should not still be done, or a process of multiplepounding raised. The respondent also respectfully calls the attention of your Honours to the circumstance, that the petitioner does not go into any explanation of the facts connected with the property of the goods."

And he pleaded, (1.) That he could not safely deliver, till it was determined who had the right to the goods: (2.) That in order to ascertain this right, the requisite legal procedure should be adopted, in such manner as should be determined by the Court; and, (3.) That he was entitled to the expenses of appearance in the action, as he had had no alternative but to lodge answers.

In the replies, Fawns did not claim the goods specially as his, further than was done in the petition, and argued—That the messenger had no authority for arresting, and, consequently, that the diligence was inept as against him: That Matthew, as a public carrier, was bound, on payment of the freight, to deliver the goods to him, as the party for whom they had been transmitted: That he would not enter into any question as to the property of the goods, which it was just tertii to Matthew to raise; and he stated that he took "his stand upon this, that the defender, admittedly having the packages addressed to him, he is bound to deliver them up to him, and is not entitled to keep up these packages, and call for a lawsuit to be introduced by multiplepounding or otherwise about them. The defender will be sufficiently discharged by delivering them to the pursuer, and that is all that he requires."

The Magistrates

"having advised this process, finds that the defender, or the parties he represents, are common carriers by sea, and they received the articles sued for, for behoof of the pursuer: Finds that the arrestment used against another party cannot attach the effects in question as against the pursuer; repels the defences, and decerns in terms of the prayer of the petition: Finds the defender liable in expenses; appoints that an account of the pursuer's expenses be lodged; remits the account, when lodged, to the clerks of Court to be taxed: Finds the defender also liable in the dues of extract, to be ascertained at extracting, and decerns."

In the meantime, the arrester raised a process of multiplepounding in the name of the Shipping Company; and thereupon the advocator presented a reclaiming petition to the Magistrates against the above judgment, submitting in the then circumstances, and in principle, that the action against him should be sisted till the issue of the multiplepounding; or that, at all events, the finding of expenses against him should be recalled.

The Magistrates adhered, however, to their previous judgment, when Matthew presented a note of advocacy against the deliverance, principally maintaining, (1.) That the address on the goods being in the name of the respondent, was not conclusive evidence of his right of property in them; and that he, the advocator, as the manager of a public company, was not entitled to disregard the arrestment, by which he was interpellated from making delivery: (2.) That he was not bound of himself, without judicial authority, to judge of the regularity or validity of the arrestment; and, even assuming that there was any apparent irregularity in the face of the arrestment, he was entitled to the protection of judicial authority, as a guarantee against consequences, before making delivery; and (3.) That the regular course for the Magistrates, after the raising of the multiplepounding, was either to have sisted the summary application for the result of the multiplepounding, or to have ordered the arrester and common debtor to be in the field before disposing of the application at all events, and as the application did not originate through any fault of his, there was no ground for awarding expenses against him.

Fawns pleaded—1. That the packages in question having been nominatim addressed to the respondent, to whom they belonged, delivery was due directly to him, on payment of the freight, which was tendered; and the advocator acted illegally and unwarrantably in refusing to give them up: 2. That the arrestment afforded no legal interpellation or bar to the delivery—1st, Because that arrestment was confessedly used, not against the respondent, Robert Fawns, but against "David Crom, shoemaker in Kilmarnock;" and 2d, Because no arrestment, however formal, against the latter, could legally attach goods belonging to the respondent, against whom it was wholly inept and incompetent.

The Lord Ordinary ordered minutes of debate, in which the pleas of parties, as already stated, were further elaborated. In the advocator's case, he, besides, called attention to the fact, that the respondent, in the application to the Magistrates, did not claim the thirty-seven packages as his, but merely certain articles therein contained, which, he said, belonged to his wife. He claimed these, but it was argued that he did not claim the other goods, with which his wife's goods were mixed up. The respondent, besides arguing the whole case in the pleas already indicated, maintained that the multiplepounding was incompetent.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"19th March 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having made avizandum with the revised minutes of debate, and whole process, and considered the same, Appoints the said minutes to be printed and boxed to the Lords of the Second Division of the Court, and that by the second box-day in the ensuing vacation, in order that the same may be reported to the Court.

"Note.—In this case thirty-seven packages of furniture, &c., addressed to Mr Fawns, Dundee, were arrested in the hands of the manager of the Dundee, Perth, and London Shipping Company, by a schedule left by a messenger-at-arms of all sums of money, goods, &c., in their hands and custody pertaining to David Crom; and, 'in particular, a quantity of furniture presently on board the vessel 'Forth' of Dundee, addressed to Mr Robert Fawns, Dundee.'

"The manager of the company appears bona fide to have considered these packages, addressed to Mr Fawns, as thereby arrested in his hands. The Magistrates of Dundee, on an application made to them by Fawns, ordered them to be delivered, and found the manager of the Shipping Company liable in expenses. After the case had been before the Magistrates, a multiplepounding was raised by the arrester, in name of the Shipping Company, before the Sheriff.

"It is a question of some importance, whether the manager was bound to consider such an arrestment as altogether void and null, and, without regarding it, to deliver the goods to the person to whom they were addressed, although the schedule bore that he should hold them for Crom.

"It appears to the Lord Ordinary that the messenger was not authorised, if there was a general precept against the goods of Crom, to make out a schedule in different terms. At the same time, the manager was placed in a very difficult situation, as acting for the company, if he was bound to disregard altogether the schedule he received; and if that is the law on this subject, it is very important that it should be generally known. The facts that may come out in the multiplepounding before the Sheriff-court may materially affect this question, yet the merits of that action cannot be judged of in this advocacy. If the manager had actually known that the goods belonged to Crom, and were only addressed to Fawns as a cover, he would not have been entitled to disregard the arrestment; but if it shall appear that de facto that was the case, Can he be in a worse situation by having bona fide obeyed a schedule to that effect? The advocator's situation would be very hard indeed if decrees were pronounced against him in this action for delivery to Mr Fawns, and in the multiplepounding to the arrester."

At advising,

Lord Justice-Clerk considered, that the case did not depend on the general law applicable to carriers, but on the specialties of the question; and his Lordship could not overlook the fact, that the pursuer did not, in his original application, claim the goods as his. Further, he could not at present say if the arrestment was irregular; and he did not know, besides, if that was a point which was necessary for deciding the present case. The goods were said to be the property of Crom, and they were specially described as his in the arrestment; and in these circumstances, the demand was for delivery to the pursuer, without any guarantee against Crom for re-delivery, and no notice to the arrester. Then, before the decision of the Magistrates, the multiplepounding is brought; and whether that is a competent multiplepounding or not, it was not practicable, and not necessary to decide in this case. Certainly the raising of that process was sufficient for an alteration of the Magistrates' judgment. These goods are in the hands of the Court, and till the result of the multiplepounding, the present question ought to be sisted.

Lord Medwyn concurred, and thought that the application ought to be dismissed with expenses. The manager had no right to disregard the arrestment, and that particularly in the circumstances, where the petitioner did not aver that the goods belonged to him.

Lord Meadowbank agreed. It was a very particular statement which was made in the petition; for the party only said that the packages contained some of his wife's clothes, and he did not aver that he had right to the whole.

Lord Moncreiff also concurred, and doubted as to the real intent with which the petitioner had applied to the Magistrates for possession. He ought to have stated more explicitly his connection with the goods. If the goods really belonged to the petitioner, he should have said so; and as to the wife's clothes, he could recover them in the multiplepounding.

The Court

"Recal the interlocutors complained of, and dismiss the petition, and decern: Find the respondent liable to the advocate in the whole expenses incurred by him, and appoint an account," &c.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H.B.)

No. 172.—The late EARL OF FIFE'S TRUSTEES, Pursuers, v. The MAGISTRATES OF ABERDEEN, Defendants.

Superior and Vassal—Sasine—Register—Where lands originally burgage were held in feu under magistrates, who were specially empowered to grant such feus—Held that the sasines taken in them could be validly recorded only in the General Register of Sasines or Particular Register of the county in which they were situated, and not in the Burgh Register.

By charter, dated 10th December 1319, King Robert I., "concessisse et ad feodofirmam assedasse ac presentem carta nostra confirmasse" to the burgesses and community of the burgh of Aberdeen, the forest of Stocket, with the pertinents, to be held by them and their successors "de nobis et heredibus nostris in feodo et hæreditate et in libero burgagio per omnes rectas metas," &c.

In 1551, the burgh obtained a license from Queen Mary, empowering them to feu the lands, &c., thus granted, under the limitation that they were to be feued "convivibus et liberis burgensibus dicti nostri burgi." The terms of the license are—"assedandi, arredandi, locandi ac in emphyteosim seu feodofirmam, nunc et in omnibus temporibus futuris quotus vacare contigerit, in perpetuum hæreditarie dimittendi pro annua augmentatione firmarum earund." The charter and license of Queen Mary were confirmed in general terms by James VI. in 1617, and more explicitly in 1638 by Charles I., who, without repeating the limitation of feuing to burgesses only, gave a general power "locandi et assedandi hujusmodi dict. terrarum suarum communium dictæ forestæ de Stocket quæ hactenus non assedantur et locantur ad utilitatem et commodum dicti burgi nostri per assedationes longas vel infeofamenta feodofirmæ pro solutione feodofirmarum." By charter of resignation, dated 29th January 1774, the Magistrates of Aberdeen gave, granted, and in feu-farm and heritage disposed and confirmed to Alexander Udney Duff, and Mrs Margaret Udney Duff, his spouse, and the longest liver in liferent, and the heirs or assignees of the survivor in fee, certain "parts and portions of the lands of Forresterhill," forming part of the forest of Stocket, conveyed as above. The tenendas of the charter declares, that the lands are to be held of the Provost, Bailies, Council, and community of Aberdeen, and their successors, "in feu-farm and heritage for ever." The reddendo is in the following terms:

"Giving and rendering yearly therefor the said Alexander Udney Duff, and Mrs Margaret Udney Duff, his spouse, and their foresaids, to us and our successors, and to our treasurers or collectors of the feu-mails of the said burgh for the time, the sum of thirteen pounds Scots money, as a proportional part of the sum of twenty pounds Scots money, being the feu-duty payable for the whole lands of Forresterhill, and that at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas in winter, by equal portions, or at least within twenty days immediately after each term, in name of feu-farm; and doubling the said feu-duty of thirteen pounds Scots, at the entry of every heir, as use is,—the heirs, successors, and assignees of the said Alexander Thomson being liable in the yearly payment of the sum of seven pounds Scots, as the remaining feu-duty effeiring to their part of the said lands perpetually in all time coming; as also, paying the taxations, impositions, subsidies and contributions, as the same shall happen to be taxed in the said burgh: And it is hereby declared, that the said Alexander Udney Duff, and Mrs Margaret Udney Duff, his spouse, and their foresaids, shall be subject, and subject themselves to the Courts, suits, and jurisdictions of the Magistrates of this burgh, and that they shall perform and give obedience to the officers and governors of the same, conform to the custom of the citizens and inhabitants of this burgh, and all singular successors entering to the said lands, paying to the treasurer of Aberdeen for the time, such compositions for their entries as are due and payable by law; as also, all and every singular successor and successors, whether male or female, and all heirs entering to the said lands (not being burgesses of guild in this burgh,) paying to the dean of guild of Aberdeen for the time, the usual compositions and other dues payable by entering burgesses of guild; providing always that it shall not be lawful to the said Alexander Udney Duff, and Mrs Margaret Udney Duff, his spouse, or their foresaids, to do any real injuries to their neighbours, or to labour, manure, or any other way appropriate, upon any pretext whatsoever, any part of our commonalty, without the bounds of the property above written, nor even within the foresaid bounds to burn any heather, except in arable ground fit for growing corn, grain or grass;—and that for all other burden, question, service or demand, that may be anyways asked or required by us for the lands above disposed in any manner of way."

The charter contains a precept of sasine which is directed to the then bailies of the burgh nominatim, or any of them, conjunctly and severally, or to any other bailies of the same for the time, and orders sasine to be given by delivery of earth and stone of the ground thereof, as use is in such cases. In virtue of this charter and precept, an instrument of sasine was expedite in favour of Alexander Udney Duff, and Mrs Margaret Udney Duff, as having been infest and seised in the said lands and others, under the hand of Alexander Carnegie, then town-clerk of Aberdeen. This instrument is dated 3d February 1774, and is recorded in the burgh register of sasines, but not in the general register of sasines, or the particular register of the county of Aberdeen. Part of these lands were disposed during the lifetime of Mr Duff; and after his death, Mrs Margaret Udney Duff, who survived him, disposed the remainder to Thomas Taylor, in whose favour sasine was taken, and recorded by the town-clerk in 1793, in the same manner as in the case of Mr and Mrs Duff in 1774.

In 1794, Taylor sold these lands to the late Earl of Fife, whose trustees brought the present declarator against the Magistrates of Aberdeen, in which, after narrating the nature and state of the titles, they concluded to have it found and declared, that they "have now good and undoubted right to the foresaid three lots of the said lands of Forresterhill, with the pertinents, under and by virtue of the several deeds and writs before recited, and are entitled to make up and complete a feudal title thereto in their persons, as trustees foresaid, as vassals therein: That the said three lots of the said lands of Forresterhill, with the pertinents, are held by the pursuers, not of us and our royal successors in free burgage, but of the said Provost, Magistrates, Council, and community of the said burgh of Aberdeen, as immediate lawful superiors thereof, in feu-farm, fee and heritage, for payment of the yearly feu-duty, and other duties and services specified in the before-mentioned charter of resignation: And that the instruments of sasine to be expedite on all charters of the said lands and others granted by the said superiors thereof, and upon all dispositions of the same granted by their vassals, ought to be recorded in the general register of sasines, or in the particular register of sasines for the said county of Aberdeen, and not in the register of sasines kept for the burgh of Aberdeen: That the foresaid instrument of sasine, expedite in favour of the said Alexander Udney Duff, and Mrs Margaret Udney Duff, upon the before-mentioned charter of resignation in their favour, having been only recorded in the protocol or register of sasines of the town-clerk of Aberdeen, kept for the burgh of Aberdeen, was not duly and properly recorded in terms of law, and is therefore null and void; and that the precept of sasine contained in the said charter still remains open and unexecuted: And that the pursuers, as trustees foresaid, having now right thereto by progress as aforesaid, are entitled to take infestment in the said three lots of the said lands of Forresterhill, with the pertinents, by virtue of the precept of sasine contained in the said charter and the foresaid conveyances thereof, whereby they have right to the same, without being obliged to make payment of any composition or casualty whatsoever to the said Provost, Magistrates, Council, and community of the burgh of Aberdeen, as superiors thereof, beyond the yearly feu-duty and other duties and services payable for the same: And it being so found and declared, the said present bailies of the said burgh of Aberdeen, or one or other of them, and their successors for the time being, ought and should be decreed, by decree of our said Lords, to execute the precept of sasine contained in the foresaid charter of resignation, by giving sasine to the pursuers, as trustees foresaid, in the said lands and others, in terms of the said precept, to which they have right as aforesaid, and that whenever the said Bailies shall be required by the pursuers so to do."

The pursuers pleaded—1. The charter of Charles I. gives to the Magistrates power to make grants, not merely to burgesses or inhabitants, but to any persons whatever. 2. It does not empower the Magistrates to grant rights to be holden by the grantees in burghage, or, in other words, immediately of the Crown. 3. The direction of the precept to the Magistrates will not make the tenure burghage; and, 4. Neither will the usage of having the sasine taken and recorded by the town-clerk, establish the evidence of the burghal holding.

The defenders pleaded—1. The lands in question are situated within the territory, and form an integral part of the burgh of Aberdeen, and were granted under a mixed burghal and feudal tenure, conformably to which the mode of taking and recording the infestments is valid, and the right of the burgh to the composition and casualties is preserved. 2. The mixed burghal and feudal tenure is valid and effectual, inasmuch as the qualities of the burghal tenure are not impaired by superadding payment of feu-duties or ground-annuals to burghal services or equipollent prestations, or by the consequent mode of completing the title, and à converso, the existence of those services or equipollents does not derogate from the right to stipulate for and receive feu-duties or similar payments and casualties. 3. Where charters, or other conveyances, embodying the mixed burghal and feudal tenure, are granted, the sasines can only be legally and validly taken by the clerk of the burgh, and legally and validly recorded by him in the register of the burgh. 4. While the enactments of the preceding Statutes thus govern the registration of the sasines in question, the validity of that registration is not controlled nor affected by the Statute 49 Geo. III. c. 42, because registrations of such sasines in the record of the burgh do not come under its operation, and even if they did, it could not impair the validity of the registrations at issue, as it has no retrospect. 5. The validity of the charters or other deeds, embodying the mixed burghal and feudal holding, and the right of the clerk of the burgh taking sasine thereon, and of recording the sasine in the register of sasines for the burgh, are in conformity with principle and the ordinary rules of law, and have been recognised and established by a series of decisions. 6. Even although the lands in question could be deemed to have been held in feu, the registration of the sasines would have been valid, because the lands are situated within the burghal territory, and held by the burgh in burghage of the Crown.

"21st January 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having resumed consideration of the record, together with the revised cases, title-deeds produced, and whole process: In respect that the lands set forth in the libel were granted by the defenders' predecessors, the Magistrates of Aberdeen, to the late Alexander Udney Duff and his wife, the pursuers' predecessors, by a charter to be held in feu of and under the said Magistrates, and that in virtue of a special power contained in the title of the Magistrates, empowering them to grant such feus; and in respect that the instruments of sasine expedite thereon in favour of the said Alexander Udney Duff and his wife, and in favour of Thomas Taylor, their disponent, the immediate author of the pursuers' constituent, were not recorded in the general or particular register of sasines for the county, but in the register kept for the burgh of Aberdeen for sasines upon subjects held burghage, Finds the said instruments of sasine inept and void in a question between the pursuers and defenders, and that the pursuers, as assignees to the precept of sasine contained in the last charter of resignation granted by the Magistrates, are now entitled to hold the said precept as unexecuted, and to infest themselves thereon, and to record the same in the proper register: Therefore, decerns and declares in terms of the conclusions of the libel: Finds no expenses due to either party, and decerns.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary allowed cases to be lodged in this cause, because the parties concurred in suggesting that their pleas should be stated in that form; and as the question turned on the import of titles, it seemed fair that the parties should have an opportunity of explaining them in a written argument. Now, however, that he has had an opportunity of examining the titles, he is clearly of opinion that the lands are not held in burghage, but under a proper feudal holding, according to every characteristic and test by which such a holding can be tried.

"The whole of the later authorities on questions of this sort, from that of Davie, in 1814, to that of Donald's trustees against Yeats, in 1839, are concurrent that sasines on subjects, even within the original burghal territory, when now granted by Magistrates, on rights to be held in feu, and not in burghage, must be recorded in the general or in the county register. This was found by the Second Division in the case of Davie, in 1814, expressly laid down as law in the House of Lords in the case of Dawson, in 1830, and again assumed as settled law by Lord Moncreiff and the Second Division, in the case of Donald and Yeats, in 1839. The second case of Dumbarton, decided by the First Division in 1823, is not truly an adverse decision, as the Court considered the holding then to be burghage, and on that footing alone determined that the sasine was properly recorded in the burgh register.

"There is a speciality, however, in the present case which deserves notice, as it does not seem to have formed the subject of express decision in any of the prior cases. Although the holding here is undoubtedly a proper holding in feu, it seems equally clear that the subjects libelled on formed part of the ancient burghal territory, which was held at least by the Magistrates themselves in free burghage; and it is also established that instruments of sasine, taken upon the charter libelled on by Taylor, the purchaser, from Mrs Udney Duff, were passed in 1774 and 1793, long prior to the Act of 1809, which is the latest regulating Statute as to burgh registers. In reference to cases falling under this category, it was certainly understood by many practitioners, that till the Act of 1809 was passed, sasines of all subjects within burgh fell to be recorded in the burgh register, in terms of the Act 1681, as the subjects necessarily were held burgage originally, whatever might be the subordinate holding irregularly resorted to in particular cases, and it was considered that this practice was stopped only by means of the Act of 1809, which confined the burgh register to sasines of properties holding burgage; and if so, that might save from nullity instruments of sasine of burgage tenements disposed in feu, if recorded in the burgh register anterior to 1809.

"Now, the Lord Ordinary does not perceive that this distinction has been recognised by any of our authorities, and he is inclined to think that there is not any essential distinction between the Act of 1681 and 1809. The first only authorised the registration in the burgh register of sasines of properties holding burgage, and the last Act saved and reserved the burgh register to that effect. Nevertheless, if the question be not settled by authority, it is possible that cases may occur where sasines of burgage tenements may have been given nominally for payment of annual sums, called feu-duties, and even to be held of the granter, which might not be so objectionable on the point of registration as of feudal anomaly and irregularity,—the doubt being, whether private parties can in any case, at their own hand, change a proper burgage holding into a feu, and thus derange or confuse the whole registers of sasines through the country. If such a case occurs, it will be dealt with on its proper merits when discussed.

"The present case, however, rests on a speciality which supersedes every argument on the view of the case now indicated. When the particular terms of the title under which the Magistrates hold the superiority of these feus are referred to, it appears that they were specially empowered and authorised to grant feus of the lands specified in the libel. This was tantamount to a permission to the Magistrates to change the holding; and when that is effected by a regular charter of feu, it seems out of the question to hold that the infeftments and transmissions of the feu can be properly or competently recorded in the register of burgage holdings."

The defenders reclaimed. At advising,

Lord President.—There are here two questions. The first, what is the true tenure of the property? and the second, were the sasines taken in it validly registered? As to the first, it is evident that the lands were anciently within burgh; for they are declared to be held "libero burgagio." Still it is clear from the charter of 1551 that power was given to the Magistrates to grant the lands in feu, no doubt under restriction as to the persons to whom they were to be feued, and also as to the reddendo,—making them partake very much of the nature of a mixed grant—partly feu, partly burgage. The Magistrates accordingly appear to have made grants of this nature; but in course of time their character greatly varied, till at last, as in the case of Udney Duff in 1774, the reddendo became just a common feu-duty. Now, whatever may have been the form of the grants made in ancient times, it must be admitted that that in favour of the pursuers' authors was just a grant in feu, and not in burgage. It has all the characteristics of a feu-holding, and the additional stipulations to pay taxation, &c., will not alter its nature. The grant from the Crown authorised the Magistrates to grant such feus. And when I see the great tracts of country attached to certain burghs, as that of Ayr, it would be very extraordinary if, when the exigencies of the burgh required it, they should not have been permitted to exercise the power of making such grants in feu. Here the power was expressly conferred on the Magistrates, and they have legally exercised it by making a grant, de facto, feu, and not burgage. In the case of Glasgow, the Court gave effect to the express words of the charter. They did the same in the case of Dumbarton, which has been said, but I think incorrectly, to be contrary to the case of Denny. As to the first question, then, I am clear that the holding is feu.

As to the second question, I am also clear, both from the Statutes and a series of adjudged cases, that the sasine was not validly recorded in the burgh register; and the precept in the original charter is still unexhausted. It is attempted to set up the plea of communis error, but I have great doubts if a communis error, as to any particular district, can be pleaded against the general principles of law. On this point I would rather adopt the doctrine of Lord Moncreiff in the case of Yeats, and that of Lord Corehouse in that of Perth. But there is another consideration which goes still farther to weaken this plea of communis error in the present instance. This is not a case where the right of property is involved, and where there might be a very great hardship in proceeding on technical grounds to deprive the losing party of property which he might have onerously acquired. All that the pursuers wish to have declared is, that the lands are held in feu; that the entry of the sasine in the burgh register must be held pro non scripto; and that nothing has yet been done to preclude them from calling for infeftment on the precept in the original charter. I think they are entitled to have these things declared, and that the Lord Ordinary has done right in so finding.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. The dominium utile is evidently held feu, and not burgage; and though the lands were got as part of the common property of the burgh, to be held burgage, it was with an express power to grant feus; and they have used it. The oldest grants are feu, and not of the nature of burgage. Resignation was not made in the hands of the bailies as commissioners for the Crown, but as magistrates acting for themselves. Then the reddendo is not burgal services, but a feu-rent accompanied with feudal casualties. It is true certain conditions are added which are not naturalia of feus. They are, however, not inconsistent with them, and cannot have the effect of turning the tenure into burgage. In fact, most of them are implied in the jurisdiction of the Magistrates, and their grant of sheriffship. There is a case to which the parties have not referred—the case of Burnet, where it was proposed to expunge conditions like the present, as inconsistent with the nature of a feudal grant. The Court said there could be no harm in keeping them in. Burnet objected to them as personal services. But the opinion of the Lord President (Hay Campbell), was, that they were of no use, and that the best thing which could be made of them would be to found a claim of compensation under the Jurisdiction Act. As to the validity of the registration, this appears to me the clearest of all the cases in which the question has been raised. The defenders have argued ably in favour of its validity,—maintaining, that though the grant in question was in feu, yet as the original grant was in burgage, as part of the common good, all sasines taken in it must or may be registered in the burgh register. This is a point which I might not have thought very clear originally, but it is not now open. For it was decided in the case of Davy, and has been assumed in all cases since that, where lands are held in feu they cannot be recorded in the burgh register, because the superiority is burgage. This was also clearly laid down by the House of Lords in the case of Dawson. I am not, therefore, entitled to listen to any argument on the terms of the Statute in favour of an opposite view. By the decisions all doubt is solved, and the question is exhausted. The defenders have also attempted to set up the plea of communis error. I have some difficulty in seeing how it is made to bear. Now that the error has been found out, is the vassal bound to continue satisfied with a bad title? Besides, it is not easy to see how an erroneous practice in the town of Aberdeen can amount to a communis error. Is every town to have the privilege of committing mistakes, and then pleading them against the Statute as communis error?

Lord Fullerton.—I agree entirely with your Lordships. As to the first point, I have not the slightest doubt. Though the lands were held burgage by the burgh, it is clear that they had the right of granting them in feu, and that they exercised it. It is impossible to read the title without perceiving that the lands are to be held in feu-farm, and nothing else. Many of the appended stipulations are more usual in burgage, but these cannot alter the nature of the grant. The only remaining question is, in what register ought the sasines to have been recorded? Looking merely at the Statute, the question is not free from doubt; and no wonder: for what it refers to are proper burgage sasines to parties holding burgage; and this is the general case—it not being usual to grant out in feu what is held in burgage. Here, in consequence of the privilege to grant feus, this anomaly has arisen, that the superiority is burgage, and the dominium utile feu. At first, there might seem some difficulty in determining how the Statute is to affect such a state of matters. The Statute 1617 is not very clear; but the Statute 1681 evidently means by lands “holding burgage,” not merely lands held by the burgh, but also by the vassals in burgage. It is needless, however, to discuss a question which has been set at rest by a series of decisions.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 173.—THE BANK OF SCOTLAND, Raisers.

MESSRS LOCKHART, HUNTER and WHITEHEAD, W.S., and JOHN KIRKPATRICK, Claimants.

Competent and Omitted—Discharge—Personal Bar—Circumstances in which a party, who, as a residuary legatee, was decerned to pay a sum of money nominatim to the parties claiming it, against whose title a valid objection was said to exist, and the decree was allowed to go out and be extracted in their name, was held not entitled thereafter to urge the objection, to the effect of compelling them, or those through whom they claimed, to make up a title by confirmation, which, it was alleged, was necessary to cure the defect.

Branch of the previous case supra, p. 395. The claimants, Messrs Lockhart, Hunter and Whitehead, had assigned to them the several accounts incurred by the various law-agents who had been engaged from time to time in making good the claim for legitim; and they themselves had also been engaged in that capacity. Towards payment of these claims, which exceeded the sum consigned by the other claimant, in the previous case, they obtained decrees against Mr Minto, and further, became vested in the right of Mr Gavin, for whose behoof the previous case had latterly been insisted in, and thereafter they arrested the sum consigned in the hands of the Bank of Scotland. The bank then (1837) raised the present multiplepointing, in which Messrs Lockhart, Hunter and Whitehead claimed the whole fund.

Kirkpatrick objected to the fund being uplifted until a valid discharge should be granted to him for the legitim, which, he maintained, the other claimants were not in a situation to do; that Messrs Minto and Gavin had no right to any part of Miss Sime's succession, as Mrs Clephane had never confirmed to Miss Sime; and that such discharge could only be granted by Mrs Minto making up a title by confirmation (a procedure which had never been adopted by Mrs Clephane or any one else) to the late Miss Sime. If Mrs Minto made up such a title, Mr Kirkpatrick stated he would then be safe; for that lady, besides having the right to discharge, would be obliged to find caution, in respect of her not being an executor-nominate.

Messrs Lockhart, Hunter and Whitehead pleaded, that this objection was untenable, because the right of Messrs Minto and Gavin to the fund was already established by the decrees of the Court: That decree and warrant of payment of the fund in medio having been pronounced, and afterwards extracted in favour of Messrs Minto and Gavin (in whose right the claimants stand), without any reservation as to a discharge of the legitim, and without reservation or objection of any sort, it was now incompetent, and too late for Mr Kirkpatrick to urge any such objection, even supposing that objection had been otherwise in itself well founded: That the matter was truly res judicata; and Mr Kirkpatrick's objection was at least of no more avail than a plea competent and omitted.

These claimants, besides, gave in a minute, signed by Mr and Mrs Minto and the several parties interested, consenting to allow the claimants to draw the fund in medio; in regard to which it was maintained, that it took away any objection that existed to their uplifting the consigned sum. Kirkpatrick however maintained, that the objection still continued, in respect that there was no confirmation to Miss Sime's estate. Thereafter, the claimants, as in right of certain debts assigned to them, confirmed as executors-creditors of Miss Sime, finding caution in usual form.

The Lord Ordinary, in respect of contingency between this question and the previous case, ordered cases thereon for the Inner-House, who disposed of the question at the same time as the previous question.

The Court, of this date, repelled Mr Kirkpatrick's objections, upon the ground, apparently, that after the interlocutor ordering payment of the consigned money to Messrs Minto and Gavin, it was too late for him to object to the title.

The Court

“Repel the claim for John Kirkpatrick in this multiplepointing, and prefer the claimants, Messrs Lockhart, Hunter and Whitehead, to the fund in medio in terms of their claim, and decern; and grant warrant to uplift the consigned money: Find the said Messrs Lockhart, Hunter and Whitehead entitled to the expenses incurred by them; allow an account,” &c.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 174.—LOCKHART and SWAN, and W. PAUL, Swan's Trustee, Raisers.

NORMAN LOCKHART, CHARLES FERRIER, and JOHN M'NEILL, Claimants.

Compensation—Retention—Concursus debiti et crediti—A copartnership were found liable in a sum of money to X, a creditor, who had previously executed a trust-deed for behoof of creditors. Thereafter, one of the partners, when the firm was dissolved, acquired right by assignation to a debt due by X, and attached the same by arrestment in the hands of the company, and of the individuals who had constituted the firm. In a competition for the company debt between this partner and X's trustee—Circumstances in which held that the partner was preferable to the trustee: the main ground being, that the trust-deed merely conveyed the trustor's heritage as a fund of payment to his creditors.

Messrs Lockhart and Swan, W.S., were the professional agents of Captain Malcolm M'Neill of Gallochibilly, who, by serving heir, had incurred a universal liability for the debts of his deceased brother Hector; and in the management of his affairs, Messrs Lockhart and Swan had various pecuniary transactions with the view of extricating M'Neill from his difficulties. It was found necessary, however, for him to execute a trust-deed for behoof of creditors, which he did in August 1829 in favour of the claimant Ferrier as trustee. The nature of this deed was differently stated by the parties,—the one contending that it was the intention of parties, as in fact it operated in law as a disposition omnium bonorum to the trustee; while Mr Lockhart maintained, both from the terms of the deed, and the correspondence preceding its execution, that it was only a conveyance, as it was meant at the time to be, of Captain M'Neill's heritage—not of his moveables. This deed undoubtedly conveyed the heritage, but there was no express conveyance of the personal property to the trustee, which Lockhart averred Captain M'Neill always possessed thereafter uncontrolled.

In 1831, an action was brought in name of Captain M'Neill against the firm of Lockhart and Swan, with the view of compelling them to account for their intrusions, either on account of the estate of the deceased brother Hector or the Captain himself, and concluding for payment to the pursuer personally of £5000, more or less, as should be found to be due by them. This action resulted in a submission to accountants, who brought out a balance against the firm, by this time dissolved by reason of the bankruptcy of Swan, of £1186. 19. 9½. Previous to decree being obtained for this sum, considerable discussion took place as to the parties entitled to sist themselves in room of M'Neill, who by this time was settled in America. Mr Ferrier attempted to sist himself, as deriving authority through the trust-deed, but the Court (ante, Vol. IV. p. 581), apparently holding that the trust-deed was not a universal conveyance, but only of the heritage, refused to allow Ferrier to be sisted, as not entitled to be so in terms of that deed. But thereafter the instance was taken up by the claimant John M'Neill, who held a general commission and factory from Captain M'Neill, and he appeared in the cause, with Mr Ferrier as his mandatory, and in consequence, on production of a minute to that effect, the Lord Ordinary "holds John M'Neill, Esquire of Parkmount, Belfast, sisted as the pursuer of this action, in terms of the foregoing minute: Farther, holds Charles Ferrier, Esquire, accountant in Edinburgh, sisted as his mandatory, in terms of the mandate which has this day been lodged for him; and finds that sufficient authority has now been produced for carrying on this cause."

Thereafter decree was pronounced in February 1839 in their favour, for the sum found due against the firm and the individual partners thereof.

Ferrier averred, but it was denied, that he had executed and carried on this action, though in name of M'Neill as his assignee in trust, for behoof of the creditors generally; and it appears he had obtained in February 1839, in order to obviate any objection on the ground of want of title to discharge the above debt and decree, an assignation from the other claimant, John M'Neill, who held the commission and factory.

The balance which was brought out by the accountants was, in the various accounts of Lockhart and Swan, incurred both prior to the trust-deed and subsequently, including the management under the trustee; and it did not appear that the firm of Lockhart and Swan, or Mr Lockhart as a partner, had, in the proceedings before the arbiters, maintained, in regard to the balance to be brought out, that it was subject to be wiped off by compensation for the debt immediately to be referred to.

Mr Campbell of Glensaddell, who had been compelled to pay up a cautionary obligation for Hector M'Neill, for which Captain M'Neill was liable to him in relief, obtained in 1839 a decree in absence against him for £1999, and thereafter he proceeded to adjudge Captain M'Neill's heritage, and to bring the same to judicial sale. But before doing so, his agents, Messrs Lockhart, Hunter and Whitehead, wrote to the agents of Mr Ferrier, that unless Mr Campbell obtained from him, on or before Friday next, a personal obligation that a payment of 5s. or 7s. per pound should be made within four months, he would proceed with a sale of the property. Mr Ferrier, in order to resist the judicial sale, wrote in answer, as follows, to his own agents, which was communicated to Mr Campbell's agents:

"Your favour, annexing me copy of Lockhart and Co.'s letter of 15th, anent the claim of Mr Campbell of Glensaddell against the estate of M'Neill of Gallochilly, has been received. I dislike coming under obligations in the affairs of others, but I have no objection to pay, when it shall be agreeable to Mr Campbell to receive the money, 7s. in the pound upon his debt, as originally constituted by decree, and as the same stands calculated at the date of the trust in my favour,—upon condition of his acceding to the trust-arrangement, and trusting to my management and proceedings. This is putting him upon the footing of the other creditors, and will not exclude him from receiving, along with the rest, all the interest which the funds will yield subsequent to the trust."

Mr Campbell instructed his agents thus:

"You may conclude with Mr Ferrier according to the terms of his letter to Messrs Cunningham and Walker, provided the sum alluded to shall amount to £550, and shall be paid to my account with Sir William Forbes and Co. here, within ten days from this date."

Mr Ferrier accordingly paid into the hands of Sir William Forbes and Company the sum of £550. Thereafter Mr Campbell, in September 1835, assigned his claims and decrees in his favour, on payment of the £550, in favour of the claimant Lockhart, who thereafter (September 1838) used arrestments in the hands of Lockhart and Swan, and in the hands of the individual partners of the dissolved company, viz., in the hands of himself, and of Swan and his trustee, in security of the debt of £1999, under deduction as aforesaid; and these arrestments came to attach the sum due by Lockhart and Swan to Captain M'Neill, in terms of the above decree-arbitral. Ferrier averred in this process, that this assignation was obtained at an under-value, and after Captain M'Neill was rendered bankrupt; and that he obtained it for the express purpose of a preference over the other creditors. M'Neill's bankruptcy was however denied, as well as the other averments; and it was shown from the letters in process, that Ferrier was aware of the existence of the assignation soon after it was granted, and that Mr Lockhart, in discharging the inhibition and adjudication used by Campbell, expressly had reserved his claims in reference to that assignation.

In the present multiplepounding, brought by the raisers for restitution of the £1186 found due by Lockhart and Swan, Lockhart claimed the whole fund in medio, in terms of his diligence and assignation from Campbell.

The fund was also claimed by Mr Ferrier and Mr

John McNeill, Captain McNeill's commissioner, on the ground of the decerniture against Lockhart in their favour, and they objected to the assignation by Campbell to Lockhart, in respect that Campbell having acceded to the trust, in terms of the arrangement by which the £550 were paid him, neither he nor his assignee were entitled to follow out separate measures against McNeill's estate. But in terms of the trust-conveyance, which, it was maintained, was a disposition omnium bonorum, the trustee pleaded—That the fund of £1186, due by Lockhart and Swan, fell to be treated as having been taken up by that conveyance prior to Campbell's assignation, and so vested in the trustee for behoof of the general creditors, and that, accordingly, he was entitled to be preferred for the amount. It was, besides, argued, that as Mr Lockhart had not pleaded compensation before the arbiters in the count and reckoning, at which time the plea was perfectly available to him, he was not now entitled to do so; but it must be held as "competent and omitted." There were other pleas advanced for this party, which were entirely dependent on a great variety of circumstances connected with the case, correspondence, &c., which were founded on as showing the understanding of parties as to the trust-deed being general, and as amounting to personal exception against Mr Lockhart now pleading retention. It was also pleaded, that the arrestments used by Lockhart, particularly those in the hands of Lockhart and Swan, were totally inept,—that company having been dissolved long previously (Ersk. III. 6, 2), in consequence of which there could be no execution against a company which did not exist.

Lockhart maintained that he was precisely in the same situation as his cedent, Mr Campbell; and unless it could be shown that Campbell was precluded from insisting for his claim, he, the claimant, was in no way debarred in the circumstances, but entitled to all the privileges and rights of his cedent; that he was entitled to compensate the debt due by him to Captain McNeill with the debt due to him, Lockhart, by that party; and that the debt in question was not conveyed by the trust-deed to the trustee, since heritage was alone conveyed, as had been settled previously in the case (ante, Vol. IV. p. 581), and as it was, besides, apparent from its very terms. And, in consequence, it was explained, that Campbell, by taking payment of the £550, and acceding to the trust, did so only to the extent of reaping payment from the heritage, and did not thereby give up his claims for the balance: nor did he tie up his hands from using separate measures as against the moveable property, which was not conveyed to the trustee. If the assignation to him had been unwarranted, a reduction should have been brought; but as that was not the case, Lockhart had clearly no competitor, but was merely seeking payment out of the funds of the debtor himself. Then, as to the point that the decree obtained by these claimants against Lockhart effectually vested Ferrier, &c., in the sum due by the decree-arbitral, that decree was directed against him as a partner of Lockhart and Swan; but in the present question, Lockhart was insisting—not as a partner of that firm, or for their behoof, but for payment of a debt as due to him in his individual capacity. Accordingly, the arrestments were perfectly valid, and in no way liable to exception, at least, not so liable on the pleas set forward by the other claimants; and whatever technical difficulties might have been stated to his claim here, had he claimed of or for behoof of the company, was obviated by the fact that he claimed as an individual. And, on the same ground, the plea of competent and omitted, which was now raised, could only operate as against the firm of Lockhart and Swan, or as against Lockhart claiming as a partner; but it could have no effect as pleaded against him in his individual capacity, in which alone he was insisting. Then, again, he was not engaged, in his individual capacity, in the discussion and proceedings before the referees, and, accordingly, could not be compromised, in so far as his individual debt was concerned. On the whole, even supposing that any objection could be stated to the arrestments, he was entitled to retention of the debt due by him, in respect of the competent and complete "concursum debiti et crediti."

In regard to the alleged bankruptcy of McNeill, it was explained, that though caption had been issued against him, and an execution of the messenger had been returned that he could not be found, the debt was for a large sum of money not really due; for the House of Lords, on the review of the case in which the sum was claimed, reversed the decision, and McNeill was found liable for only a small part. He was in course of obtaining a review of the judgment when the diligence was used.

Of consent of parties the case was reported by the Lord Ordinary.

At advising,

Lord Moncreiff considered that the whole pleas maintained for Mr Ferrier in his minute of debate were groundless; that it was settled by the Court long ago, that the disposition was a mere conveyance of heritage: not of McNeill's moveable property; and accordingly, that Mr Ferrier could not claim such a personal debt as here in question. His Lordship held that the terms of the deed showed expressly that it only was a conveyance of heritage. The decree against Lockhart was merely a decree against him as a partner of the company—not as an individual; and though the company did not exist actually, and was dissolved, the company might still subsist to wind up. Then Mr Lockhart, as an individual, having obtained right to Campbell's debt, there were the necessary elements to enable him to plead compensation. And he is entitled to do so: for the argument against him proceeds on a steady adherence to this, that the debt was carried by the trust-deed, which, it is clear, it was not. There was here really no competition at all. It was said that McNeill was bankrupt when the debt was acquired; but it is impossible to hold that; and the circumstances were well cleared up by Lockhart. Then, it was said that Campbell was barred, and therefore his assignee, from taking separate measures by acceding to the trust; but that must be understood in so far only as separate measures were not to be directed against the property comprehended in the trust, but not against what was not trust-property, viz., the moveables. The arrestments were perfectly good in the circumstances. As to the assignation being concealed by Mr Lockhart, and also his measures, the assignation was put into Mr Ferrier's hands, and, consequently, he must have been prepared for the plea of compensation; and, accordingly, it was said that the plea of compensation fell as "competent and omitted;" but his Lordship considered that that plea did not apply, in respect Mr Lockhart was here claiming—not as a partner of Lockhart and Swan, but as an individual;—and he was not bound to have stated the plea at the time of the count and reckoning, however open to him. His way was to raise a multiple-pointing in name of the company, and to claim in it as he has done here.

The other Judges concurred, and the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Repel the claim of Charles Ferrier, and rank and prefer the claimant, Norman Lockhart, in terms of his adjusted concordance and claim, to the whole fund in medio, and decern in the preference, and for payment accordingly: Find the claimant, Charles Ferrier, liable in the whole expenses of process; allow an account," &c.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 175.—Mrs FORSTER and HUSBAND, Pursuers, v. CHARLES TOD and OTHERS (J. O. Tod's Trustees), Defenders.

Settlement.—Trust.—Clause.—A testator conveyed his property to trustees, with an injunction to pay over the annual free proceeds to his daughter during her lifetime, or failing her to her children, till they attained majority, when the fee was to be paid over to them, and the trust was to cease, but expressly provided that the accounts of the trustees "shall be annually produced to, and examined by, an accountant of character and experience to be chosen by the said trustees or trustee, and after being examined and passed by him, shall be fitted and docketed by the said trustees or trustee, and which shall operate as a complete exoneration to them or him accordingly, it being hereby provided, that neither the said daughter, nor any other party, or person or persons whatsoever, shall have any right or title to inquire into, or interfere with the management, nor to quarrel or impugn the accounts of the said trustees or trustee, or their cashier or manager, or others acting under his or their authority, nor to object to any article for which they or he shall take credit, after the same has been examined and passed by the said accountant, as aforesaid"—Held that the daughter and her husband had no right to see the trustees' accounts and vouchers annually, before being audited and reported on by an accountant, and to have an opportunity of stating objections thereto, if necessary, and of being heard thereon.

By deed of settlement, the late James Ogilvie Tod of Findrassie conveyed his whole property, heritable and moveable, to trustees, with the power of assuming others, for the following purposes: inter alia, sixthly, "My said trustees or trustee, surviving and accepting as aforesaid, shall be entitled, immediately after my death, to uplift and discharge the rents of my heritable property during the subsistence of this present trust as aforesaid, to output and input tenants, prosecute warnings and removings, to grant tacks for such periods as he or they shall think fit, and in general, with full and ample power to manage my estate of Findrassie in every respect, both with regard to improvements and the general management thereof, according to his or their own sound discretion, and particularly, to carry through all improvements that may be in progress at my death, and to defray the expense thereof out of my means. Seventhly, I appoint my said trustees or trustee, surviving and accepting as aforesaid, to put my daughter, the said Helen Tod, in possession of the mansion-house of Findrassie, with the garden, lawn, and policies thereof, and to deliver over to her, on inventory, my household furniture, books and plate, all to be bruiked and enjoyed by her during her life; and farther," after deducting certain yearly payments, "and the annual expense of management, and parochial and public duties affecting the property, with the expense from time to time that may be laid out on improvements, to pay over to the said Helen Tod the free yearly proceeds of my heritable and moveable estates during her life; and in the event of her marrying, and having a child or children of such marriage, and dying before such child or children attain majority, to pay over the same for the use and behoof of such child or children till majority." "Ninth, It is hereby provided and declared that my said trustees or trustee, surviving and accepting as aforesaid, shall have full power and authority to appoint any one of their own number as cashier and manager, or any other person he or they may see fit, and that such person or persons so appointed, as well as the trustees or trustee themselves, in so far as may be necessary, shall keep regular accounts of their intromissions with, and application of, the funds coming into their hands; which accounts shall be annually produced to, and examined by, an accountant of character and experience to be chosen by the said trustees or trustee, and after being examined and passed by him, shall be fitted and docketed by the said trustees or trustee, and which shall operate as a complete exoneration to them or him accordingly, it being hereby provided that neither the said Helen Tod, nor any other party, or person or persons whatsoever, shall have any right or title to inquire into, or interfere with the management, nor to quarrel or impugn the accounts of the said trustees or trustee, or their cashier or manager, or others acting under his or their authority, nor to object to any article for which they or he shall take credit, after the same has been examined and passed by the said accountant as aforesaid."

The trust was to subsist and be effectual during the lifetime of the truster's daughter, Helen Tod; "and in the event of her marrying, and having issue of such marriage, and dying before such issue attain majority, it is in that event hereby further provided that the trust shall subsist till such issue attain the age of majority." Failing Helen Tod and her issue, the whole trust-property was to be divided among his brothers and sisters,—several of the former being trustees under the deed.

Miss Helen Tod (now Mrs Forster) not being satisfied with the management of the trustees, brought the present action of declarator, count and reckoning, &c., in which, after claiming certain buildings as pertinents of the mansion-house, lawn and policies, and alleging that the trustees, by improper management, had caused great losses to the estate, she concluded to have it found and declared, inter alia, that she "is entitled to see the defenders' accounts annually, before being audited and reported on by an accountant, in terms of the said deed of settlement, and to have an opportunity of stating objections thereto if necessary, and of being heard thereon; and that the defenders are not entitled in any one year to expend more of the rents or produce of the means and estate of the pursuer's said father, under their management, than is sufficient for defraying a reasonable expense of management, paying the provisions thereby stipulated, and the public and parochial burdens, and making judicious improvements on the said estate from time to time, so as always to leave a sufficient sum yearly for the suitable support of the pursuer, her family, and establishment, and the proper upholding of the said mansion-house, garden, lawn, and policies, with the pertinents thereof, during her life: And the defenders ought and should be decreed and ordained, by decret foresaid, to hold just count and reckoning with the pursuer for their intromissions with the rents, interests, and produce of the whole means and estates of her said father, and exhibit and produce the vouchers of their expenditure, and to make payment to the pursuer of the balance which is or ought to be in their hands, after making all legal and proper deductions as aforesaid, including the deduction of all sums paid by the defenders to the pursuer to account of her income since Whitsunday 1837."

Pleaded by the pursuer—1. The defenders are bound to hold just count and reckoning with the pursuer for their intromissions and management since the commencement of the trust, and in time coming. 2. There is no declaration in the trust-deed, which, according to a just or sound construction, entitles the defenders to refuse exhibition to one so directly interested in the estate as the pursuer is, of the vouchers of their past or future intromissions and management. 3. The audits by the accountant are not conclusive against, or binding on the pursuer, seeing especially that they proceeded in her absence, and without affording her an opportunity of seeing the vouchers, or being heard for her interest. 4. The defenders are not entitled to charge against the trust-estate the sum of £10,000 lent to the Marquis of Huntly, or other loans or investments made without due inquiry and caution regarding the sufficiency of the securities. 5. The defenders are bound to put the pursuer in possession of the policies of Findrassie, as well as the offices attached to, or near the mansion-house, and a remit should be made to proper persons to examine the premises, and report before answer.

Pleaded by the defenders—1. By the terms of the testator's trust-deed, the pursuer is debarred from interfering with, or questioning the management of, the defenders in the manner proposed in this summons. 2. The pursuer's allegations against the defenders of illiberality, extravagance, and injustice towards her, being unfounded in point of fact, the declaratory conclusions of this summons, which are based upon them, are uncalled for and unnecessary. 3. The defenders having undertaken gratuitously the office of trustees, from respect to the memory of the testator, and from the disinterested desire to promote the pursuer's interest, and having carried on the trust-management in optima fide, according to the directions of the testator, to the best of their judgment, are entitled to be assoilzied from the conclusions of this groundless and unnecessary summons.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"17th July 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties, and considered the process, Finds, in reference to the two first conclusions of the libel, that the pursuer is entitled, in terms of the trust-deed, to be put into possession of 'the mansion-house, with the garden, lawn, and policies thereof,' but that she is not entitled to the possession of pertinents over and above these; and before further answer as to these conclusions, of consent remits to to inspect the premises, and to report whether the pursuer has been put into possession of the policies, and if not, in what respect this has not been done: Sustains the defences against both parts of the third conclusion, assoilzies the defenders therefrom, and decerns: Finds, in reference to the fourth conclusion, that the defenders are bound to hold count and reckoning with the pursuer, but that in doing so the accounts, as fitted and docketed by them, after being passed by the accountant, must be held conclusive, and that the pursuer is not entitled to quarrel or impugn these accounts, and that the defenders are not bound to exhibit or produce their vouchers: And in respect of the insufficiency and irrelevancy of the pursuer's averments regarding the loan of £10,000 to the Marquis of Huntly, repels her fourth plea, and finds that the estate has been, and may be, properly charged with the loss arising from this transaction: Reserves, hoc statu, all claims of expenses.

"Note.—The pursuer's father chose to place her in a very peculiar situation, and all her present claims must be determined by reference to the terms of the trust-deed.

"1. Under her two first conclusions she demands not merely the mansion-house, garden, lawn, and policies, but the pertinents, which, when explained, means that she wants the offices, particularly a stable. Certain circumstances make it not improbable that the truster intended to reserve these entirely for the use of the home farm. But at any rate, he does not give them. All that he permits his trustees to let his daughter have the use of, is the house, garden, lawn, and policies; and the offices, which are not in actual contact with the mansion, cannot be held to be a part of it. It is possible, however, that these may be brought within the meaning of the word 'policies,' in which case she may get them, though not as a pertinent. But it is very difficult to ascertain from a plan, whether she has or has not got possession of what ought to be deemed the policies, and therefore we must wait till the report which has been consented to be obtained.

"2. What she demands under the first part of the third conclusion, viz., inspection of the accounts, in order that she may 'have an opportunity of stating objections thereto, if necessary,' could not be resisted in any ordinary case. But it cannot be granted under this very particular deed. It was plainly the truster's object to put his affairs entirely and absolutely under the charge of his trustees. Accordingly, he first prescribes how they are to proceed. They are to keep accurate accounts. These are to be annually examined by an accountant of character and experience, to be chosen by them, and if he passes the accounts, they are to be fitted and docketed by the trustees, and 'are to operate as a complete exoneration of them.' The pursuer maintains that this result only takes place after the final docketing, and that she is entitled to see the accounts and vouchers, and to state objections prior to this conclusive fitting; and if there was nothing in the deed to exclude this, the Lord Ordinary would have been strongly inclined to accede to what is so generally reasonable. But there certainly may be circumstances which may make a truster wish to put those who are first to succeed him entirely under the control of trustees whom he allures into that office, chiefly by the belief that they are protected against all interference or annoyance; and the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that this is the import of this deed. The truster does not merely prohibit the pursuer from quarrelling or impugning the accounts, and from objecting to any article taken credit for after auditing, but he declares generally that she shall have no right or title to inquire into, or interfere with the management. The Lord Ordinary cannot reconcile a decree in terms of the first part of the third conclusion with this clause. Such a decree would totally change the position and the authority given to the trustees by the deed.

"Under the second part of this conclusion, she insists that the defenders shall conduct their expenditure and general management in such a way as always to leave a sufficient sum yearly for the suitable support of the pursuer, her family and establishment, and the proper upholding of the said mansion-house, garden, lawn, and policies, with the pertinents thereof. It might possibly have been very proper in the truster to set his daughter up in this way, but unfortunately he has not done so. He has put every thing he had under the charge of trustees; and though he has directed them to pay over to the said Helen Tod 'the free yearly proceeds of my heritable and moveable estates,' he has made them the sole and ultimate judges of what shall be held to be the free residue. Not satisfied with giving them full and ample power to manage 'my estate of Findrassie' in every respect, both with regard to improvements and the general management thereof, according to his or their sound discretion, he prohibits her from interfering with the management, and from even inquiring into it. But this conclusion not only implies her right to inquire and to object, but greatly extends her privileges under the trust. The deed says nothing about the suitable support of her family and establishment, the upholding of the house or pertinents.

"3. Still, however, they are bound to hold count and reckoning with her as demanded, under the fourth conclusion, for they are her debtors for the free annual profits of the estate. But under this, what the pursuer really wants is, to get hold of the vouchers, with a view to object to the trustees' charge and discharge, and to have it found that they cannot take credit for the sum lost by a loan to the Marquis of Huntly. Now the Lord Ordinary thinks himself called upon to protect the trustees on both of these points.

"If the pursuer be not entitled even to inquire into the management, or to object to any article in the accounts, she has no interest to see the vouchers; and accordingly, the only interest which she states is, that she may infringe the trust-deed by doing these very things.

"The loan stands in a different position. The trustees are protected from responsibility for loans, provided the borrowers were reputed solvent at the time. The pursuer, therefore, can only deprive them of this protection by averring that the person they lent to was not reputed solvent. But she makes no such averment; and when the Lord Ordinary offered to allow her to put such an express statement on the record, she declined to do so, on the ground that she had already averred sufficiently. He does not think that she has. She only sets forth that in point of fact the borrower was insolvent, and that this might have been discovered; but this is not the criterion of responsibility given by the truster."

When the cause was advised the Court unanimously approved of the findings of the interlocutor, with the exception of that relating to the pursuer's right of inspecting the accounts, as to which, being equally divided, they, with a view to consult the other Judges, ordered minutes of debate "as to the pursuer's alleged right to see the defenders' accounts and vouchers annually, before being audited and reported on by an accountant, and to have an opportunity of stating objections thereto, if necessary, and of being heard thereon."

The following opinions were returned:—

Lord Justice-Clerk (Hope):

"The question put to the Judges by their Lordships of the First Division is much more limited than the findings of the Lord Ordinary as to the conclusions of the summons regarding the pursuer's interest in the accounts of the trustees. The question put to the Judges is simply, 'Whether the pursuer is entitled to require that the defenders' accounts, with the vouchers thereof, be annually exhibited to her before being laid before an accountant to be audited?'

"There is no question put as to the competency of making any case against the propriety of the audit when completed, or the extent to which the declaration in the trust-deed respecting such audit shall exclude charges of fraud practised upon the accountant, or collusion on his part, or as to the character and extent of the protection which the clause of the trust-deed may afford to the trustees against proper malversation, fraud, dishonesty, or gross abuse of discretion, either apparent on the face of the accounts as audited, or relevantly offered to be proved against the audit.

"The broadest clauses of protection may often be held not sufficient to screen dishonesty, or even gross abuse of the trust committed to the trustees, and may be construed to import entire independence and integrity, and the absence of unreasonable precipitancy, on the part of such auditor, as this deed supposes, viz., one nominated by the trustees. But such matters are not involved in the point stated for our consideration.

"The question put to us must therefore be considered apart from the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, or from the competency of redress at an after stage of the trust-management, if a case of dishonesty, collusion, or gross abuse of the trust were relevantly averred.

"Taking the limited question actually put to us, that point appears to me to be free from doubt.

"The leading, and, in my opinion, the regulating and important part of the ninth clause in the trust-deed, has not received the attention which is due to it, and is much overlooked in the argument of both parties.

"The deed—which is undoubtedly framed on the principle of investing the trustees with discretionary powers of the broadest character, and intrusts them with powers and duties of management very specially enforced and described—plainly proceeds upon the principle of preferring the management of the trustees to the management of the pursuer. In her no confidence is placed,—she receives none of the ordinary powers of a liferenter, whether of occupation or management. Affection towards her, and a desire for her welfare and good, were not wanting, for she is to receive the whole free yearly proceeds of the truster's heritable and moveable estates during her life: But with this benefit designed for her on the one hand, the truster (for the directions in the deed must be taken as the deliberate expressions of his personal will on the subject) has established, by a very anxious clause, a system of management in which, to say the least of it, the pursuer has no sort of concern, and which is intended to trust every thing to the trustees. In the ninth clause, power is, in the first instance, given to appoint any of the trustees cashier or manager, or any other person; then it is declared that these trustees 'shall keep regular accounts of their intromissions with, and application of the funds coming into their hands.' This is directory—it is explicit. And it is of importance, in reference to what immediately follows:—'For, after directing such accounts to be kept, the clause proceeds—'which accounts shall be annually produced to, and examined by, an accountant of character and experience, to be chosen by the said trustees or trustee; and after being examined and passed by him, shall be fitted and docqueted by the said trustees or trustee, and which shall operate as a complete exoneration to them or him accordingly.'

"Into this clause I cannot interpolate any thing.

"This appears to me to be the leading and regulating part of this ninth clause: Not the part which follows,—which, though most argued on by both parties, is not, in my opinion, the material and regulating part of the deed. What follows is a proviso for the purpose of additional and more emphatic exclusion of the pursuer's interference, and as expletive, though perhaps in part unnecessary, of the declaration and provision now quoted.

"Now observe: The plan and system of trust-inquiry and examination here provided for, are complete, and carried out to the extent of exoneration. There is nothing wanting or imperfect in the system thus laid down, so far as I have quoted the clause. Accounts are to be kept by the cashier and the trustees. These accounts are to be annually produced to, and examined by, an accountant of character and experience. That accountant is to be chosen by the trustees. Then he is to examine the accounts, and to pass the same; and when so examined, and passed, and docqueted by the trustees, in acknowledgment that they have no more to say, such audited accounts shall operate as a complete exoneration. The system is thus in itself perfect and complete. Whether expedient, was a point for the truster. A special tribunal for examination and inquiry is designated and constituted by the truster—the individual is to be chosen by the trustees. Whether their choice, if improper, might be a ground for challenging or disregarding the proceeding in any case of after-challenge, is not involved in the question put to the Judges. The tribunal being declared, and the individual chosen (the question implies no failure by the trustees in the discharge of that duty), his duty is that of examination and inquiry into the trustees' intromissions with, and application of the trust-funds.

"After such examination, his audit or decision is declared to be a complete exoneration. Such audit, therefore, is the tribunal chosen by the truster, and is at once the inquiry and exoneration which he has prescribed and required. That exoneration the trustees are bound to have—to the benefit and protection of that exoneration they are absolutely entitled.

"This is, in my opinion, the leading part of the whole clause. The remainder is either expletive, or contains an exclusion of the pursuer in matters beyond the above provision.

"In the provision above quoted, there is no allusion to the pursuer or other party interested in the funds. There is no exclusion of her, if she can appear and take a part in the matter. But there is no condition imposed upon the trustees in regard to her. They are to produce their accounts annually to the accountant. It is not said that they are to produce them to the pursuer. I cannot import such a condition and obligation into the trust-deed. There is no mention of her here. There is no duty in regard to her prescribed. There is no preliminary provision directing the accounts to be exhibited to her before production to the accountant as a precedent direction.

"The trust-deed is an utter blank upon such a point. I cannot see the slightest warrant for interfering with the truster's deed by prescribing such a proceeding to the trustees.

"The reason for such a provision not being introduced (if one ought to inquire into the truster's reasons respecting the matter, which he had the absolute power to regulate according to his own will, judgment, and notions of expediency) is obvious and satisfactory.

"The truster chose his own tribunal. He preferred it to a judicial investigation—inter alia, because he meant to protect those in whose judgment and management he had such confidence.

"But he leaves the tribunal so chosen—the accountant—altogether free and unfettered as to the mode in which he is to discharge his duty. The truster chose and desired to leave that matter wholly to the discretion of the accountant to be chosen by the trustees.

"How the accountant is to discharge the duty intrusted to him, depends upon his judgment—on his views of the case and of the accounts presented to him,—upon the aid which his experience may suggest as necessary or expedient: And the extent of the inquiries he may make, or the aid he may require, may vary from time to time with the character of the accounts and vouchers of the transactions embraced in them, and with the estimate which he may be led to form of the prudence and propriety of the management, and of the views and intentions of the trustee.

"When accounts are to be examined by a court, they take such assistance as they find necessary. If they think the aid of any parties as objectors is proper, they give these parties an opportunity of making appearance. In many instances, they direct either general notice or individual notice of the proceeding. Their means of actual and personal examination are more limited than those of an accountant. They depend upon officers of Court, and on accountants. But they execute the duty imposed upon them (if not regulated by special enactment) in the way which they think best for the ends of justice, whether the mode of procedure is adopted for the particular case, or falls under some general rule of judicial procedure.

"Just so with the accountant. He has the same discretion and power of proceeding as to the party interested, which the Court has. The maker of the deed trusted to the accountant, being the tribunal which he chose for examination, audit, and exoneration, and had the absolute power to appoint. That accountant is not fettered as to the course which he should adopt, but neither is he to be interfered with or dictated to by the Court, in the course of executing his duty.

"If he thinks fit to call for the aid of the pursuer, as a party interested, or to allow her to appear, he will do so. But whether he should do so or not, is clearly left to him as the tribunal chosen by the truster. The pursuer has it in her power to apply to the accountant for leave to see the accounts and vouchers, and to have time and opportunity to object. To him she must apply as the party appointed to examine, audit, and exoner. He may grant or refuse the application as he pleases. Whether such a case of refusal could be stated as would found a ground of challenge, is not the point stated for opinion; and I give no indication even of opinion on that point.

"There may be many reasons for calling in the aid of the pursuer to assist in the inquiry, and the accountant, when he finds cause for that, may direct the accounts to be furnished to her, and may give her any latitude of objection and inquiry he chooses, if he finds that course either necessary, or a source of satisfaction to his own mind, or expedient.

"The character of the accounts may influence him. What is fitting or necessary one year (say, near the commencement of the trust-management, or of the accountant's knowledge of the trust-affairs), he may deem not to be so in another year. The existence of disputes with the trustees may, at one period, and according to the character of the dispute, be a reason with the accountant for calling in the aid of the pursuer to the examination, and for giving her the utmost latitude of objection. But at another period, and according to the character of the disputes and the conduct of the pursuer, the existence of disputes with the trustees may most properly and reasonably form, on the other hand, in the opinion of the accountant, an ample and satisfactory ground for not giving her a right to appear. On all these matters the accountant must decide for himself.

"This view appears to me to be a full and satisfactory answer to the pleas urged by the pursuer, that she ought to be found entitled to see the accounts, and to state her objections. The tribunal for examination and exoneration pre-eminently preferred by the truster, is designated and established by the deed. The accountant is trusted to and left unfettered as to the manner in which he is to perform his duty. The truster has relied upon his discretion, judgment, and impartiality; and has left to him to regulate the whole matter of inquiry and examination. To that accountant the pursuer must apply, and in his judgment the truster has reposed confidence. The accountant is to say, whether she shall see the accounts and take part in the examination.

"Whether, if he shall refuse, there may be ground of challenge against his proceedings in giving exoneration, may depend upon the special nature of the case for which redress is claimed, but is not the point put to the Judges, and might depend upon the precise averments made as raising a case for redress. There seems, however, to be no warrant for prescribing preliminary examinations of the accounts by the pursuer as a condition preceding their production to the accountant.

"I apprehend the whole subject of the examination of the trust-accounts, and of the exoneration of the trustees, is a matter peculiarly within the will, power, and discretion of the truster. There is no ground for interfering with his deed upon this point. He may have reasons perfectly conclusive to his own mind for an arrangement such as that established by this deed. The nature of the duties expected of the trustees,—his knowledge of the individuals, and in particular of the party primarily interested in the trust-deed;—many considerations may influence him in adopting a resolution to exclude legal inquiry, and to establish a mode of examination and exoneration for himself. No party benefited by that deed is entitled to complain, or to ask for any other mode of investigation. Had any other mode of examination been proposed, the truster might not have left such party any benefit whatever. When fraud, or collusion, or plain malfeasance in the exercise of the duty, shall be properly established as an objection to the exoneration, the law will, as in other cases, hold that the truster's own object is promoted by giving a remedy against such abuses, but further interference is, I think, unwarranted, for the truster had unlimited power of regulating the matter as he thought fit.

"There are many instances in which a particular mode of ascertaining certain facts, whether introduced in mutual contracts or in deeds emanating solely from an individual's own will and power over his property, is held to exclude the interference of a court of law.

"One of the strongest cases occurred as to a lease of coal in Mr Campbell of Islay's estate of Woodhall. The tenant was to be relieved from the burden of a lease in the event of its being ascertained, by the report of two persons mutually chosen, that the coal was unworkable with profit. The fact was, in the particular case, really indisputable; but the individuals named did not agree in opinion, and the parties could not agree in their selection of other individuals. The tenant applied to the Court by an action, to establish the failure of the coal, but it was held that one mode of inquiry alone having been agreed to, relief could not be obtained of the burden of the lease, ruinous as it might be, by any other species of investigation—See Dixon v. Campbell, June 25, 1830. A stronger case could not well occur. The parties respectively chosen had differed in opinion. The lease did not provide for an oversman, and the mode of inquiry had, it might be said, failed to produce any result; but the only mode of ascertaining the fact, was the opinion of persons mutually chosen, and that opinion not having been obtained, the Court held that the contract of parties excluded every other mode of inquiry.

"Much more, surely, must the examination directed by an individual as to the right annual management of his own property, be allowed to remain without any interference through the medium of a court of law, by those taking benefit under that deed.

"Again, the trustees accepted on the faith of a distinct provision in the trust-deed, which contained no such direction as that stated in the question. I think they are entitled to rely on the trust-deed being acted on as framed. Like all other trustees, they must, and ought to be exposed to the consequences, whatever they may be, of challenge, if a case shall be stated which, as between them and the trustee, cannot be held to fall within the protections afforded by the latter's deed. But that is a very different matter from a direct addition to the duty prescribed by the deed, and which, under the question put to us, must be annually imposed on the trustees, over and above doing what the trust-deed directs.

"The remainder of the clause is in part expletive—in part it may be unnecessary, but in other parts, it goes into matters not provided for in the preceding part of the clause, and excludes interference by the pursuer in a way not previously directed, —'It being hereby provided, that neither the said Helen Tod, nor any other party, or person or persons whatsoever, shall have any right or title to inquire into, or interfere with the management, nor to quarrel or impugn the accounts of the said trustees or trustee, or their cashier or manager, nor to object to any article for which they or he shall take credit, after the same has been examined and passed by the said accountant, as aforesaid.'

"This section of the clause begins in a way which shows that it was in no degree intended to render the former less complete as a system of inquiry and exoneration, nor to detract from what was previously settled. The first provision declares, that neither the pursuer nor any other party shall have any right or title to inquire into, or interfere with the management. Now this is beyond the prior section as to the mode of exoneration. But it is very important. It takes away from the pursuer any right or title to inquire. Hence the pursuer has no title to ask for that which she now demands, whatever might have been the terms of the preceding clause as to examination.

"Further, this provision, it will be observed, excludes any right or title to interfere with the management. This plainly relates to, or at least includes, any attempt to alter, stop, or challenge the management while it is going on, and before the acts are over. This is of importance as to the attempt, in point of construction, to make the latter words, 'after the same has been examined and passed by the said accountant, as aforesaid,' bear back upon, and limit the exclusion of any right or title to inquire into the management, to an exclusion after the accounts are examined. The words 'interfere with the management' plainly proves, that the first provision is more extensive, and comprehends an exclusion of any right or title to complain while the management is going on.

"But the closing words of the section cannot, in point of meaning, or in fair grammatical construction, draw back to, and control and limit the first provision, excluding the right or title to inquire into, or interfere with the management. This first provision is in object and substance different from that to which the closing words have reference. And these closing words appear clearly to me to apply only to the impugning of the accounts.

"But whatever opinion might be entertained as to the construction of this last section of the ninth clause, I could not hold that it interferes in any degree with the preceding section. Supposing that the whole of the section last quoted, is a provision applicable to the relative state of parties after the accounts have been examined, and is only following up and explanatory of the terms 'which shall operate as a complete exoneration to them' (terms in themselves requiring no explanation), still that mode of construing the last section, making it applicable exclusively to matters after the examination of the trust-accounts, leaves the view already stated as to the mode of inquiry and exoneration established by the first section of the clause, perfectly untouched: And with that mode of investigation, I do not think a court can interfere, without introducing and interpolating into the trust-deed a direction not contained therein, viz., that the accounts of the trustees, with the vouchers, shall be annually submitted to the pursuer before being produced to the accountant. This humbly appears to me to be a manifest addition to the trust-deed, and to resolve into an attempt by the Court to make what they may think a better deed than the trust-deed has done.

"Whatever the trustee has held to be satisfactory, must be taken by a court of law to be satisfactory. He was entitled to deliver to us the law upon this subject, as between the trustees—that is, himself (if no case of abuse is alleged) and the parties interested. He was entitled to exclude any general principle of law if he chose. He was entitled to regulate all matters in which a court of equity might produce different results from that which he desired.

"The pursuer has a protection under the deed, to the extent to which the trustee chose to give her any, viz., in the judgment of the accountant. To him she may apply: she may ask to be allowed to take part in the inquiry, in order to aid him. He has the power to allow that, though she has no title or right to demand it.

"What shall be such malversation and failure of duty on the part of the accountant as to establish a case of interference, in order to effectuate the object of the trustee himself, is not now the point, and our opinion cannot be influenced on the specific question put to us by any judgment pronounced or to be pronounced on matters not before us.

"The general principle is, that the protection of the deed does not cover fraud or collusion, upon the very ground that such a case cannot be within the meaning of the trustee upon any view or construction of the clauses. I must presume that the Division consulting us will guard that principle, if the averments on the record in this case are such as, in their opinion, to require that being done. With the aid of that general principle, in the event of a relevant case being established, and with the security of that mode of investigation and exoneration to which the maker himself trusted, the pursuer has all the protection which he thought was necessary, and further the Court cannot go."

Lord Murray:

"I agree with the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk."

Lord Moncreiff:

"I concur in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk. I only beg leave to add, that it is very clear to me, that the last words of the clause of the trust-deed, on which the whole argument of the pursuer is founded, relate only to the member of the sentence immediately preceding them, and do not at all qualify, or afford an implication to qualify, the express exclusion of any right or title in the pursuer to inquire into or interfere with the management, or to impugn the accounts of the trustees or their cashier; and farther, that the real meaning and effect of those words is, to confirm or repeat in another form the previous provision, that the accounts, when examined, fitted, and docketed by the accountant, shall operate as a complete exoneration of them or him. But, by no construction, can they affect that leading provision."

Lord Cockburn:

"I remain of the opinion I have already expressed, when I disposed of the case as Lord Ordinary."

Lord Medwyn:

"The question on which our opinion is asked, is, whether the pursuer is entitled to require that the defenders' accounts, with the vouchers thereof, be annually exhibited to her before being laid before an accountant to be audited? Looking at the peculiar terms of this trust, I must answer this question in the negative. The pursuer is not the trustee's heir-at-law; she is his disponent, and has no other character. In claiming under this settlement, she must take under every condition and qualification Mr Tod chose to impose, not being contrary to law. He was providing, not for a perpetual trust, nor even for the management of his property, for a long and unseen course of time, where he could not foresee the characters and circumstances of the heirs who might succeed under his trust-deed, nor of the trustees who might be assumed to manage it. He was providing for the interests of one individual known to him, and regulating the conduct of trustees, with whose character he was also fully acquainted. In them he unquestionably reposed most exuberant trust, and in the same degree restricted the rights of his disponent. I have no right to inquire into his motives for making this disposition of his fortune. I am bound to hold that he had sufficient reasons for doing so, and I must give full effect to the provisions of the trust-deed, which is the title and the measure of the right the pursuer has to Mr Tod's succession. Now, she has not the ordinary privileges of a liferenter. She-is to occupy the house, garden, and policy; but the entire management of the estate, and the improvements upon it, are to be by the trustees, according to their sound discretion. They may appoint one of their number cashier or manager. They are 'to keep regular accounts of their intrusions with, and application of the funds coming into their hands, which accounts shall be annually produced to, and examined by an accountant of character and experience, to be chosen by the said trustees; and after being examined and passed by him, shall be fitted and docketed by the said trustees, and which shall operate as a complete exoneration to them accordingly. It being hereby provided, that neither the said Helen Tod nor any other party, shall have any right or title to inquire into, or interfere with the management, nor to quarrel nor impugn the accounts of the said trustees, nor to object to any article for which they shall take credit, after the same has been examined and passed by the said accountant, as aforesaid.'

"Now, it is impossible for me to believe that Mr Tod intended that the accounts of the trustees, with the vouchers, should be exhibited to the pursuer before being laid before the accountant. I think the plain meaning and direction of the clause is, that this is not to be the case,—that she has no right to require them to do so, just as little as she has to require them to consult her before they propose to make an improvement upon the property. All that the trustees are directed to do is, to produce their accounts annually to the accountant, being a man of character and experience; and when he has examined and passed any article, the pursuer cannot object to it; and when the account so examined and passed is fitted and docketed by the trustees, it operates as a complete exoneration to them. In all this, there is not only no notice of the interference of the pursuer, but she is expressly excluded, as the whole progress of the accounts from the time of their being kept, their being produced to an accountant and examined by him, their return to the trustees to be fitted and docketed by them, is distinctly provided for by the trust; and the effect which this examination and docketing is to operate is declared, and the pursuer is only mentioned to exclude any objection from her. That the exclusion of any objection after the accounts have been examined and passed, does not imply that it is competent for her to object before, and that for this purpose she must be furnished with the accounts and vouchers; because it is distinctly provided to whom alone the trustees are to produce their accounts; and therefore, in order to exclude the pursuer from objecting to the accounts, it was sufficient to express this exclusion after they were examined and passed, before which there is no provision for her as to seeing them—excluding her from this interference with the trustees as to their accounts, just as she is excluded as to their management of the property.

"The pursuer has the protection of the accountant of character and experience, against any malversation of the trustees in application of the proceeds of the trust-estate. This is all which Mr Tod gave, or intended to give her. The accountant may no doubt apply to her for explanation as to any item in these accounts, if he chooses. She may also ask him to be allowed to take part in the examination of the accounts; but she has no right to insist on this. He may admit or refuse this request, as he sees fit.

"There may be cases of failure of duty, both on the part of the trustees in their management and expenditure, and of the accountant in checking their accounts, which would authorise the pursuer to call upon the Court to interfere, in order to fulfil the real purposes of the trust as to the disposal of his property. The pursuer's right to object to fraud or collusion between the trustees and accountant, is not, and cannot be excluded—on this plain ground, that no such case could be in the contemplation of the truster when he introduced this clause, which could be intended to apply only to the bona fide discharge of the respective duties of both parties, in the management and expenditure, and settlement of the accounts of the expenditure."

Lords Cuninghame and Ivory:

"The question on which our opinion is required by the First Division of the Court, is thus expressed in the interlocutor of their Lordships, of 22d January 1842, 'Whether the pursuer is entitled to require that the defunders' accounts, with the vouchers thereof, be annually exhibited to her, before being laid before an accountant to be audited?'

"We are humbly of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to make the demand on the defenders, which is the subject of this question; and that the defenders are not entitled, either by the terms of the trust-deed, or in a right and bona fide administration of their trust, to oppose the request.

"In considering this question, we have attended particularly to the terms of the trust-deed, under which the defenders act; and the peculiarities which strike us in this trust, as deserving of attention, are these:—

"In the first place, it is manifest on the face of the deed, that the pursuer, Mrs Forster, is at present the only party beneficially interested in this trust, and in the management of the defenders. She is entitled to the whole free annual proceeds of the trust, if there be any. And from the circumstances of her birth, as mentioned in the papers, it is probable that this formed her sole provision and means of subsistence, at the commencement of the trust. She had, therefore, the deepest interest in the propriety of the defenders' charges, and in the accuracy of their accounts.

"In the second place, it appears from the trust-deed, that this is a trust to last for the whole life of the pursuer, and till her issue attain the years of majority. It is explained in the pleadings, that the lady is at present under thirty years of age; so that without any violation of probability, this trust may endure for forty or fifty years.

"In the third place, while this trust-deed is granted in favour of individuals selected by the truster, in whom he had high confidence, it is manifest, both from its contemplated duration, and from the very broad and unlimited terms in which the deed is framed in favour of surviving and assumed trustees, that the trust may ere long pass into the hands of parties unknown to the truster. Under the first head of the trust, power is given as usual to the majority, as a quorum; and then the following particular provision occurs: 'And when the said trustees are reduced to one in number, the said one shall have the same rights, powers, and authority hereby vested in him as are granted by these presents to the said whole trustees or quorum foresaid; and further, with power to a majority of the said accepting trustees above named, and the survivors or survivor of them, to name and assume, after my death, such person or persons as they shall think proper to be trustees, for the purposes herein mentioned, alongat with them, or after their or his decease, as they or he shall think proper and expedient; declaring that the person or persons to be so assumed, shall have the same powers of acting in every part of this trust, as my trustees herein named have, or as if the person or persons to be assumed were herein named and designed trustees by myself.'

"In the fourth place, while we are bound to hold that the trust-deed, which is here the subject of interpretation, is the deed of the truster, we must notice it as a circumstance not to be thrown out of view by a court of equity called to construe it,—that this deed was framed, and bears to have been written by one of these trustees themselves. We assume that the gentleman referred to is a man of business, of high character and respectability; and we make no remark in the present case, which it would not be our duty to make, if the deed had been framed by the first conveyancer in the kingdom;—but we conceive it to be a rule to be constantly and sacredly enforced in law,—that when a deed conferring large powers on grantees (even though trustees) has been framed by one of their own number, it ought rather to be subjected to a strict, than to a liberal construction. In the present instance, we shall take that interpretation of the deed which we conceive that its terms reasonably import.

"This being a trust, then, which may last for half a century,—which confers large powers on the trustees,—and which may in a few years come to be executed by parties personally unknown to the truster,—the question which arises is, whether the party or parties beneficially interested in the trust be entitled to ask for inspection of the annual accounts and vouchers of the trustees, before they are finally and for ever audited by an accountant selected by these trustees themselves; under the powers specially conferred on them by the trust?'

"Now, we apprehend it to be a rule in the law of trusts, which it would require the most positive and unmistakable provision to exclude,—that the parties beneficially interested in them, shall at all times have full and unrestrained access to the accounts and vouchers of the trust-estate. In substance and reality the estate is their estate; they have the natural interest to check mistakes, and even to give suggestions and aid to the trustees, presuming the latter have right views and intentions,—and as it would instantly excite the most grave suspicion in the mind of any Judge if trustees refused, of their own accord, to show their accounts and vouchers to those entitled to the balance;—so it is a construction the very last which a court of equity ought to put on a trust-deed, that it was contemplated by the trustor to exclude the parties interested for the time, even from seeing, before the final audit, the accounts and vouchers which they alone have any interest to check. But we do not think that the trust-deed, in the present instance, bears this construction.

“The clause of the deed founded on by the defenders in support of this plea, is the 9th, which provides, that ‘my said trustees or trustee, surviving and accepting as aforesaid, shall have full power and authority to appoint any one of their own number as cashier and manager, or any other person he or they may see fit, and that such person or persons so appointed, as well as the trustees or trustee themselves, in so far as may be necessary, shall keep regular accounts of their intrusions with, and application of, the funds coming into their hands; which accounts shall be annually produced to, and examined by, an accountant of character and experience, to be chosen by the said trustees or trustee, and after being examined and passed by him, shall be fitted and docketed by the said trustees or trustee, which shall operate as a complete exoneration to them or him accordingly; it being hereby provided, that neither the said Helen Tod, nor any other party, or person or persons whatsoever, shall have any right or title to inquire into or interfere with the management, nor to quarrel or impugn the accounts of the said trustees or trustee, or their cashier or manager, or others acting under his or their authority, nor to object to any article for which they or he shall take credit, after the same has been examined and passed by the said accountant, as aforesaid.’

“This clause certainly confers very extensive powers on the trustees, when it gives them (and even a sole survivor of their number) power to name one of themselves to be cashier and manager of the trust, and to name their own auditor, whose passing and examination of the accounts shall be to them a final exoneration. Unquestionably, also, there is an exclusion to a certain extent of the said Helen Tod, when it is provided, that neither she nor any other parties should have right to ‘inquire into’ (a very unusual expression), ‘or interfere with the management, nor to quarrel or impugn the accounts of the said trustees or trustee, or their cashier or manager, or others acting under his or their authority, nor to object to any article for which they or he shall take credit, after the same has been examined and passed by the said accountant, as aforesaid.’

“We apprehend, however, that the clause, instead of aiding the defenders in their present opposition, is conclusive in favour of the pursuer’s demand. When it is expressly provided, that accounts shall not be impeached after they have been examined and passed by a particular accountant, it is necessarily implied, that before that approval, the parties shall not be excluded from objection. Indeed, unless it be maintained that those interested in the trust were specially debarred from seeing the trust-accounts at every period of their possession, (and that is not seriously contended for by the defenders), it must be presumed that the trustor, and every man who understood what he was about, meant, that these accounts and vouchers were to be exhibited to his heir, before the chequer was shut by the accountant’s docket, and not after that period, when the accounting was final, and when it was quite useless and unavailing to point out any objection or error in the accounts.

“It appears to us, that the argument of the trustees on this point proceeds on a critical construction of the clause before quoted, neither just in itself, nor decisive of the question, if it were better founded than it is. They allege (revised minute, p. 11), that the pursuers ask for inspection of the accounts and vouchers merely as a pretext for enabling them to inquire into the trustees’ management, from which, it is said, that the pursuer and her successors are peremptorily, and in all events, excluded, after as well as before the accountant’s audit. We doubt extremely if that view of the clause be correct. We rather think that the explanatory words at the end of the 9th clause apply and override the whole provision, and that the trustor’s true meaning was, that no party should interfere with the trustees’ management, or quarrel with the accounts,—after they had been approved by the accountant. A fair and proper expiscation of accounts necessarily implies a certain investigation as to management, which it was very safe for the trustees to leave to the accountant;—and we can neither listen to, nor do we even understand the extreme anxiety manifested by these trustees to prevent their management from being made the subject even of the least collateral reference.

“But really that is a point into which we think it quite unnecessary at present to enter. The import of the clause as to management, is not properly the subject of the present discussion. If any inquiry as to it is ever proposed in a competent shape, it must be discussed. The question put to us relates solely to the competency of the pursuer demanding annually an inspection of her trustees’ accounts and vouchers before they are laid before the accountant,—of course, with the view of her being heard before him as to these, if she shall think that necessary; and while the trust-deed, as already observed, only declares, that the trustees shall be exonerated after the accounts are passed,—her right to have inspection prior thereto, rests on principles of common law and equity which appear to us to be incontestable.

“A contrary opinion would indeed leave the important word ‘after’ altogether inoperative and without meaning. It would have been easy for the trustor, had he so intended, to say, that the pursuer was not to object to the trustees’ accounts, either before or after their being examined and passed by the accountant. But he does not say so. He contents himself with declaring, that she shall not do so ‘after’ such examination. Now, we cannot here read the word after, thus put by itself, as at all identical in meaning with the phrase ‘both before and after.’ It is, on the contrary, expressly to distinguish what was to be excluded after, from what was not intended to be excluded before, that the clause appears to have been constructed as it is. Nor does it matter, in this view, whether the concluding words are to be held as overriding the whole clause, or only the last branch of it. It is quite enough that there was something which the pursuer was only to be prohibited from doing after,—and which, therefore, by unavoidable implication, she was to be entitled to do before the accounts were finally examined and passed by the accountant. The question, even in this its most limited form, necessarily arises,—What was it that the pursuer was to be excluded from after the final audit? And whatever this was, we are most clearly of opinion, that the trustor’s meaning was not to exclude the pursuer from it at the earlier stage,—that is to say, before the audit had closed all. In any view, it is impossible to separate the closing part of the proviso, viz., that the pursuer was ‘not to object to any article (in the accounts) for which they or he (the trustees) shall take credit, from the connecting words, ‘after the same has been examined and passed by the accountant.’ Now, we desire no more, to be satisfied, that the trustor’s true meaning and intention was,—that the pursuer MIGHT ‘object to any article in the accounts before the same had been examined and passed.’ Yet how could she possibly do so, if she was to be permitted to see neither the accounts nor vouchers, on which alone any objection could arise?

“Neither are we moved by a consideration which is repeatedly urged on the part of the trustees,—that it is open for the pursuer to apply to the accountant to see the accounts and vouchers in each year as these are laid before him,—and that it will be for him to allow the pursuer access to them, if he see cause. No doubt the pursuer might have applied to the accountant; yet we cannot hold that she was precluded from having her right, on this important and constantly recurring question, tried between her and the trustees by the action of declarator now before the Court. This has been the form sanctioned from time immemorial in our practice for judicially ascertaining the rights and obligations of trustees.

“We are of opinion that it was the more necessary to raise the present question, in this suit, as the accountant himself might have been misled as to his power and duties, by the pleas of these trustees. Thus, it seems to be argued by the defenders, that the accountant would have a discretionary power either to allow the pursuer inspection of these accounts and vouchers, or refuse it, as he saw fit, when the documents were laid before him; but we totally dissent from that doctrine. We consider that the accountant here is placed by the trustees substantially in the position of an arbiter, whom the trustees are allowed, by the exuberant confidence reposed in them by the truster, themselves to select for the audit of their accounts. Their proper opponent and contradicter in that investigation, is the party beneficially interested in the trust; and we hold that it is not competent for any arbiter to refuse to hear that party before giving his final decision—nor to withhold from him the accounts and vouchers which form the proper subject of the reference. Nay, we should hold ourselves bound judicially to presume something not far short of collusion between the accountant and the trustees who appointed him, if we found the latter insisting, and the former agreeing with them, that the accounts and vouchers submitted for his judgment were to be withheld from the very party whose interests were most materially to be affected by that judgment, and the judgment thus necessarily to be pronounced parte inaudita.

"No point is better fixed in the law of arbitration, even where the referee is named by the parties mutually, than that he must hear both before deciding; and the emphatic dictum of Lord Eldon has been often quoted, when, on an appeal from this Court, he set aside a decree-arbital, pronounced on a partial hearing:—'By the great principle of eternal justice,' said his Lordship, 'which was prior to all these Acts of Sederunt, regulations and proceedings of the Court, it was impossible that an award could stand, when the arbitrator heard one party, and refused to hear the other.'—Sharpe and Mackenzie v. Bickerdyke, 3 Dow, p. 107. This is a self-evident rule of justice and common sense, which it may now appear trite to refer to; but if it receives effect in all ordinary references, it is obviously still more the duty of an arbiter named on one side only, to exhibit the utmost caution in his proceedings, and to give the opposite party interested in the matter, the most full access to the whole accounts, vouchers, and productions made by the party who has named him, before finally passing his award. A decree or finding, therefore, to the effect asked by the pursuer in the present action, seems to be necessary, in consequence of the pleas maintained by the defenders, to guard the accountant from a fatal mistake in the execution of his duty, as to which the pleas and pretensions of those trustees might mislead him. His audit, in our view, would be null, but it would be exposing a party in moderate circumstances to a monstrous hardship, to compel her to resort to a process of reduction each year to set incompetent audits aside.

"The defenders have pleaded in justification, that a full copy of their accounts hitherto, has been furnished to the pursuer after the audit,—and that she has not averred that the charges are contrary to the powers of the trust, or in any respect objectionable. But in the first place, it does not seem to be denied that the accounts were furnished without the vouchers, which have been refused; and that of itself is sufficient to create a strong presumption against the accuracy and bona fides of the charges. An exhibition of accounts, with a denial of the vouchers necessary to check them, is substantially a refusal to account, in the only manner in which an accounting can be available taken at the hands of any party. And in the next place, the defenders, on their own showing, have deferred furnishing the pursuer with such accounts as they did send, until after the audit, when it was too late for her to get redress without ruinous proceedings at law. We cannot think that the truster intended this. He, to all appearance, meant that his heirs interested in the trust, as well as the trustees, should have an opportunity of appealing to the accountant, and of stating every objection to him which would be competent before any other referee. This is a very humble satisfaction, and it may be a very unavailing privilege to urge any objection before a judge chosen by the parties whose accounts are to be investigated; but it would be a downright mockery of every thing like accounting, if the trustees could withhold their accounts and vouchers from the heirs, till they were passed by the accountant—when he was of course functus,—and when the parties chiefly interested had no means (short of an appeal to a court of equity) of correcting any error, intentional or accidental, however clearly it might be established.

"The case has been too much treated on the part of the defenders, as if the demand of the pursuer was urged solely with a hostile view to them, and to involve them in a perpetual litigation and annoyance, from which it is assumed that it was the main object of the truster to exempt them. We see nothing on the face of the trust-deed or record to warrant these surmises. This was a trust constituted by a man for behoof of a young woman likely to be married—and of her issue at her death, and of his other relatives, in case of their failure. It is not to be presumed that the truster could anticipate that not merely his daughter, but her husband, and the curators for the infant children whom she might have, would all be disposed to act so vexatiously as to render it expedient to exclude them even from being heard before any respectable accountant, in the annual examination of the trust-accounts. These apprehensions we conceive to be quite extravagant in themselves, and unwarranted by the trust-deed. It is equally inadmissible to presume, that the parties interested in the trust would always be disposed to state groundless and captious objections: it is just as likely that parties taking an intelligent view of their own interest, would not provoke a discussion upon trifling objections, which would involve their own trust in unprofitable expense, but would confine themselves to errors or mistakes in the charges of the trustees, which the good sense and candour of the latter, aided by the opinion of the accountant, would enable them to correct in future.

"Finally, it is stated by the defenders that they accepted of this trust on the faith that their own interpretation of the trust-deed would be adopted, and that they 'would be protected from harassing interference on the part of the pursuer'; but it is thought that the settlement itself of the truster affords good ground for treating that as a pretence unworthy of regard. That deed proves that the whole trust-property, failing the single female and her issue, who are primarily called, is destined in favour of the major part of the trustees themselves and their families. They had the most direct interest, therefore, in its subsistence. Nay more,—with obvious and most important reference to the very question now under consideration, they had an interest—at the sacrifice of the first party, so to exercise their very broad powers of expenditure upon improvements, &c.,—as to make them anything but impartial and judicious managers for the pursuer. In such circumstances, it is monstrous, even were it within the strict letter of the deed, to see such parties straining to shut out every check at a proper period of their accounts and vouchers. When such parties, or indeed when any parties, allege that they undertook a trust on the faith that their accounts would not only be audited by an accountant of their own selection,—but that both accounts and vouchers, when under examination, should be carefully withheld from all the parties interested in the balance,—it is thought that such a profession cannot be received with too much jealousy and distrust in a court of justice.

"On these grounds, we are of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to insist on exhibition of the defenders' accounts, with the vouchers, before they are laid before the accountant for audit, and this for the purpose of making such audit really available for its proper end; it being plain that any audit, where the only party interested to object is kept blindfold, is a futile and empty form, affording no check on the one party, and no satisfaction to the other."

Lord Jeffrey:

"I concur entirely in the opinion of Lords Cuninghame and Ivory; except only that I think the pursuer is excluded, by the peculiar terms of this trust-deed, from what would otherwise have been her right, 'to inquire into, or interfere with,' the actual management of the trustees, as it proceeds; or otherwise than as it may be involved in the subsequent examination of their vouchers and accounts.

"Upon all the other points, and indeed on all the matters properly referred to us, I go completely along with these Judges; and bold—1st, that the pursuer is the proper adverse party to the trustees in the whole business of accounting; and (during her survivorship) the only party for whose benefit and protection a regular keeping and auditing of accounts is required of them: 2d, That the functions of the accountant, as defined in the trust-deed, are substantially those of an arbitrator between these adverse parties: 3d, That the whole provisions of that deed in favour of the trustees will be satisfied, and all the benefit thereby intended for them secured, by giving them, first, the uncontrolled management of the property; then the sole nomination of the arbitrator; and, finally, the right to exclude all challenge of his award, except upon such grounds as would be available against a common decret-arbitral—beyond question the most favoured and privileged of all documents known to our law: But, 4th, That it would be against justice, and contrary to all legal principle, to exempt it from such grounds of challenge; and that, under these, it would be per se sufficient to cut down and set aside any audit or award of the accountant, that it was proved or admitted to have been made up without fully hearing the party for whose exclusive benefit and protection it was enjoined."

Lord Meadowbank:

"The papers in this case were laid before me during the last session, but I was prevented, through indisposition, from giving at the time obedience to the interlocutor of the Lords of the First Division. I have since considered the pleadings, with the aid of the opinions of the other consulted Judges; and having been requested to furnish the parties with the result, I have now to state my entire concurrence in the views of Lords Jeffrey, Cuninghame and Ivory, and have little to add to their opinions."

"The pursuers being the parties beneficially interested in the estate would, except for the very unusual clause in the trust-deed, have been entitled to inquire into the management of the trustees, to examine into, and if necessary, to have quarrelled and impugned their accounts either before or after they had been passed by the accountant. But this right was partially excluded by the terms of the deed; and to this exclusion, in so far as it goes, we are no doubt bound to give effect; but assuredly not to extend it. Now, the deed expressly, and in terms, limits the prohibition of the pursuers' right to impugning after the accounts shall have been passed by the accountant. It is altogether silent as to what the pursuers might do antecedently; and I can discover no principle on which a court of equity could be justified in extending the prohibition in the manner proposed, by any inference or implication whatever."

"As there can be no doubt, however, that the pursuers would be entitled to set aside the award of the accountant upon the ground of fraud either on his part or of that of the trustees, it is but reasonable to presume that although the right of challenge of the management of the trustees and their accounts upon other grounds was excluded, the truster meant, by not excluding previous examination, to enable them to use that ground of challenge with effect, if necessary. But whether he had that in view or not, he did not in the terms employed expressly deprive the beneficiaries of that right of examination, and I can see no principle on which we can be authorised to supply them. All claims of this kind, which are contra communes regulas juris, are liable to receive the strictest interpretation; and if that rule is applied to the case under consideration, I cannot see how the claim of the pursuers can be resisted, and the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary adhered to."

The Court, in respect of the majority of the consulted opinions, adhered, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary.

Church—Quoad Sacra Ministers—Jurisdiction—Interdict—A Presbytery having resolved to serve one of their members with a libel—Interdict, prohibiting the Presbytery from proceeding in the matter, granted, on the ground that one of the alleged members was a quoad sacra minister.

The Presbytery of Stranraer having resolved to serve the Rev. David Wilson, minister of Stranraer, with a libel, that gentleman presented a note of suspension and interdict, in which, after alleging, inter alia, that the whole proceedings of the Presbytery "were vitiated by the participation in them of a quoad sacra minister," he prayed the Court to "prohibit, interdict and discharge the Presbytery, or any of its members, individually or presbyterially, from proceeding on, or taking cognisance of the pretended libel against him." Lord Cuninghame, Ordinary, ordered the note to be intimated and answered within fourteen days; "meantime sists execution, and grants the interdict till the case comes to be advised upon the note and answers."

No answers were lodged; and the note having come to be advised by Lord Ivory, his Lordship reported the cause, stating it as his opinion, that the interdict which, from the terms of Lord Cuninghame's interlocutor, must now be granted anew, if it was to be continued, ought to be refused.

Lord President.—From the terms of Lord Cuninghame's interlocutor, I believe Lord Ivory is correct in stating, that as the note has come to be advised, the interdict, if we approve of it, must now be granted anew; and I therefore think his Lordship has done right in reporting the cause. I am clear, however, that the interdict ought to be renewed. No answers have been lodged; and as it is alleged that there is a quoad sacra minister sitting within the body of this Presbytery, I cannot see any reason for taking a different course from that taken in the case of Stewarton, in which a similar interdict has been granted on the very same ground.

Lord Mackenzie.—Considering the former precedents, I do not see how we can be warranted in refusing the present interdict. While the question as to the right of the quoad sacra ministers is sub judice, it is properly a question of expediency, whether or not the interdict should be granted; and this resolves into the other question, whether greater evils will result from granting or from refusing it. Here the one party has appeared, and the other has not; and it would seem somewhat strange to decide in favour of the party who has refused to appear. In this way he might gain by absenting himself, when he would have lost by entering into fair discussion. In these circumstances, I cannot refuse to renew the interdict.

Lord Fullerton.—I feel obliged to differ from your Lordships, and agree with the Lord Ordinary who has reported the cause. In point of form, the question, as it now comes before us, is in the same situation as if the interdict had not been granted before; and we were now asked to grant it in the first instance. Now, it is of importance to observe, that the question of jurisdiction as to this very matter has been raised in another case, and has been deemed of so much importance that a hearing in presence has been ordered. Considering the great delicacy there is in granting interdict, when the question of jurisdiction is open, I am inclined to think, that in the present instance, if we are to proceed on grounds of expediency, there is more danger of mischief in granting than in refusing the interdict.

Lord Gillies absent.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor :

" The Lords, upon the report of Lord Ivory, Ordinary, and having heard counsel for the suspender, remit to his Lordship to pass the note of suspension, and continue the interdict."

FIRST DIVISION.—(H.B.)

No. 177.—MAJORITY OF PRESBYTERY OF STRATHBOGIE, Suspenders, v. MINORITY OF PRESBYTERY, Respondents.

Church—Jurisdiction—On the application of the majority of a Presbytery deposed by the General Assembly, but reponed by the Court of Session—Interdict granted to prohibit the members chosen by the minority of the Presbytery from sitting in the General Assembly.

The majority of the Presbytery of Strathbogie having elected one set of members, and the minority another, to sit in the General Assembly, the majority presented a note of suspension and interdict, supplementary to that formerly granted in their favour, praying the Court to interdict those of the minority from taking their seats.

Lord Ivory, as Ordinary, reported the cause, and gave it as his opinion, that the interdict prayed for went farther than any previous one, and ought not to be granted.

Lord President.—I did not sit here when the original interdict was granted; but I have no hesitation in saying, that unless we are to stultify ourselves, we must grant this interdict.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. The interdict now asked is merely a corollary from that formerly granted.

Lord Fullerton.—It appears to me that this is the most important interdict which has yet been applied for, and that we are no more entitled to grant it, than we would be to interdict a member of the House of Commons from taking his seat in that assembly. Can any thing be a matter more purely ecclesiastical than the right of the General Assembly to determine who are to have seats in it? If, in consequence of improper individuals being permitted to sit, civil interests come to be affected, we may then interfere. But here the only question is, which of a certain number of individuals are to be entitled to sit? I am afraid we are getting step by step into difficulties, which strikingly illustrate the danger of our once going beyond our jurisdiction. The present appears to me a question of the greatest constitutional importance; and I think, before deciding it, it would be well to consult the other Judges.

Lord Gillies absent.

The Court remitted to the Lord Ordinary to grant the interdict.

Lord Ordinary, Ivory.—Act. Pyper; A. Peterkin, S.S.C., Agent.—[H.B.]

27th May 1842.

No. 178.—THE EARL OF BUCHAN, Petitioner, v. LADY CARDROSS, Respondent.

Process—Nobile Officium—Bill-Chamber—Competency—A petition for the removal of children from a mother's custody, on the ground of misconduct, accompanied with an allegation that she intended to remove them beyond the jurisdiction of the Court, having been presented during vacation to the Lord Ordinary on the bills—Held competent for his Lordship to entertain the petition, so far as to interdict the removal of the children, and after it had taken place, to grant warrant for bringing them back.

The Earl of Buchan, during vacation, presented a petition to Lord Cuninghame, Ordinary on the bills, in which, complaining that his daughter-in-law, Lady Cardross, had been guilty of misconduct, which rendered it necessary that his grandchildren (the children of her ladyship to the late Lord Cardross) should be removed from her charge, and that he had reason to suspect she was preparing to remove with them from Scotland, he prayed his Lordship to direct

" that the said children shall remain under the care and custody of the petitioner until the farther orders of Court; or to place them under the interim care and custody of such other person or persons as your Lordship may think proper to appoint; and, in the meantime, to prohibit and interdict the said Jane Torry or Erskine (Lady Cardross), and all others, from withdrawing or attempting to withdraw the said children from Scotland, or from the jurisdiction of this Court."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor :

" 8th April 1842.—The Lord Ordinary officiating on the bills, appoints this petition to be served on Lady Cardross, and answers lodged thereto within six days after service, both as to the competency of the present application, in point of form, and as to the merits; and, in the meantime, grants the interdict as craved, till the petition and answers are advised.

" Note.—When the answers are lodged, the parties will probably, in a case of this importance, apply to be heard by counsel. Inquiry may be made as to the form of application adopted in the somewhat analogous case of Borthwick, which occurred during one of the vacations of the Court last year, or in the year preceding."

The day on which this petition was served, Lady Cardross carried off the children from Scotland, and took up her residence with her father in London. Thereupon the Earl of Buchan presented a second complaint, setting forth the breach of interdict thus committed, and praying the Lord Ordinary to grant warrant to officers of the law to take possession of the children, wherever found, and deliver them to the petitioner, or the interim custody of any other person whom his Lordship might approve.

Lord Cardross had left a deed of nomination, in which he appointed, along with Lady Cardross as sine qua non, and his father the petitioner, Messrs William Home, W.S., and Archibald Gibson, accountant, to be tutors and curators to his children. The Lord Ordinary ordered the papers to be communicated to these two gentlemen, who gave in a statement disclaiming all knowledge of, and concurrence in, Lady Cardross's proceedings.

In the answers which had been given in to the original petition, Lady Cardross, besides denying the allegations of misconduct, pleaded specially, that the petition was altogether incompetent, inasmuch as the Court only, and not the Lord Ordinary on the bills, had power to entertain and grant its prayer.

The Lord Ordinary having delayed the case for some time, with the consent of parties, in the hope the children might be brought back under an extrajudicial arrangement, at length pronounced the following interlocutor :

" 4th May 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having considered this petition, answers, and documents produced, and heard counsel thereon, in respect of the objection stated to the competency of the petition, as addressed to the Lord Ordinary on the bills, makes avizandum with the case to the First Division of the Court, and appoints the petition and answers, and statement of the tutors, to be printed and boxed quam primum, that the question may be reported.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary has taken this case to report, as involving a question relative to the powers of the Judges officiating in the Bill-Chamber in vacation, which it is of great importance to the community to have authoritatively settled. This course also is the more appropriate, as the cause on its proper merits is one which can only be conducted before the Inner-House, if it is brought into Court during session.

"Lord Cardross, the eldest son of the Earl of Buchan, died in 1836, leaving his widow, Lady Cardross, and a son and two daughters in infancy. The eldest child, a daughter, was then only about four years of age, and the boy was not more than two years old, so that he is at present only about seven years old. The father left a deed of nomination, whereby he appointed his wife Lady Cardross, his father the Earl of Buchan, and Messrs William Home, W.S., and Archibald Gibson, accountant in Edinburgh, to be tutors and curators to his children, her ladyship being declared a sine qua non.

"The present petition, addressed to the Lord Ordinary on the bills, was given in early in vacation (8th April 1842) by the Earl of Buchan. It set forth various gross improprieties in the conduct of Lady Cardross, which, if true, unfitted her for the guardianship of these children. It was stated that a petition for the removal of these children from her house had actually been prepared in name of the tutors, and boxed to the Court, towards the close of last session, but that it was withdrawn by one of the tutors, in the expectation that she would give up the infants without judicial proceedings, and that she had failed to do so; that the children were thus exposed to great hazard of contamination, from being kept under the charge of so unworthy a parent; and as there was a strong suspicion that she had some intention of carrying them abroad beyond the jurisdiction of this Court, the noble petitioner prayed the Lord Ordinary to grant an immediate warrant to take the children out of the custody of her ladyship, and to place them under the interim care and custody of a suitable person until further orders of Court. The petition, moreover, prayed for an interim and immediate interdict against the respondent removing the children from the jurisdiction of this Court pending the discussion.

"Assuming the allegation in the petition to be correct, the Lord Ordinary was disposed to think that it was competent for the Judge in the Bill-Chamber, agreeably to the more recent practice in analogous cases, to entertain it, as an emerging case of urgency and necessity in a class of cases in which this Court has peculiar and exclusive jurisdiction. But without prejudging any point of the case, the Lord Ordinary appointed the petition to be served, and answers lodged, within six days after service, both as to the competency of the present application in point of form and as to the merits; and as it was obvious, that whatever might be the result of the ultimate consideration of the case, it was indispensably necessary to take every judicial precaution to prevent the children from being carried out of the jurisdiction of the Court in the mean time. The Lord Ordinary accompanied his deliverance with an interdict in the following terms:—'And in the mean time grants the interdict as craved, till the petition and answers are advised.'

"The preceding interlocutor and interdict were served on Lady Cardross on Saturday the 9th of April, as instructed by the execution of a messenger produced; but instead of giving effect thereto, it appears that Lady Cardross, on the evening of that very day, made her escape from Scotland with the children, and it has since been discovered that she has carried them to the house of her father in London. This unwarrantable step on the part of the respondent was immediately made the subject of a second and incidental complaint at the instance of the Earl of Buchan, setting forth the contempt of Court, and breach of interdict, and praying the Lord Ordinary to grant warrant to officers of the law to take possession of the infants wherever they could be found, and to deliver them to the petitioner, or to any other person who might be appointed by the Court to take interim charge of them, agreeably to the precedents in the case of Robb, M'Intosh and others, in which warrants to the preceding effect were granted by the Court.

"Although Lady Cardross had left the country, answers were lodged in her name to both of the applications, to which of course the attention of the Court will be particularly directed. When these papers were first sent to avizandum, the Lord Ordinary directed them to be communicated to the other tutors, and appointed them to state, under their hand, if the children had been carried off with their knowledge or concurrence, or if they knew where they were. They gave in a statement disclaiming all knowledge of, and concurrence in Lady Cardross's proceedings, and stating that they did not know where the children were, which, if possible, aggravates her ladyship's misdemeanour in carrying off these pupils in violation of the interdict. Nevertheless, the Lord Ordinary was averse to proceed to extremities against the respondent, if there was any reasonable prospect of her being brought to see the impropriety of her conduct, by a moderate delay. He therefore had sundry conferences with the learned and respectable counsel who act for both parties, and at the request of her ladyship's counsel, and with consent of the Earl of Buchan's counsel, he delayed the case from week to week, in hopes that the children would be brought back and placed at the disposal of the Court. It afterwards turned out, however, that Lady Cardross was not to be persuaded so to act.

"In these circumstances, the Lord Ordinary had no alternative but to proceed to advise the cases. With regard to the first petition, founded on the specific charges against Lady Cardross therein narrated, it must first be determined whether the preliminary objection taken to the competency of such an application to the Lord Ordinary on the bills in vacation (though only intended for the interim protection and safety of the infants till the Court meets), be maintainable? From the great importance of that question, if it should be thought subject to any serious doubt, it is proper that it should be settled as soon as possible by the judgment of the Court; and, therefore, the Lord Ordinary has taken it to report by the prefixed interlocutor.

"On the incidental petition, which is in substance a complaint not merely for breach of interdict, but for a grave offence in reference to infants peculiarly under the protection of the Court, the Lord Ordinary could not hesitate as to the course he was bound to take. On the same date with the preceding interlocutor (4th May), he granted a warrant of search to all officers of the law to discover and bring back the children to the jurisdiction of this Court; and he gave the usual recommendation to magistrates in England and abroad to give their aid, if necessary, to carry that warrant into effect. On the part of Lady Cardross a reclaiming note was lodged against that warrant; but the Lord Ordinary holding that a party might as well hang up a process-caption, or a search-warrant for documents abstracted from process or for stolen goods, as the warrant now granted; and therefore, when it was judicially stated in a note (on 9th May) that the children had been discovered in London, the Lord Ordinary renewed the warrant, and added a note, recommending strongly to the magistrates in England to indorse it, as authorised by the Act 54 Geo. III. cap. 186. That question will of course be reviewed by the Court in considering the reclaiming note lodged by Lady Cardross against the warrant.

"In the original application which gave rise to these proceedings, and which is now reported to the Court, the chief and prejudicial question to be determined at present is, whether such an application for the protection of the infants ad interim, and till the meeting of the Court, was competent in the Bill-Chamber? With deference, had it been necessary for the Lord Ordinary to give his own decision on this objection, he would have held that the objection to the competency is not well founded.

"It is not known whether any case precisely in point has occurred before in the Bill-Chamber; and it is not very easy to trace the practice of this office at a remote period, as, from the very short and temporary nature of the jurisdiction, few points contested in it seem to have been thought worth reporting. But in later times, it has been uniformly understood, that in all cases of urgent emergency in which this Court, as the Supreme Court of Equity in Scotland, would be bound to provide an extraordinary remedy, if the case occurred during session, the Lord Ordinary is entitled and required to authorise a similar remedy during vacation, so as to protect parties, and provide against mischief, till the sitting down of the Court.

"This is very distinctly explained by Mr Beveridge in his Forms of Process, Vol. I. p. 228-29; in which, after observing that this Court has, almost since the very date of its institution in 1532, possessed the power of providing for the surcease of justice in the inferior judicatories, he proceeds to state, that the 'Lord Ordinary on the bills, as possessing the delegated powers of the Court in time of vacation, grants similar commissions ad interim.' He then gives the cases of an interim Judge-Admiral named by Lord Meadowbank officiating on the bills in 1810; of an interim Sheriff-depute named by another Lord Ordinary in the same year, and of an interim Commissary-Clerk named by Lord Alloway in 1814. During this very vacation the present Lord Ordinary named an interim keeper of the register of entails in the room of the late Mr Ferguson.

"On the same principle, when the property of infants or lunatics is exposed to immediate loss or dilapidation during vacation, the Lord Ordinary on the bills may appoint a factor loco tutoris to act till the Court meets. There are several recent instances of this on record.—See, in particular, the case of Ellis, in December 1836; 15 Shaw, 236;—and of Mrs Elizabeth Allan, 16th May 1838; 16 Shaw, p. 1008.

"If, however, the Lord Ordinary on the bills can make an interim appointment to secure the property of infants, and other unprotected parties, it is thought that he must, a fortiori, be entitled and bound to protect their persons from injury or abduction, and direct them to be placed in safe custody, if the guardians with whom they are placed turn out to be grossly unfit for the charge. The Lord Ordinary gives no opinion on the truth of the charges against the respondent, as there has been as yet no opportunity for any proof with respect to them. But in order to test the competency of the application, the facts set forth in its narrative must be assumed; and if these shall be substantiated, it is thought that the infants should not be allowed to remain one day longer under the roof of the respondent.

"In the meantime, the unhappy step which she has taken, of flying from the country with the children, without the consent or knowledge of the other tutors, is of itself a high delinquency, and such a proceeding, in a well-known case, formed the chief ground for removing a tutor altogether from his office. See the case of Robb, (Fac. Coll., 14th November 1817.) In every view, the respondent, by withdrawing from the country, has forfeited all title to that strong presumption of innocence extended in general to accused parties, and deprive her of all right to the custody of these children pending the discussion, when she has shown that she can, with so little scruple, set the authority of the law at defiance.

"With regard to the title of the noble petitioner, it would obviously be premature to enter on this till the jurisdiction of the Lord Ordinary is ascertained. He may add, however, that if it be found that the Judge in the Bill-Chamber has jurisdiction, he conceives that Lord Buchan has a good title to insist in the present application. Indeed, it is supposed that, in a case of this sort, the Court will readily listen to a complaint at the instance of any relative of the pupils, to induce them to do what is manifestly necessary for the benefit and relief of the children. No doubt a complaint at the instance of the other tutors would also have been sustained,—but if they decline or delay to do what is necessary to reclaim the infants, from any doubt as to their power to act, without the co-tutor, who is a sine qua non, or from any peculiar views as to their duty, under the circumstances admitted in their own statement, the grandfather is the more called upon to interfere to have the pupils placed immediately with a respectable person qualified to take charge of them."

Of the same date with the above interlocutor, the Lord Ordinary granted warrant, as craved, in the second petition.

Against this warrant the respondent lodged a reclaiming note, which being advised with the interlocutor making avizandum, the Court resolved to consult with the Judges of the Second Division.

Thereafter, the cause being again advised,

Lord President.—Agreeably to our resolution, we have consulted with the Judges of the other Division, who agree with us in thinking, that under the extraordinary circumstances, the petition to the Lord Ordinary on the bills was not incompetent, and that the proper form of proceeding was by petition, and not by suspension and interdict.

SCOTTISH JURIST.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am clear as to the competency of the proceedings. The general power of the Court, in cases of this nature, is not disputed; and in vacation, the Lord Ordinary on the bills has undoubtedly power to give any order that may be necessary to keep matters entire for the final disposal of the Court. Here nothing more was asked, or has been done. The respondent's counsel argues, that all which the Lord Ordinary could do, was to order matters to be restored to the state in which they were before, and that this would have been accomplished by ordering the children to be brought to Scotland, but still leaving them in the custody of the mother as before. I cannot think so. The object was to put them in safe custody; but how can it be said that they would have been in safe custody, if left with a party who had shown such a lawless inclination as to run away with them in direct defiance of the authority of the Court?

Lord Fullerton.—I am of the same opinion. There is a delegation of power to the Lord Ordinary on the bills entitling him to take any step that may be necessary to keep matters entire till the Court have an opportunity to decide. The petition is clearly put on this ground, and I see no reason to doubt of its competency.

The Court adhered.

Lord Ordinary, Cuninghame.—Act. Rutherford, Moir; C. H. Miller, W.S., Agent.—Alt. G. Bell; T. S. Fairley, W.S., Agent.—B. Clerk.—[H.B.]

27th May 1842.

No. 179.—WILLIAM LANDELL, Pursuer, v. WILLIAM PURVES, Defender.

Process.—Relevancy.—Agent and Client.—A summons at the instance of a client, to render a law-agent liable for certain law expenses and damages arising out of the use of a border warrant, which had been obtained, as alleged, on the proper usual employment of the agent, and which the Court found to be illegal, held relevant, though not averring ignorance, or want of professional skill, or gross neglect in the proceedings.

Landell having employed the defender in regard to a debt alleged to be due to him by a Mrs Brodie or Landell, who was resident generally at Berwick-on-Tweed, but at the time of the employment, was living at the village of Ayton, in Berwickshire, raised a summons, which averred that the pursuer being desirous of obtaining a settlement of the debt through the Courts in Scotland, applied to Purves,

"in order that the latter, as his professional agent, might advise, and might adopt what legal measures were necessary for making the said Mrs Margaret Brodie or Landell amenable to the Scotch Courts: That the said William Purves accordingly advised the pursuer to apply for a border warrant to apprehend the person of the said Mrs Margaret Brodie or Landell, until she should find sufficient caution acted in the Sheriff-court books of Berwickshire, that the debt due to the pursuer should be made forthcoming as accords, and a domicile appointed within the said county of Berwick at which she might be cited, and that as well de judicio sicuti as judicatum solvi: That the said William Purves represented to the pursuer that this mode of procedure was proper and legal, and the said William Purves being a regular licensed agent or procurator before the Sheriff-court of that county, the pursuer relied, and was entitled to rely on the accuracy and correctness of these representations: That the said William Purves accordingly, as the professional agent and adviser of the pursuer, with the view of obtaining said warrant, did lodge with James Bell, Esq., Sheriff-clerk of Berwickshire (the official person with whom applications of this kind, in the county of Berwick, fall to be lodged), the information to be produced in the course of the process to follow hereon, relative to the debt due to him by the said Mrs Margaret Brodie or Landell, and that nearly in the terms above narrated; and in addition to said information, the pursuer, at the desire of the said William Purves, emitted an oath in presence of the said James Bell, to the following effect:—Dunse, 6th July 1836.—The before-designed William Landell being solemnly sworn and examined, depones, That what is contained on this and the preceding pages, is a just and true statement: That no part of the sums therein mentioned has been paid. All which is truth, as he shall answer to God.' (Signed) 'W. LANDELL.—JAMES BELL.' That the pursuer himself was ignorant of the correct mode of legal procedure in cases of this kind; but the said William Purves obtained a warrant in favour of the pursuer from, and signed by the said James Bell in the following terms:—'These are granting warrant to messengers-at-arms, Sheriff-officers and their assistants, to pass, search for, seek, take, apprehend, and arrest the person, goods and gear of Mrs Margaret Brodie or Landell, of the burgh of Berwick-upon-Tweed, widow of the deceased Mark Landell in Coldingham Hill, and incarcerate her in the jail of Greenlaw, at the instance of the said William Landell, tenant in Swinton Greenriggs, in the county of Berwick, whose claim or demand upon the said Mrs Margaret Brodie or Landell is £720 Sterling, and also £360 Sterling, subject to the liferent of the said £360 Sterling to the said Mrs Margaret Brodie or Landell, during all the days of her life, therein to remain aye and until she shall find sufficient caution acted in the Sheriff-court books of Berwickshire that the same shall be made forthcoming as accords, and appoints a domicile within the said county of Berwick, at which she may be cited, and that as well de judicio sicut as judicatum solvi. Given at Greenlaw, the sixth day of July eighteen hundred and thirty-six years.' (Signed) 'JAMES BELL.'

The summons then stated that the pursuer, by the directions of Purves, paid the fees for this warrant, which was thereafter executed by an officer in the employment of the defender, and that, in consequence, Mrs Landell was incarcerated in the jail of Greenlaw, from which she had been liberated on bond granted by a party for her appearance in Court to answer any action, and likewise for payment of the debt,—all of which proceedings, it was alleged, the said defender conducted. An action, it was stated, was then raised in this Court by the pursuer against the debtor, who pleaded as a preliminary defence, that neither being domiciled in Scotland, nor having any property or effects in it, she was not within the jurisdiction of the Court of Session, and that the irregular and illegal proceedings which were adopted to force her within the jurisdiction of the Scotch courts, were altogether ineffectual for that purpose.

The summons then proceeded to set forth, that copies of the defences were delivered to the defender, who,

"as agent foresaid, during the dependence of the said action, applied to the said James Bell and others for information as to the practice of granting border warrants, and in general for all information necessary for conducting the said process at the instance of the pursuer, which the said William Purves transmitted to the pursuer's Edinburgh agents; and the said William Purves was thus fully aware of the said process, and of the pleas maintained by the said Mrs Margaret Brodie or Landell."

The result of the case was then set forth, which was, that the Second Division of the Court, 28th January 1838 (ante, Vol. X. p. 231), on the report of Lord Jeffrey, dismissed the action; and it was stated that this judgment, and the Lord Ordinary's opinion against "the gross irregularity and nullity" of the warrant, was at the time communicated to the defender.

It was then set forth that Mrs Landell brought an action against the pursuer, and also against the Sheriff-clerk, to recover damages for wrongous imprisonment, in which she succeeded in obtaining a verdict of £500 damages against the former, and £300 damages as against the latter;—the expenses connected with these proceedings, and also the damages, had all, it was subsumed, been incurred in consequence of the illegal warrant, and the defender was hence liable to him in relief. The summons then contained the necessary conclusions for payment and relief.

The defender pleaded that the action was not relevantly laid. The plea was as follows:—Because, even on the supposition that the pursuer's statement was in all respects correct, the summons does not set forth any facts relevant to subject the defender in liability in terms of its conclusions. It is not alleged that he exhibited gross ignorance and want of professional skill, or that he was guilty of gross neglect in the conduct of the judicial proceedings adopted by the pursuer against Mrs Landell, or that he violated any law or regulation of the Court before which he is said to have acted in the matter as the pursuer's professional agent. The summons contains no such allegations. On the contrary, the damage of which the pursuer seeks reparation and relief resulted from no act over which the agent had any control, but from an inveterate practice of the Court before which he was a licensed practitioner being, in the matter of border warrants, found to be illegal. The duty of the agent would, in such a case, be to lodge the 'information for the warrant,' while its validity or legal effect would rest with those by whom, according to the practice of the Court, the warrant was issued.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"19th March 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the process, sustains the defence of irrelevancy, and assoiliizes the defender, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses; appoints an account thereof to be lodged, and remitted to the auditor to tax and report.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary sent this case to the Issue Chamber, because he thought that any unavoidable question of law that might arise would be disposed of most satisfactorily at a trial. But it having been brought back without an issue, and both parties preferring to have the relevancy settled now, he gives his judgment on it.

"If all the matter in the condescendence and answers, and still more in the defences, could be competently taken into view, a trial of the facts could not be avoided; but, correctly speaking, the sole point is, does the summons present a relevant case for the relief sought?

"The Lord Ordinary thinks it does not, and this simply because it neither sets forth negligence nor ignorance, nor any other ground for making a law-agent responsible to his employer for a legal error. The responsibility of one party to another party is a different affair, and depends on different principles; but all that an employer has a right to expect from his agent is due skill and care. This principle was distinctly recognised in the two important and well-considered recent cases of Rowand and of Lang, particularly in the House of Lords, where it was laid down that a solicitor is not answerable for every mistake in point of law, when he does not take it upon himself to 'depart from the ordinary and beaten course.' Not only is nothing of the kind alleged here, but at the bar every thing of the kind was expressly disclaimed, and the action was maintained merely on the fact that the warrant, said in the summons to have been recommended, obtained and executed by the defender, has been found to be 'illegal and irregular.' So it has. But its having been so is not, of itself, inconsistent with the defender's having the best possible reason for believing that it was regular and lawful. Now the pursuer does not say that the defender acted unskillfully or negligently. He says the reverse. In this situation, though it be hard on the pursuer to have to pay such a sum to the party he was the cause of injuring, it would be much harder that this misfortune should be laid on the agent from whom he purchased nothing but adequate skill and care, both of which he does not deny that he had.

"The pursuer endeavoured to distinguish the case of an infringement of personal liberty by a warrant, from other cases. In so far as the agent's responsibility is concerned, the Lord Ordinary sees no ground for any such distinction. Can an agent be required to do more, even in cases of warrants and of personal liberty, than to give his client due intelligence and due caution?"

The pursuer having reclaimed, the Court, at advising, pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Alter the interlocutor complained of; find the summons relevant, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed further in the cause, reserving all questions of expenses."

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 180.—REV. ALEXANDER CUMMING and OTHERS (Hector Swanson's Trustees), and WILLIAM SWANSON, Pursuers, v. WILLIAM WILLIAMSON, Defender.

Landlord and Tenant—Rent, Consignation of—Process—Circumstances in which, after defences were lodged, but before the record was closed, consignation was ordered, to a modified amount, of arrears of rent alleged to be due.

The Rev. Alexander Cumming and others (Hector Swanson's trustees), and William Swanson, pro indiviso proprietors of the lands of Leithhead and others, brought an action against William Williamson, the tenant in the lands, in which, on the statement that the rent was £70 per annum; that of this rent no more had been received, during the four years from Martinmas 1836 to Martinmas 1840, than £55. 12. 10.; and that the lands were impoverished and injured by improper cultivation,—they concluded for payment of the sum of £280, with interest, under deduction of the partial payments, and also of the sum of £300, more or less, as compensation for the loss and damage sustained through improper cultivation.

The defender stated in his defences, that he had signed a missive of lease agreeing to pay £70 of rent, but that the proprietors had engaged to repair the mansion-house and other buildings, and the fences upon the farm; and though he had repeatedly called upon them to fulfil this part of their engagement, they had failed so to do. The loss thus sustained by him annually was not less than £30; and William Swanson, one of the pro indiviso proprietors, was so conscious of this, that he had offered to make a deduction of £20 for each of the four years on which arrears were said to be due, making a deduction in all of £80. The defender altogether denied the allegation of improper management. After the defences were lodged, but before the record was closed, the pursuers moved for consignation of the rents sued for; and the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor ordering consignation to the amount of £144. 7. 2., being at the rate of £50 for each year in arrear, under deduction of the partial payments.

The defender reclaimed, and pleaded—That as the record was not closed, and the leading averments of the pursuers were denied, the order for consignation was incompetent, or, if not altogether incompetent, ought, in the circumstances, to be restricted to a much smaller sum.

At advising,

Lord President.—The novelty here is, that consignation is ordered, when nothing more has been done than to lodge defences. I am not prepared to say that this may not be done in circumstances where great delay has taken place. Here nearly four years' rent are due, and action has been brought for £280, under deduction for a partial payment, reducing it to about £230. The defender's answer is, that the proprietors have not fulfilled their part in the contract, and that, in the circumstances, consignation is incompetent. I cannot see the least incompetency; but the only question which occurs to me is, whether the amount of the sum ordered should not be diminished?

Lord Mackenzie.—I admit that there is no absolute rule as to consignation before the record is closed. Indeed the Judicature Act does not allow any absolute rule. When there is an admission in the defences that a sum is due, there can be no objection to an order for consignation; and the only question is, if the Lord Ordinary has correctly interpreted the statement in the defences as amounting to a substantial admission.

Lord Fullerton.—In that part of the defences where the defender estimates his annual loss at £30, there is something very like an admission that the lands are worth £40.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ordering consignation, but restrict the sum to be assigned to £100 Sterling, and allow fourteen days from this date for compliance with the order of consignation; of new decern for the expense of extract, if necessary."

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 181.—MESSRS HALDANE and ABBOT, Pursuers and Advocators, v. ALEXANDER FRASER, and ANGUS GRAY, his Trustee, Defenders and Respondents.

Agreement—Construction—Jury Cause—In regard to a written agreement, by which a party was bound to supply certain commission-agents "with one puncheon of whisky per week," "the same to be delivered free at D., in puncheons, hogsheads and half-hogsheads: it being understood that not more than one half-hogshead per week shall be required"—Held that the true construction was, that the obligant was bound to deliver the whisky at the rate of one puncheon per week.

Excise Laws—5 Geo. IV. c. 74; 5 and 6 Gul. IV. c. 63—Agreement—Where a party agreed to supply another with one puncheon of whisky per week, the same to be delivered in puncheons, hogsheads, and half-hogsheads, and it was pleaded, that the agreement was null under the Excise laws, in respect the agreement should have been made by the imperial gallon, or by some multiple or aliquot part thereof—Held that the plea was not applicable.

The respondent addressed the following letter to the advocates:

"Dundee, 25th Dec. 1835.

"Messrs HALDANE & ABBOT.

"Gentlemen—I hereby agree to supply you from our distillery, Pitcarmick, with one puncheon whisky per week, until the 10th October 1836, commencing at the 8th of January 1836. The same to be delivered free at Dundee, in puncheons, bbls., and half-bbls.: it being understood that not more than one half-bbl. per week shall be required, price 7s. 6d. per gallon."

(Signed) "ALEX. FRASER."

"The amount from time to time to be drawn for at from 10 to 12 days from date of sending out."

(Signed) "A. FRASER."

The respondent thereafter delivered a supply of whisky to the advocates, according to the quantities specified in orders transmitted by them to the respondent, amounting to about 1353 gallons, between 18th January 1836 and 21st June thereafter; and the same was settled for by drafts on the advocates. This aqua was sent by the respondent to the dealers who were indicated in the orders of the advocates.

Thereafter the advocates raised a summons in the Sheriff-court of Perth against the respondent, averring that the respondent had failed to implement the bargain, in respect the proper quantity of whisky had not been sent weekly as agreed on; that twenty-eight puncheons were undelivered; and therefore concluding for damages for the non-implementation.

In defence, the respondent stated that the fault lay with the advocates, who, as commission-agents, having no spirit-license, ought to have continued sending instructions to the respondent as to the quantity required, and in regard to the parties to whom it was to be delivered by the respondent; but as they had failed in this, there was no ground for damages. The more especially were these orders necessary, as the advocates had no spirit-licenses themselves; and it was essential to the respondent to know, by a specific order, the quantity wanted, and the party to whom it was to be addressed, with the view of taking out the proper permit to allow the goods to be taken into the dealer's stock. As these orders had never arrived, he concluded that the advocates were not desirous for a further supply, and pleaded—1. That by the laws of Excise, and the usage of trade, the pursuers were bound, in order to enable the defender to perform his part of the agreement libelled, to furnish him with regular orders for each quantity of spirits, specifying the name of the person to whom they were to be transmitted: 2. That having failed to do so, the defender was not bound, or indeed entitled to transmit the spirits; and the pursuers having delayed for a length of time to send him any such orders, the defender was entitled to conclude that they did not mean to abide by the agreement libelled, and was accordingly entitled otherwise to dispose of the produce of his distillery: 3. That the pursuers are not now entitled, after such negligence and breach of obligation on their part, to insist on performance from the defender, or to claim damages from him for non-performance.

After a record had been made up, and a proof hinc inde led, the respondent put on record the following plea:—1. The contract libelled on did not afford any competent or relevant ground of action, the same not having been made by the imperial gallon, or by any multiple or aliquot part thereof, and being therefore null and void under the Acts 5 Geo. IV. c. 74, and 5 and 6 William IV. c. 63.

The advocates pleaded—That a party agreeing to supply another with a specified commodity, is bound either to give delivery, or pay the damage occasioned by his non-fulfilment of the agreement, and the buyer is entitled to insist for either alternative.

The Sheriff-substitute pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Perth, 28th August 1840.—Having advised the process, repels the plea of the defender, urged now for the first time on the Statutes providing for uniformity in weights and measures, but finds that the missive libelled on is not sufficient to support an action of damages founded on non-implementation of the contract therein expressed, in respect that the terms thereof are not sufficiently clear and consistent, as to the extent of the obligation thereby imposed on the defender, Fraser, and finds that the nature of the transactions following on the said missive do not sufficiently explain the meaning thereof, or support the pursuers' claim under the same; therefore acquiesces the said defender from the conclusion of the action; finds the pursuers liable in expenses, of which allows an account to be lodged, and taxed, and decerns. (Signed) "HUGH BARCLAY."

"Note.—Perhaps, under the Act of Sederunt applicable to inferior courts, the defenders are not excluded from their plea in law founded on the Statutes as to weights and measures, only they behoved to have been subjected to costs for the delay in stating their plea; but the plea appears bad. The Statutes are intended to abolish local standards. The first Statute in date, allowed sales by local denomination where the rate of conversion was stated. The latest Statute wisely took away this liberty, and required that contracts be made according to imperial standard, and by no other. But there is a provision not previously so essential, exempting sales by any vessel 'not represented as containing any amount of imperial measure, or of any fixed local or customary measure.' In this way, it is thought that not merely sales by the slump where the article is seen, but sales by the slump, such as a cart load, a ship load, a puncheon or barrel, are good sales, where the price is either fixed by the slump, or as (in the present case) by the number of imperial measures the vessel may be found to contain. There no doubt may exist questions as to what such vessels should contain, when the price is not otherwise fixed, but as such vessels appear not to fall under the denomination of local weights or measures, it is not thought that the Statutes can be held to reach them.

"The contract is one very peculiar, and may be held as one of sale. But it is clearly liable to the obvious ambiguity, or rather contradiction, as to whether the obligation on the defender was to furnish one puncheon or one half-hoghead in each week. It is very clear that the defender was not, statedly each week, and within its number of days, to furnish any precise quantity. The specification of the different vessels, and consequent quantities in which it was to be furnished, proves this on the face of the missive, and the practice of the parties following on that missive, confirms this meaning. Had the defender, without demand, furnished each week a certain quantity, which the pursuers as regularly received without complaint on either side, this would have afforded the best interpretation of the contract. The defender, however, appears never to have sent whisky unless ordered, and that at times and in quantities varying so much as to prove that there were no fixed terms of agreement as to time and quantity. The meaning, therefore, appears to have been, that the defender should furnish the supplies when demanded, not to exceed a certain rate in the week, or per week, as it is expressed. Then arises the question, what is that rate? There are two rates stated, one four times the quantity comprehended by the other. The pursuers have an explanation of this; but it is not permissible to go out of the contract to get it explained, the more especially that the explanation attempted by them was matter of easy expression, when they had the framing of the contract. The defender for some time continued to implement the pursuers' orders, until they gave them to be fulfilled in a mode not recognised by the missive, and not according to all previous practice following thereon. The pursuers state, that such was part of the original agreement; but if it were, it ought to have been in the missive, which must be held to comprehend the whole terms of bargain. It is not very clear, whether the defender could, consistently with the revenue laws, do what was required of him; but suppose he could, it does not appear, under the missive, he was bound to comply with a demand so couched. Supposing that all the difficulties were cleared away, and that under the missive the pursuers were held entitled to have had delivery in any way they choosed to ask it, and at any periods, and in any quantities not exceeding the rate of one puncheon in the week, there still is much in the defender's argument as to the recovery of damage for the non-delivery of the quantity necessary to complete the aggregate at that rate. The proof rather goes to show an interest in the defender to have implemented the contract if asked, according to the terms as construed by him. There is, on the one hand, no proof of direct damage sustained by the pursuers, through their inability to supply their customers, by reason of the defender's failure to implement his part of the contract; and, on the other hand, there is no proof that the defender did, or could make profit by his violation of the pursuers' contract. Even admitting the pursuers' right to consequential damage arising from loss of profit, it would not be very easy to determine the scale by which the amount was to be ascertained; and the pursuers' estimate, in every point of view, is far above what the proof would warrant."

The Sheriff having adhered to this interlocutor, Messrs Haldane and Abbot presented a note of advocacy on caution.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"1st February 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the process, advocates the cause, recalls the interlocutors complained of, repels the defences founded on the Statutes for promoting uniformity in weights and measures, and also the defence founded on the alleged obscurity of the agreement: Finds that the proof already led is not sufficient to enable the Court to dispose either of the claim for damages, or of their amount, if any be due; therefore, remits the cause to the issue clerks, leaving it to be determined hereafter, on application to the Lord Ordinary, or to the Judge who is to try the cause, whether the existing proof is to be cancelled, or to be used before the jury; and reserves all questions of expenses.

"Note.—Even if the writing were supposed to be obscure, the question, whether it did or did not constitute an agreement capable of execution, would form a proper subject of deliberation for a jury. To determine the fact whether a contract was formed or not, is surely one of the duties of a jury, although the performance of this task may require them to read, and to put its true meaning on a writing said to contain a mercantile bargain. But the Lord Ordinary sees no obscurity in this paper. It is an offer, which was practically accepted, for the delivery of a puncheon of whisky weekly, which, however, could be demanded either in whole puncheons, hogsheads, or half-hogsheads; but, in order to save frequent transmissions, the purchaser's option of ordering half-hogsheads should not be exercised beyond one-half hogshead a-week, he being obliged to take the rest in a larger quantity.

"The Statute is inapplicable, because the vessel was not 'represented as containing any amount of imperial measure, or of any fixed local or customary measure.' It was not a purchase by any fixed measure at all, whether imperial or local. A person who buys a puncheon full of spirits, may have an opinion as to what quantity he will get, as he may when he buys a bottle full; but these are not fixed measures, and were not represented as containing any amount of any measure.

"These obstacles being cleared away, it is a proper jury case of damages, as to which the proof taken is nearly useless."

On a reclaiming note by the respondents, the Court

"Adhere to the interlocutor, in so far as it advocates the cause, but quoad ultra alter the same, and find, that according to the true construction of the agreement between Messrs Haldane and Abbot, the pursuers, and the said Alexander Fraser, defender, dated 25th December 1835, was bound to supply the pursuers with whisky at the rate of one puncheon per week, for the period, and at the price mentioned in the said agreement, and direct an issue to be prepared for trying the question, whether the defender failed to implement the said agreement, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers: Reserving all questions of expenses."

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—Act. D. M. Adamson, S.S.C., Agent.—Alt. A. McNeill; James Brodie, S.S.C., Agent.—F. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

28th May 1842.

No. 182.—WILLIAM CLEMENT, Suspender, v. ROBERT and JAMES GREIG, Respondents.

Bill of Exchange—Suspension—Cessio.—A suspension was presented, without caution or consignment, of a charge on a bill by an obligant therein, inter alia, on the ground that until the funds and effects conveyed to the trustee under a decree of cessio obtained by him after the date of the bill and the period of payment, were exhausted, to which process the chargers were parties, they were not entitled to use diligence to attach any funds and effects now belonging to him.—The Court, remitted to the Lord Ordinary to refuse the note, on the ground, principally, that the chargers disclaimed any intention of using personal diligence, and explained, that it was with the view to sequestration of the suspender under the Bankrupt Statute.

The suspender having been charged on a bill for £50, dated 16th August 1838, and payable at four months' date, at the instance of the respondents, presented a note of suspension, without caution or consignment, in the following circumstances, as set forth in his statement of facts:—He admitted having granted the bill charged on, and it appeared, that in relief of the various claims the respondents had against him, he had indorsed and assigned to them various bills and other securities, which, he averred, were of greater amount than the sum in the charge. While in jail on diligence used by the respondents on one of the bills so indorsed, he applied to the Sheriff for cessio, in which process the respondents entered appearance, but decree of cessio was nevertheless pronounced in favour of the suspender (June 1839), considerably subsequent to the date of the bill charged on, or the period of payment. Besides this process, he had previously raised an action against the respondents, in order to obtain a count and reckoning with them for their intromissions with the securities assigned to them, but the trustee in his disposition omnium bonorum, had neglected to follow it out, though it was averred that a considerable balance would be found due to the suspender.

In these circumstances he, inter alia, pleaded—1. The complainer, in virtue of the decree of cessio bonorum, above mentioned, pronounced in a process to which the chargers were parties, is protected from all execution of diligence for debt contracted prior to said decree. 2. The chargers are not entitled to use diligence for such debt against the complainer, even to the effect of attaching any funds or effects now belonging to him, until the funds conveyed to, or vested in their trustee under the cessio are exhausted. 3. The complainer is not debtor to the chargers, but, on the contrary, they are his debtors.

The respondents admitted that they had received certain securities, but they stated, that, deducting the £50 bill, he was still their debtor in a sum of £1029. 13s. 11d., due on a variety of bills, &c., of which an account was lodged in process; and they averred that the securities, even if liquidated, would still leave them considerably his creditors beyond the amount of the bill. The decree of cessio, it appeared, had been brought under reduction, but the suspender, though applied to to defend that process and decree, had refused to do so, and he had likewise refused to grant a disposition omnium bonorum to the trustee in the cessio,—in particular, of certain heritable property, which was said to be the only source from which any thing was expected to be recovered towards payment of the creditors. The respondents further averred, that, since 1839, the suspender had carried on business as a merchant in Crieff, in partnership with another person, under the firm of William Clement and Company, and that he had acquired funds and effects since the date of the decree in the cessio. They also repeated an intimation made to the suspender in the presence of the Lord Ordinary, and before the record was ordered to be prepared, that they had no intention of proceeding to apprehend or incarcerate him in virtue of the diligence sought to be suspended, and that the charge was only given in order to render him notour bankrupt, by connecting it with diligence against his estates and effects. Further, they averred that the present suspension was carried on at the instigation of Drummond, with the view of preventing the notour bankruptcy of the suspender, and the sequestration of his estates, and that Drummond was the verus dominus litis. They pleaded—1. That the debt being properly vouched, and no sum having been paid to account of it, they were entitled to insist for payment: 2. That the suspender having refused to defend the reduction of the decret of cessio, or to execute a disposition omnium bonorum in favour of his trustee, as required by the Statute 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 56, was barred, personali exceptione, from founding upon the decree of cessio, at all events, from founding upon it to the effect of objecting to diligence used by the chargers, not against his person, but against his estate, and with a view to a sequestration of his estates; and that the chargers were not precluded from using diligence against his estate and effects. But, in consequence of his said refusal, the chargers were entitled to attach by diligence his estate and effects, even in so far as the same may have belonged to him prior to the date of the decret of cessio.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

“ 31st March 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having resumed consideration of this cause, and heard parties' procurators, and having since also considered the proceedings in the process of count and reckoning referred to, and more especially the state of accounts lodged therein by the present chargers,—Passes the note.

“ Note.—It is clear there must be farther investigation before this diligence can be allowed to proceed.

“ 1. Were there nothing but the decree of cessio obtained posterior to the date of the bill charged on, the cases of Lamb, 16th May 1798, D. 6576, and McKissock, 10th February 1814, Fac. Col. (cited 2 Bell Com., 597), and Do. Commy. on present Bankrupt Act, p. 33, seem of themselves sufficient warrant for holding that the chargers are not entitled, de plano, and as mere matter of course (without accounting in any respect for what has been done under the cessio), to proceed with summary diligence upon a bill which formed part of the alleged debt in their persons, while they were actually parties to the process of cessio. The decree in the cessio is now, so far as the moveable estate of the bankrupt is concerned, equivalent to a conveyance. The refusal to execute such conveyance, in addition, does not therefore seem to make the chargers' situation better, at least in a question as to mere diligence against the moveable estate; and there is nothing else here.

“ 2. But the Lord Ordinary rests chiefly upon the state of accounts founded on by the chargers themselves in the process of count and reckoning. The bill charged on is there put to the suspender's credit, as on 24th August 1838. In other words, it was discounted by the chargers for their own behoof, and the proceeds retained by them; the bill thus constituting, for the time, an advance by, not to the suspender. The bill, however, on maturity, was not retired by the suspender; and hence, the chargers having to retire it, the advance previously made by the suspender, and carried to his credit in account with the chargers, was neutralized; and a cross entry accordingly appears at the debit of the account, under date 2d January 1839, which replaced both parties in statu quo, as if the bill had never been granted. In this way, there would seem, in the result, no value to have been given by the chargers for this bill; indeed, prior to 24th August 1838, there is no entry on the debit-side of the account, in respect of which such value could have arisen. It appears, indeed, that there were certain other bills then in the circle, which the chargers had afterwards to retire; and it may be that the bill in question was put into their hands for the purpose of enabling them to raise the means of retiring those others. But the bills here referred to are themselves charged to the suspender's debit; and to allow the bill charged on, therefore, also to be dealt with as a substantive debt, would be to allow the chargers double benefit, under the two sets of bills, for one and the same liability.

“ Besides, in another view, the same conclusion may be arrived at. The sum total of balance at their credit is stated at £987 19 6

“ But among the entries at debit are the following:—

Aug. 29.	Bill on F. L. O'Beirne,	£100 12 0
1839.
Jan. 3.	Do. do.,	301 14 2
May 10.	Do., John Drummond and James M'Laren,	100 8 6½
July 9.	Share of Commercial Bank cash-account,	216 3 6
1840.
May 26.	Open account for goods,	297 9 0
		<hr/> 1016 7 2½

“ Of themselves exceeding the total balance by £28 7 8½ And there are other entries of a like kind to a considerable farther amount. Now, unless it could be shown that the bill here charged on was granted to express account of these liabilities, which the respective dates of the several transactions would seem in a great measure to exclude, there is nothing which, by possibility, could constitute value in this account for the bill now in dispute.

“ At all events, it is plain the question between the parties involves a very complicated accounting, even if the chargers shall be able in the end to show that the sum contained in this bill is due.

“ And therefore, on the whole matter, the Lord Ordinary has thought it safest to pass the note. In so doing, he trenches nothing upon the chargers' right to execute diligence against the suspender's person. For that they expressly waive, in respect of the cessio. Neither does he touch any remedy they may have against the debtor's estate, such as it existed down to the date of the cessio. For that stands already surrendered, so far as the moveables are concerned; and if there be heritage unconveyed, the chargers have their remedy aliunde. There only remains such estate as the suspender may have acquired subsequently to the cessio. And it seems but reasonable, in every view, that the chargers should proceed in a less summary form to constitute their claims against this, which, accordingly, the discussion upon the passed note will allow them every proper opportunity to do.”

On a reclaiming note for the respondents, the Court altered, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to refuse the bill, and to find the suspender liable in expenses.

28th May 1842.

No. 183.—JAMES AITKEN, Pursuer, v. THE MAGISTRATES and TOWN-COUNCIL of LANARK, Defenders.

Process—Citation—Burgh—Magistrates—Where a summons, directed not against the provost, magistrates and councillors of a burgh generally, but framed on the principle of enumerating the members of council, omitted the name of one of the constitutional members, and citation was effected by executions against the parties named in the summons, and not by service on the council when convened at a meeting—Preliminary defence of no process, in respect the parties representing the burgh were neither lawfully called nor cited to the action, was sustained by the Lord Ordinary;—but the Court, in the event of a supplementary action being brought, remitted to his Lordship to recal his interlocutor.

The pursuer brought this action to reduce and set aside a petition for sequestration, and procedure following thereon, as also a summons and relative procedure, which the defenders, as representing the common good of the burgh of Lanark, had insisted in before the Sheriff of Lanark, for payment of certain rents due by the pursuer as their tenant, and in consequence of which the pursuer had been obliged to cede possession of the subjects. The summons was directed against "John Gibson, of Saint Patrick's, surgeon in Lanark, provost of the royal burgh of Lanark, David Fordyce and John Aikman, magistrates of the said burgh, A. T. Watson, John Laurie, Robert Smith, Thomas Watson, Robert Harvey, James Wood, Daniel Walker, William Smillie, John Smith, William Watson, James Thomson, and Andrew Hislop, councillors, and John Marr, treasurer of the said burgh, as representing the community of the said burgh, defenders, for and in behalf of the said burgh, and of themselves personally." And the conclusions were—

"And the said Provost, Magistrates and Town-Council, for the said burgh and themselves, defenders, ought and should be decreed and ordained, by decree of our said Lords, to restate the pursuer in his possession of the said farm and houses, from which they wrongfully and illegally ejected him, and to grant him a regular and formal lease for the stipulated period, at the rent, and under the conditions and provisions of the said articles of roup: As also to make payment to the pursuer of £500 Sterling, or such other sum, more or less, as shall be ascertained to have been the worth of his property wrongfully sold or appropriated by them, after deducting the sum of rent for which sequestration was used, and any expenses which may be found chargeable: And farther, to make payment to the pursuer of £500, or such other sum, more or less, as shall be ascertained to be the amount of the loss and damage sustained by him through their said wrongful and illegal proceedings in selling or appropriating to themselves the said property, and ejecting him from his possession of the said farm and houses, and which he has already sustained, or may yet sustain, from want of possession thereof: Or otherwise, the said Provost, Magistrates and Town-Council, for the said burgh and themselves, defenders, ought and should be decreed and ordained, by decree of our said Lords of Council and Session, to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £1000 Sterling, or such other sum, more or less, as shall be ascertained to be due to him, in name of reparation and damages, and as a solatium for the said injuries and the loss which he has sustained, and may still sustain, from want of a regular and formal lease, and of the possession of the said farm and houses: And the said defenders ought and should also be decreed and ordained, by decree of our said Lords, to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £200, or such other sum, more or less, as our said Lords shall modify as the expenses of the process."

The defenders gave in preliminary defences, in which they stated, that the whole municipal administrators of the burgh were neither enumerated nor called in the action. The Council consisted, by its constitution, of seventeen members. Only sixteen were set forth or cited, and the omission consisted in not citing Alexander Buchanan, the Judge of the Guild Court, and a constituent member. It was also objected, that as the summons was executed not by service on the Council when convened at a meeting, but by the individual citation of the defenders, who are only a part of the Council, there had been no legal execution against the parties representing the burgh; and they accordingly pleaded no process,—the parties representing the community or burgh of Lanark, against whom the action purports to be directed, having not been lawfully called or cited.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"16th March 1842.—Having heard the counsel for the parties, sustains the preliminary defences, dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses, and remits the account thereof, when lodged, to the auditor to tax and report."

The pursuer reclaimed, when the Court, without dismissing the action, considered it was competent to cure it by a supplementary action; and accordingly,

"in the event of a proper supplementary action at the claimer's instance being brought into Court, remit to the Lord Ordinary, with power to recal the interlocutor now complained of, and to proceed further thereon as to his Lordship shall seem just: Find the claimer liable in the expenses of the present discussion on the preliminary defence, and also remit to the Lord Ordinary to give decree accordingly."

No. 185.—ALEXANDER MACRAE, Pursuer, v. COLONEL JOHN GORDON, Defender.

Landlord and Tenant—Compensation—Claim, Liquid and Illiquid—A landlord, who, on the expiry of the lease, took delivery of his tenant's stock at a price fixed by mutual valuers, held not entitled to withhold payment, on the allegation that the tenant was liable to him in certain illiquid claims.

Alexander Macrae held the farm of Askernish from the trustees of Ranald George Macdonald of Clanranald, under a lease, which stipulated, inter alia, "that the proprietor should be bound and obliged to take the whole stock of cattle and others which might be on the farm at the time of the pursuer's removal therefrom, at a price to be fixed by two men mutually chosen by the parties." The lease expired in 1840; but in 1838 and 1839, Colonel Gordon acquired, by purchase, Clanranald's estate of Boisdale, in South Uist, including the farm of Askernish. Accordingly, when the lease was about to expire, valuers were appointed by Colonel Gordon and the tenant, in terms of the above stipulation; and an award having been pronounced fixing the price, delivery was given on the following acknowledgment:

"Askernish, 5th June 1840.

"SIR—The above stock upon this farm, amounting by valuation to three thousand one hundred and seven pounds 2s. 1d. Sterling, I acknowledge to have received from you, on account of Colonel Gordon of Cluny." (Signed) "J. M'MILLAN."

"To Alex. Macrae, Esq."

When delivery was thus taken, no intimation was given to Macrae that Colonel Gordon had any claims against him; but afterwards, on the allegation that Macrae, who had been judicial factor on the estate of Boisdale, had in that capacity drawn rents for the former proprietors, which truly belonged to the new purchaser, Colonel Gordon refused to pay the price of the cattle. Macrae thereupon brought an action against him, concluding for payment of the price as fixed by the valuers, and also of £50 as the alleged value of certain out-gatherings which belonged to the stock, and had been afterwards collected and delivered to the defender.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"4th March 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the process, repels the defences, and decerns in terms of the conclusion for payment of the principal sum of £3107. 2. 1., with interest from and after the 5th day of June 1840: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses; appoints an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits to the auditor to tax the same and to report; and as to the conclusion for the price of the after-gatherings of sheep, appoints the cause to be enrolled, that the parties may say how they propose to proceed.

"Note.—This is the most violent attempt to extinguish a liquid debt by illiquid claims that can well be imagined. The defender took delivery of the pursuer's sheep at the price which he does not dispute, and he still retains them. But when asked to pay the price, as fixed by a written document and by his judicial admission, his answer is, that he has certain counter claims, many, if not all of which existed prior to his taking delivery; but no intimation was then given that it was in this way he was to pay; and if such intimation had been made, it is not probable that possession of the sheep would have been given. These demands are not attempted to be enforced by any action, and when stated as compensating the pursuer's demand, it is enough to say that they are all denied, and all so utterly illiquid that no sum was pretended to be put upon one of them even at the bar."

The defender reclaimed. At advising,

Lord President.—It is impossible that the Court can allow Colonel Gordon to keep the whole £3000 on an allegation of this vague description. I cannot help being of the opinion which the Lord Ordinary has expressed in his note, "that this is the most violent attempt to extinguish a liquid debt by illiquid claims that can well be imagined." The transfer of stock took place two years ago, the delivery is acknowledged, and yet at this time of day no payment at all has been made. That debt is perfectly liquid, but in Colonel Gordon's claims there is nothing like liquidation. Besides, they are made against Macrae only in his capacity as judicial factor. It seems he has drawn certain rents, as to which there was a doubt whether they belonged to the sellers of the estate or the purchasers. Colonel Gordon says they belong to him, but that is a question which he ought to try with the common agent in the ranking and sale, and not with this unfortunate tacksman, who, after having delivered up his stock in terms of the lease, cannot get a farthing of payment. This mode of dealing, on the part of the defender, it is impossible for a court of justice to sanction. I am clear for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. The debt due to the tenant was instantly payable. The cattle were delivered and carried away. The price was fixed by a regular writing; and there was no stipulation for delay in the payment of it. Then the defender's claims are in the highest degree doubtful in every respect. They are all denied by the pursuer. They are made against him in his capacity as judicial factor; and though he is said to have drawn rents which did not fall under his factory, there is no allegation of his having done so in mala fide. It is impossible to allow such claims to be set off against a debt of this sort.

Lord Fullerton concurred.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 186.—MRS ISABELLA CAMPBELL and WILLIAM CAMPBELL (Peter Campbell's Trustees), Pursuers, v. JOHN CAMPBELL RALSTON, Defender.

Landlord and Tenant.—Lease.—Missive.—A tenant entered into possession on a letter, which gave him liberty "to alter the buildings on the ground at his own expense, to suit his own convenience, but bound him," at the expiry of the lease, "either to leave the subjects as altered, or restore them to the state in which they were when his possession commenced"—Held that the tenant was not entitled to insist, where a regular lease was drawn out between the parties, that it should contain a clause entitling him to take down and carry away any erection which he has or may put up on the premises, with the option, at the expiry of the lease, of leaving them as altered, or restoring them to their original state.

After a communing as to a lease of certain premises, with the view of establishing a manufactory of hair-cloth, John Campbell Ralston addressed the following letter to Mrs Isabella Campbell:

"MADAM,—I have now made up my mind, and I am willing to give you £15 for the premises, &c., belonging to you at Musselburgh, on the following conditions, viz. :—

"1st, On a lease for ten years.

"2d, Having the option of remaining five years longer.

"3d, In the event of your selling the property, having a refusal of it at the price you will sell for.

"4th, Having a break at Whitsunday 1839. But, in the event of my taking advantage (which is very improbable) of said break, I am bound, over and above my rent, to have laid out £5 upon the interior of the dwelling-house for its improvement, and the proprietor's benefit.

"5th, Having the power to alter the premises to suit my purposes."

"6th, Being entitled to take down and take away any erections I put up.

"If these terms suit, I will prepare and send an offer in terms thereof, and presume acceptance is all that will be necessary by the parties entitled to give a lease.

"To whom am I to make the offer?—I am," &c.

Mr John Young, S.S.C., Mrs Campbell's agent, answered :

"Your letter, not dated, addressed to Mrs Campbell, has been handed by her to me.

"Mrs Campbell has full power to grant such a lease as you desire, and will let to you the house, consisting of four rooms and kitchen, with the gig-house, stable, and garden, No. 1, Mill Hill, Musselburgh, at the annual rent of £15, payable in equal proportions, at the terms of Martinmas and Whitsunday, and that for a period of fifteen years, giving you a break at Whitsunday 1839, and another at Whitsunday 1848, upon three months' previous notice in writing.

"You shall be at liberty to alter the buildings at your own expense to suit your own convenience; but at the expiry of the lease you must either leave the subjects as altered, or restore them to their present state.

"If Mrs Campbell should feel disposed to sell the property while in your occupation, you shall have the first offer of it.

"I request the favour of your answer to this proposal on or before Friday first, that the matter may be then finally settled, as Mrs Campbell must let the subjects to another person if she does not conclude with you."

Mr Ralston wrote the following letter of acceptance :

"I am favoured with your communication, of the 5th instant, in reference to Mrs Campbell's premises at Musselburgh, and I will take them on the terms you mention; and you can draft any missive of lease or otherwise you may judge necessary or proper;—only I have here to remark, that it is not merely the house and garden I understand you to mean, but of course all the buildings of every kind upon the ground; and I will require immediate access, by having the premises cleared of the bones lying there, to enable me to repair the house."

Mr Young replied :

"I received your favour of the 8th current, which was immediately communicated to Mrs Campbell, but I could not return a definite answer to the concluding part of your letter until she had seen Mr Gavin, the present tenant, and arranged matters with him.

"Mr Gavin has agreed to give you immediate possession of the stable and coach-house, and is, moreover, to give you possession of the lower flat of the house on the 25th current. This, I suppose, will suit your views.

"You are of course to get the use of all the buildings upon the ground, but you will take care, that any alterations which you make, shall not do injury to the property.

"As I now consider all matters between you and Mrs Campbell to be arranged, I shall prepare a regular missive to be interchanged between you and her, which will answer the purpose equally as well as a formal lease.—I am," &c.

Mr Ralston entered to possession, but a misunderstanding having arisen, and Mr Ralston having objected to pay rent until "furnished with a lease or regular missive, in terms of his bargain," Mrs Campbell and William Campbell, as Peter Campbell's trustees, brought the present action, in which, on the narrative that though the defender had entered to the premises on a lease of fifteen years from Whitsunday 1838, and at a rent of £15, and had continued in them ever since, he had paid only the first half-year's rent, and declined to make any other payment,—they concluded against him for payment of the arrears with interest. The defender, besides objecting to the pursuers' title, and to the letters as improbable, pleaded specially, that he "has not received the lease, the granting of which was required in his conditional acceptance of the 8th April, and is therefore to be considered as one of the conditions of his acceptance, and the promise of which, by Mr Young, in his letter agreeing to the other conditions, entitled the defender to a lease of the subjects before he paid his rent."

To obviate this plea, the pursuers agreed to grant a regular lease. The draft, which was accordingly prepared, contained, inter alia, the following clause :

"Second, That the said John Campbell Ralston shall be at liberty to alter the buildings on the said ground at his own expense, to suit his own convenience; but, at the expiry of this lease, he must either leave the subjects as altered, or restore them to the state in which they were at the said term of Whitsunday 1838."

The defender objected, that when he "took the premises in question at a rent of £15, their fair value, with the intention of expending several hundred pounds in fitting them for the purpose of manufacturing hair-cloth, he did so with the intention that the valuable erections and machinery which he was to put up, were to belong to him, and not to the landlord; and he accordingly in his offer, which is contained in one of the letters, in conformity with which the present lease is to be prepared, stipulated for power to alter premises to suit his purposes, and also for power to 'take down and take away' any erections which he might put up," but that in the clause proposed, "this, the most important power of all, is omitted." He therefore proposed that the clause should stand as follows:

"Second, That the said John Campbell Ralston shall be at liberty, and is hereby empowered, as from the date of his entry to the premises, to alter the buildings on the said ground at his own expense, to suit his own convenience, and that he shall be entitled to take down, and to carry away any erection which he has, or may put up thereon, but that at the expiry of the lease, he shall be bound, at his own option, either to leave the subjects as altered, or to restore them to the same state as that in which they were at the period of his entry."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor :

"5th March 1842.—Approves of the draft lease prepared by the pursuers, and appoints the same to be extended and signed, quam primum."

The defender reclaimed :

At advising, the Court held that the clause, as approved by the Lord Ordinary, accurately expressed the agreement contained in the letters founded on, and accordingly adhered.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G. D. F.)

No. 187.—THE RIGHT HON. VISCOUNT MELVILLE, Suspender, v. JOHN PATERSON (Plummer's Trustee), Respondent.

Bankrupt—Statute 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41—Clause—Construction—Found that the estates to which a deceased debtor had right, were sufficiently vested in a trustee under the Bankrupt Statute, by the act and warrant of confirmation, to enable him to grant a disposition to a purchaser.

John Plummer having died, his estates, with concurrence of his successors, were sequestrated under the Bankrupt Statute. John Paterson was appointed trustee, and obtained an act and warrant transferring to, and vesting in the said trustees the whole heritable estates belonging to the bankrupt. By the trustee, the lands of Gallowshall, the property of the deceased, were exposed to sale, and were purchased by Viscount Melville at £3215, payable in April 1842. The trustee became bound, on payment of the price, to grant to the purchaser a formal disposition of the lands containing all usual clauses. Upon a threatened charge for payment of the price, the purchaser presented a note of suspension. He pleaded—That the trustee had no title to grant a disposition, because no proper title was completed in his person to the lands sold vi statuti, inasmuch as the 79th, 80th, 81st, 82d and 87th sections of the Bankrupt Statute refer to the sequestrated estates of bankrupts which have been sequestrated in their lifetime, and not to the sequestrated estates of deceased debtors. The trustee, admitting the facts, answered—That upon a fair construction of the Statute, it did apply to the case of a deceased debtor, and that a contrary supposition would render the Act totally defective and inextricable, and inconsistent with itself.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"20th May 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having resumed consideration of this case, and heard parties' procurators, refuses the note, but, in the circumstances, finds no expenses due to either party.

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary cannot adopt the suspender's limited construction of the word 'bankrupt,' as it is employed in the statutory enactments in question. On the contrary, while he is satisfied that there, as throughout the Statute, it must be held to comprehend, not less the case of a 'deceased debtor' whose estates have been subjected to sequestration, than that of a debtor who has been sequestrated in his lifetime, he cannot help thinking, that the opposite construction would introduce such difficulties and contradictions in the practical working of this class of sequestrations, as to be incompatible with the express direction of the Legislature (§ 3), that the Act 'be construed in the most beneficial manner for promoting the ends hereby intended.'

"Many of the difficulties raised by the suspender, e. g., that the Statute (§ 87) contemplates an existing bankrupt, who may be 'required' to grant deed, or in whose person, rather than his own, the trustee may elect to complete titles,—or with or without whose concurrence certain other steps may be taken, &c. &c.,—would equally apply to the case of a bankrupt sequestrated in his lifetime, but who had happened to die before the stage at which such a question as the present had happened to occur.

"So, on the other hand, the word 'bankrupt,' even in its strictest sense, may, in many instances, nowise be inapplicable to this very case of a 'deceased debtor.' For the Statute expressly provides for the more summary granting of sequestration in the case of a debtor who 'was at the time of his death a notour bankrupt.'

"But it is on the plain meaning and obvious intendment of the Statute, in its whole scope and structure, that the Lord Ordinary rests his opinion.

"The suspender himself is compelled to concede, that so far as regards the general machinery of the Statute, and the technical orders and proceedings which it sanctions and directs, there can be no distinction made between the case of one sequestrated estate and another. But the matter lies deeper than this. For,

"1. While it is enacted (§ 13), that in the case of a living bankrupt, the award of sequestration shall declare 'the estates to belong to the creditors,' it is equally ordered (§ 14), in the case of a debtor deceased, that 'the Lord Ordinary shall award sequestration, and issue the other orders, as herein above provided in the case of any other debtor, in so far as circumstances will permit;'—and, that the creditors in this latter case may be more effectually secured, it is further provided, that where 'any successor (of the deceased) has made up a title to, or is in possession of the estate,' the same deliverance shall include an order upon such successor 'to transfer such estate to the trustee;'—and, if no such title has been made, it is finally declared 'incompetent for any creditor, after the date of the first deliverance, to be confirmed executor-creditor, or to raise or insist in any adjudication or diligence against the estate of the debtor.'

"2. The interest thus vested at the outset in the creditors, is afterwards renewed and confirmed in the person of the trustee,—the act and warrant which confirms his election being made (§ 49 and schedule F) to declare, that 'the whole of the estates and effects, heritable and moveable, and real and personal, wherever situated, of the said C D, are transferred and belong to A B as trustee, for behoof of the creditors.' There is no distinction made between the estates of a living and deceased debtor. And, as regards the word 'bankrupt,' it appears to be indiscriminately applied to both—the enactment declaring, in general terms, that the trustee may, by force of this title, 'recover any debt due to the bankrupt, and maintain actions, in the same way as the bankrupt might have done if his estates had not been sequestrated.'

"3. Then, in prescribing the duties of the trustee's office, it is enacted (§ 61), that he 'shall manage, realise and recover the estate belonging to the bankrupt,'—still plainly comprehending within that description the case of a 'deceased debtor.' And without needlessly multiplying illustrations to the like effect, there may just farther be noticed—section 93, which regulates judicial sale 'without any other proof of bankruptcy than the act of sequestration';—section 100, which directs the whole estate, when reduced into money, to 'be divided among those who were creditors of the bankrupt at the date of the sequestration';—section 136, which provides that 'any surplus of the bankrupt's estate and effects, &c., shall be paid to the bankrupt, or to his successors or assignees';—section 145, which exempts the conveyance, sale, discharge, &c., of the estate belonging to any bankrupt against whom sequestration has been or may be awarded, &c., from all stamp duties, or other Government duty, and, specially, from all rates or duties exigible 'upon the sale of estates or effects by auction,' &c. &c.;—every one of which provisions would, according to the suspender's argument, on the limited application of the word 'bankrupt,' not less exclude the case of a 'deceased debtor' from their beneficial operation, than those enactments which have more immediately given rise to the present question.

"4. There is, however, before coming to these last, one other branch of the statutory enactments to which it may be proper to advert, viz., the provisions regarding the vesting of the moveable estate. Now, by these it is enacted (§ 78), 'that the moveable estate and effects of the bankrupt shall, by virtue of the act and warrant of confirmation in favour of the trustee, be transferred to, and vested in him for behoof of the creditors, absolutely and irredeemably, as at the date of the sequestration, with all right, title and interest, to the same effect as if actual delivery or possession had been obtained.' Without going farther, it would seem, prima fronte, difficult to deny that this enactment must, under the generic term 'bankrupt,' be held to cover the case of a 'deceased debtor.' But, could any room for doubt remain, there follows section 84, which enacts, that where the sequestration of the estates of a deceased debtor is dated within seven months after his death, 'all legal diligence by creditors within a certain period, and, inter alia, any confirmation as executor-creditor after the debtor's death, shall be of no effect in competition with the trustee:'—that is to say, shall be of no effect in competition with the trustee's right, which had been previously declared to be vested generally, over the whole moveable estate and effects, as the estate and effects of 'the bankrupt.' In the like spirit are the separate enactments already adverted to (§ 14), that 'confirmation as executor-creditor shall not be competent after the first deliverance;' and that, where any successor of the deceased has made up a title, he must make over and transfer the estate to the trustee.

"5. The provisions as to the vesting of the heritable estate are, in all respects, analogous. 1. It is declared (§ 79), 'that the whole heritable estates belonging to the bankrupt in Scotland shall, by virtue of the said act and warrant (confirming the trustee), be transferred to, and vested in the trustee;' and this is extended (§ 80) to all 'lands, tenements and hereditaments in England, &c., to which the bankrupt is entitled.'

Now, if this do not reach the estate of a 'deceased debtor,' where, it is asked, is the vesting clause applicable to such a case? And would it be consistent with 'construing the Statute in the most beneficial manner for promoting the ends thereby intended,' so to interpret the word 'bankrupt,' as of necessity to negative the existence of any vesting clause applicable to a deceased debtor's estate? But, 2. Here, just as in the case of the moveable estate, section 84 comes in, and—assuming that the above clause does, in the case of a 'deceased debtor,' vest right in the trustee—declares, that any preference obtained over the heritable estate 'by legal diligence,—on or after the sixtieth day before his death, or subsequent to his death,—shall be 'of no effect in competition with the trustee':—as section 14 had in the like spirit declared, that no adjudication, or other diligence against the real estate, should be competent subsequent to the date of the first deliverance. And then, finally, there follows section 88, which declares, that where 'the deceased's successor had made up a title to his heritable estate,' such estate shall be de plano declared 'transferred to, and vested in the trustee as at the date of the sequestration, to the same effect as is hereinbefore provided (§ 79) in regard to THE ACT AND WARRANT OF CONFIRMATION.'

"The reference made in this last-mentioned clause to the effect of the 'act and warrant of confirmation,' seems, in truth, to be of itself conclusive of the whole present question. For it necessarily implies, that the trustee's right to such estate of the 'deceased' as his successor had made up no title to, is completely and to all intents vested, by the mere force of such act and warrant, per se—and this, notwithstanding the clause authorising such act and warrant, contains no express mention, eo nomine, of the case of a 'deceased debtor,' nor indeed any word of broader efficacy than that of 'bankrupt,' which the suspender argues to be insufficient. Nay, it actually takes the right so vested in that case, as the rule and measure of the right also to be vested in the trustee, where, in consequence of the successor's having made up titles, certain ulterior proceedings, such as those suggested in section 88, are required to that effect.

"On the whole, the Lord Ordinary cannot entertain a doubt that the case of a 'deceased debtor,' whose estates have been sequestrated under the Bankrupt Statute, is to be held as sufficiently comprehended under the generic term 'bankrupt,' not only as it is used in all the various clauses which have just been commented on, but likewise as it is employed in section 87, on which, more especially, it is that the suspender relies. It was plainly not the object of this latter enactment to draw any distinction between the sequestration of a dead, and of a living debtor. It applies universally; unless, indeed, to the single case of a deceased debtor whose heir has made up titles, which, again, is provided for in the section immediately succeeding. And its effect, equally where the debtor is alive,—and where he is dead without his heir having made up titles,—is, that 'the trustee may,' without making up a feudal title in his person' (which, indeed, section 88 does not require him to do, even where the deceased's successor has himself completed such a title), grant conveyances of the heritable estate, and that such conveyances 'shall be as effectual to the purchaser as if they had been granted by the bankrupt with concurrence of the trustee.'

"No doubt, the right thus declared to be vested in the trustee will be no more than a right tantum et tale with what actually belonged to the bankrupt at the date of sequestration; and where the bankrupt, therefore, has previously granted a prior personal right, in the shape of a conveyance or security, to an individual creditor or other third party, upon which it would be in the power of such a party to run a race against the trustee, it may be necessary for the latter, with a view to exclude the completion of this inchoate adverse right, to obtain his own title first completed according to all the feudal forms, and so entered upon the records. Cases of this kind are commented on by Professor Bell in his Observations (p. 170,) on this branch of the Statute. But these, ex concessio of the suspender himself, are none of them cases which would entitle a purchaser to insist, in the case of a living 'bankrupt,' on the trustee technically feudalising his right. Nay, they are none of them cases in which the trustee, after divesting the heir of a 'deceased debtor' under the operation of section 88; could, in any such sense, be compelled to make up a feudal title. But if not, seeing any dangers to be apprehended from the race of possible competing rights, are common to all the three cases,—why should a purchaser be more entitled to insist in a case like the present, that the trustee should adopt a course which he would not be compellable to adopt under either of the other two.

"After all, it will be found in truth, that the suspender's argument, if good for anything, does not stop at any incompleteness in the mere feudal title of the respondent. It must go the length of denying in toto, that there is here any vested right whatever in the trustee, as regards either the moveable or heritable estate of the deceased. For the vesting clauses of the Statute, as has been seen, are all, no less than this 87th section, conceived with direct reference to the estates of a 'bankrupt,'—no other word being in fact there used. So that, if that word is not to be so construed as that it may comprehend the case of a 'deceased debtor,' there are really no vesting clauses applicable to, or operative in, the case of such a debtor at all. And the Statute therefore would, in this class of sequestrations, become inextricable and nugatory.

"The point being a new one, the Lord Ordinary, however clear and decided his own opinion, has not thought it right to give expenses."

Lord Melville reclaimed, but the Court adhered.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—(W.H.D.)

No. 188.—JOHN HUTCHINSON FERGUSSON, Appellant, v. DAVID FYFFE and OTHERS, Respondents.

Loan—Interest—Foreign—Accumulations—A party, who was insane, died in India in 1810, leaving a sum of money in rupees in the hands of a house of agency there. His relations in this country, who were aware of the insanity, had, about the time of the death, of which they were not aware till long after, some correspondence with one of the partners of the company when in this country, in consequence of which, in 1812, they were put in possession of an account or doquet, signed by the firm, ascertaining the balance in their hands, as in April 1810, to amount to a certain sum, and it specified "to bear interest at 9 per cent. per annum,"—the figure "9" being written on an erasure. This doquet was admitted to be a valid probative document—Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session), 1. That the defender was bound by the account so rendered in 1812, and was liable for the sums therein charged; and 2. That interest was due on these sums from 30th April 1810, at the rate of 9 per cent. to the date of final decree; but 3. (reversing the judgment of the Court of Session), That in calculating interest on the said amount, compound interest or annual rests ought not to be allowed.

The late Dr Fyffe had an account in India with the company of Fergusson and Fairlie, which had existed previous to May 1790, and with another firm, Fairlie, Reid and Company, by which the other firm was succeeded; and both these houses had been employed by him as his agents until June 1792. It appeared at the next balance in April 1793, that the balance in favour of Dr Fyffe, in the hands of his agents, amounted to rupees 4207. 3. 10. In 1793, Dr Fyffe became insane, and continued in that state down to the period of his death in India in 1810. Considerable changes took place upon these firms; and in regard to these changes it was averred that every succeeding firm became bound in the debts of their predecessors.

In 1795, the firm of Fairlie, Gilmore and Company was formed; and in that firm there was a gentleman of the name of Allan Gilmore, who had previously been a partner of the houses which acted as the agents of Dr

Fyffe; and it appeared that this latter firm adopted the account which Dr Fyffe had had with the two previous houses, and that they had charged themselves annually with accumulations of interest. On the dissolution of this house in 1810, the firm of Fairlie, Fergusson and Company was formed, and of this house the defender became a partner at its formation, but Gilmore had retired on the dissolution of Fairlie, Gilmore and Company. Fairlie, Fergusson and Company undertook, on acquiring right to the assets of Fairlie, Gilmore and Company, to relieve it of its debts, inter alia, of the debts due to Dr Fyffe, but it did not appear that the new company had undertaken to pay compound interest at an Indian rate on that debt.

The pursuers were aware that Dr Fyffe had fallen into a state of insanity in India, but were ignorant, till long subsequently, of the fact of his death. In 1812, Mr William Fairlie, one of the partners of Fairlie, Fergusson and Company, and who had been a partner of Fergusson and Fairlie, Fairlie, Reid and Company, and Fairlie, Gilmore and Company, the predecessors, as alleged of the late company of Fairlie, Fergusson and Company, which commenced in May 1810, and was dissolved in 1818, was in England, at which time Mr James Fyffe of Glasgow had had some communications with Fairlie as to Dr Fyffe's affairs. In consequence of these communications, Fairlie procured from India, from his house, the account in favour of the late Dr Fyffe, bringing out a balance, as at 30th April 1810, of 17,346. 5 sicca rupees, the previous balance, as at April 1793, (4207. 3. 10) having, by accumulations of interest, amounted to that sum. The account, which commenced in April 1787, and terminated in April 1810, was in these terms:

" Charles Fyffe, Esq., in account-current with Fairlie, Gilmore and Company. To balance in his favour with Fairlie, Fergusson and Company, to bear interest at 9 per cent. per annum (S. R. 17,346. 5.)

The account, which was signed by the social firm of Fairlie, Fergusson and Company, contained an erasure in the figure "9," and was sent by Fairlie in 1812 to Mr James Fyffe.

In 1833, the pursuers, as beneficially interested in the settlements of the late Dr Fyffe, brought an action against the defender, as a partner of the late firm of Fairlie, Fergusson and Company, for payment of the sum stated in the above account, with interest at 5 per cent.; but by a relative supplementary action, they concluded for yearly accumulations of interest on the balance, according to the Indian rate of interest stated in the account, viz., 9 per cent. In the course of the action, several doubts were raised in reference to English law,—among others, whether the firm of Fairlie, Fergusson and Company were truly debtors in the balance alleged to be due to Dr Fyffe. (See case as previously reported, Vol. X. p. 168). On the answers by English counsel to the queries submitted to them, the Court held that the firm was liable in the debt, but minutes of debate were ordered on the points remaining, viz., the rate of interest and the accumulations, which, as claimed, increased the debt to about £18,000.

It was stated by the pursuers, that the practice of Indian houses was to accumulate annually the interests of sums lodged with them, and that by the accounts in process, it appeared that the agency houses in question for twenty-three years from 1787 downwards, had annually balanced the account of Dr Fyffe, and accumulated the interest, which fluctuated at times more or less, but the change of the firms made no difference in the way of stating the accounts,—1 per cent. being debited as commission. It was therefore pleaded, that as they retained that balance, they must be presumed to have retained it on the condition of accounting on the same principle; and the defender was bound for accumulations not only subsequent to 1810, but to 1818, even when the firm was dissolved, because the obligation against him to account on the same footing, and for Indian interest, still subsisted. (Palmer and Co.'s Assignees v. Glas, and Keble v. Graham.) The pursuers denied that the erasure founded on by the defenders had been made ex post facto; and if it were held to be pro non scripto, the ordinary rate of interest in India, viz., 10 per cent., must be substituted for 9 per cent., and not any fluctuating rate. The insanity of Dr Fyffe was known to the legatees in this country, but the fact of the death was not known till a long time afterwards.

The defender pleaded—That Dr Fyffe's legatees ought to have called up the money during the subsistence of the firm of Fairlie, Fergusson and Company. It was dissolved in 1818, and was succeeded and represented by Fergusson, Clerk and Company, and subsequently by the subsisting house of Fergusson and Company, and no intimation was ever made to them that they were to be held liable on any such principle of accounting. The defender had left India for this country in 1816, and, from the dissolution of Fairlie, Fergusson and Company, had never any connection with the Indian houses. He maintained, that as, according to the opinion of English counsel, the subsequent firms, as modified after Dr Fyffe's death, were liable to pay up the balance due, the action should have been brought, not solely against him individually as a partner, as the debt was not constituted against the company, but that the other parties should have been called: A v. B, 26th February 1741, Mor. 14,560, and Reid v. McCall, 11th July 1814. Geddes, 2d June 1827. Dewar, 23d February 1821. In regard to the question of interest, it was stated that the account in question, handed to Mr James Fyffe, contained an erasure in the figure 9, as the rate of interest, and that no explanation had been given of the reason for such erasure. Accordingly, he pleaded that the rate must be held pro non scripto, and consequently, that as interest had fluctuated very materially in India subsequent to the date of the account, the rate should not be fixed so high as 9 per cent., but according to the rate allowed on the company's loans, which, during the period in question, was at 8, 6, and 5 per cent., and at one time 4 per cent. In no view ought more than 7 per cent. to be allowed, because, in 1812, when the account was delivered to James Fyffe, he had been made aware that the Indian rate of interest was just 7 per cent. Moreover, it was pleaded, that as the pursuers, in consequence of the erasure, could not competently show the rate of interest which had been agreed on by the company, it should be no more than legal interest,—the rate which, before the supplementary action was brought, was all that was sued for. But whatever the rate, the defender could not be charged with accumulations, because any such claim was completely guarded against by the express terms of what was called the undertaking of this debt by Fairlie, Fergusson and Company, viz., the concluding entry in Dr Fyffe's account with Fairlie, Gilmore and Company, whereby it was stipulated that the balance should bear interest at a certain fixed and permanent rate. In that entry there was not the slightest allusion to compound interest, and the Court could not be asked to make such a serious addition to that stipulation, beyond what the parties made for themselves. In illustration of this it was stated, that Fairlie, Fergusson and Company's account contained no accumulation subsequent to 1810; and it was maintained, that as the pursuers had failed to ask for accumulations, and to bring their action for twenty-one years, they must be held to have acquiesced, in not demanding such accumulations. Further, acquiescence ought to be presumed, in respect that when the action was brought, legal interest was alone charged, though in the supplementary action compound interest was afterwards concluded for. The practice was denied of accumulating interest in India, or that the doctrine laid down in the case of Palmer's assignees could influence the present one, as there the circumstances were materially different; and in particular, the account was current up to a few months of bringing the action. But, supposing the practice to exist, Dr Fyffe was never a customer of the house of Fairlie, Fergusson and Company, for he died a few days only before that company was formed. It was contended, likewise, that no proof had been brought as to the practice of accumulating, and the account sued on did not show such practice; at all events, if it did, as against the previous house of Fairlie, Gilmore and Company, it did not do so as against the house of Fairlie, Fergusson and Company; and even if it could be supposed as against them, it must be held to have ceased at the dissolution of that Company in 1818. The legatees were to blame for not calling up the money in 1812, when they must have known of Dr Fyffe's death, as at that time Mr James Fyffe received the account in question from India, and had communicated in regard to the testator's affairs; and as they were to blame in that respect, they could not be entitled to compound interest.

At advising on 29th May 1838, the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Find that the pursuers are entitled to the sum of 17,346 5. sicca rupees, being the balance due on the docketed account, converted at the rate of exchange current in Calcutta by the latest accounts, together with interest on the said sum so converted, at the rate of 9 per cent. per annum, and accumulated annually at the same rate from the 30th day of April 1810 to the date of citation in this action, and with interest on the accumulated balance at the foresaid rate, from the date of citation to the date of final decree, and interest on the accumulated balance from the date of final decree until payment, at the legal rate of interest: Find that the defender is entitled to deduction from the annual accumulations of interest of 1 per cent. for commission, and that he is further entitled to deduction of the necessary expense of remitting the money from India to this country: Find neither party entitled to expenses in this process: Alter the Lord Ordinary's interlocutors of 26th November and 15th December 1835, and repel the whole defences, so far as at variance or inconsistent with the above findings, and decern: Appoint the pursuers, quam primum, to prepare and lodge a state of their claims against the defender, in terms of the findings contained in this interlocutor."

The defender appealed, pleading—I. That the cause of action having accrued within six years anterior to the institution of the present action, it is cut off by the English Statute of Limitations. This plea is not obviated (1.) by Mr Fairlie's letter of 5th July 1812; for, besides its inefficacy in other respects, it was written twenty-one years previous to the present action; nor, (2.) by Dr Fyffe's insanity, as he was confessedly dead more than twenty-three years before this action; nor, (3.) by the exception in favour of plaintiffs, when defendants are beyond seas, in respect the time of limitation has at least been running since 1812, when one of the partners came to England to reside; and the present defender has been in this country nearly twenty years.—II. Neither the appellant, nor the company of Fairlie, Fergusson and Company, as a partner of which he is now sued, incurred an obligation, ex contractu or otherwise, to Dr Fyffe or his representatives, to pay the debt in question. The arrangement between Fairlie, Fergusson and Company, and Fairlie, Gilmore and Company, in July 1810, was res inter alios acta, and the letter of Mr Fairlie, in July 1812, contains no obligation by Fairlie, Fergusson and Company to undertake an obligation to pay a debt for which they were not otherwise liable.—III. This action ought to have been dismissed, in respect it was instituted against the defender individually, as having been a partner of Fairlie, Fergusson and Company, without either the company, or partners of that firm having been made parties to the action. The fallacy of the pursuers' argument on this point, consists in their assuming that the subscribed account above mentioned, operates of itself a final constitution of a right against the company in the pursuers' favour; whereas, in the most favourable view, it is only one article of evidence in the question of constitution; and even its effect, as an article of evidence, can only be properly true with the company, and not with an individual partner.—IV. The appellant is, at all events, not legally chargeable, in the circumstances, with so high a rate of interest, nor with compound interest.

The respondents maintained the pleas which were successful in the Court below.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, in this case, Dr Fyffe, who resided in Calcutta in the year 1786, opened an account with the then firm of Fergusson and Fairlie, and continued it with the firm of Fairlie, Reid and Company, which was adopted by the house upon a change of partners in 1790. On the 1st of May 1790, the appellant, Mr Fergusson, was admitted a partner into the firm of Fairlie, Reid and Company, and continued a partner in the business from that time till 1820, when he retired,—the house having, in 1795, assumed the style of Fairlie, Gilmore and Company, and in 1810, that of Fairlie, Fergusson and Company, and in 1818, that of Fergusson, Clerk and Company. Mr Fairlie, who was a partner when the appellant was admitted in 1793, continued to be so till 1818. Throughout all the changes of partnership, the account of Dr Fyffe was carried on in the books of the new firm, and it was a debt appearing upon the books of the several firms, of which the appellant was a partner during the whole period of his continuing in the house. It seems to have been assumed by both sides, that, in 1793, Dr Fyffe became non compos mentis, and that he so continued till the 9th of May 1810, but as to the precise time at which it commenced, or of any circumstances connected with it, I find no other evidence. It does not appear that any proceedings were adopted for appointing others to act in the affairs of Dr Fyffe on account of his lunacy, and he was during all this time in India, and the house at Calcutta continued to deal with his funds as they had before the period of his alleged insanity. It would therefore be extremely difficult, under any circumstances, for the house to support a case for withdrawing from their customer any benefit to which their mode of keeping the account would have entitled him, if there had not been any question as to his sanity. In the present case, I think the house are at all events precluded from so doing. In 1812, one of the then partners in the house, in which the appellant was also at the time a partner, in answer to an inquiry made by a person claiming to be interested in the estate of Dr Fyffe, communicated the statement of account made up in the books of the firm, up to the 30th of April 1810, by which a balance of 17,346. 5. sicca rupees was made to be due to him, and to which was appended this note,—“To bear interest at 9 per cent. per annum.” The letter which inclosed it, bore date the 15th of February 1812, and was in these words :—“I now inclose you Mr Charles Fyffe's account from its commencement, which I received some time ago from Calcutta. The balance at 30th of April 1810 was rupees 17,346. 5; chiefly arising, you will observe, from the high rate of interest allowed upon it.” Administration to Mr Charles Fyffe was not obtained till 1835, but nothing was done in the meantime to affect the relative situation of the firm and of the estate; and by their bill, the administrator assumes the account so stated by the firm; and no error or mistake in that account is now established. It is, therefore, much too late for the house to say that they allowed too high a rate of interest up to the 30th of April 1810, or computed it in a manner too favourable to their customer. I think, therefore, that the amounts of debt due by the firm to the estate of Charles Fyffe, has been correctly assumed to be 17,346. 5. on the 30th of April 1810. At what rate interest ought to be computed from that date, and whether, with accumulations or not, remains to be considered. It was said that William Fairlie wrote a prior letter to the same person on the 23d of March 1812, stating that the interest of money had fallen greatly in Bengal, and that 7 per cent. was then the highest rate allowed, but that letter is not admitted, and has not been produced or proved; and if it had, it could hardly supersede the memorandum at the foot of the account sent on the 15th of July following. But then it was said that the figure “9” in the memorandum was written on an erasure. The account to which that memorandum is appended, purports to be an account-current signed by the firm; and if the paper produced has been altered in this figure since it was delivered, it was competent for the defender to have stated and proved the fact, and that it did not as it now appears, correspond with the books of the firm; but no such proof has been made. It must, therefore, be considered as the superscription of the firm on the 15th of July 1812, when the account was delivered by William Fairlie, one of the firm, that 9 per cent. would be in future the rate of interest which the balance, then admitted to be due, would bear in future. The question of accumulation stands upon a very different footing. Upon that subject the memorandum contains no agreement for the future;—indeed, it may be considered as excluding all that it does not provide; and what it does provide for, is only payment of interest at a certain rate. It is true, that practically the account had ceased to be an account-current from the year 1793; but up to that time it had been, in the most correct sense, an account-current, and it ceased to be so, not by any act or agreement of the parties, but by the cessation of all transactions arising probably from the situation of Charles Fyffe. The account, however, continued to be carried on in the same manner as before, until the 30th of April 1810; and when that account was made up, Charles Fyffe was dead, he having died on the 9th of May 1810. From that time there was no party with whom any account-current could be carried on,—there not having been any representative of Charles Fyffe for many years afterwards. The accounting parties made up their account to the death of Charles Fyffe, stating their intention to pay 9 per cent. upon the balance; and from such mode of making up the account, and such promise to pay 9 per cent. upon the balance, the firm are not at liberty to withdraw. But then the question is, whether the accounting parties are to be liable beyond what they have so undertaken, and are to be charged with compound interest? The first question which occurs is, can there be a title to compound interest, without a contract expressed or implied, from the mode of dealing with former accounts or custom; and if not, the absence of any party with whom any such contract can have been made, must be fatal to the claim. Generally, a contract or promise for compound interest is not available in England, as was decided in ex parte Bacon, 9 Vesey, 224, except, perhaps, as to mercantile accounts-current for mutual transactions—a character which this account had lost from at least the death of Charles Fyffe. How then can compound interest be chargeable upon an account closed? The Court of Session appears to have taken a very correct view of the international law upon this subject, and considering the law of the country where the debt is contracted as furnishing the rule by which the nature and extent of the obligation was to be tried; but to carry out that principle to its proper extent, the same rule must be applied to the question of interest, as constituting part of the contract expressed or implied, and therefore, as affecting the nature and extent of the obligation; and the law of Scotland can be referred to only as to questions concerning the remedy, as the country in which the action is brought,—in which must be included the question raised as to the length of time. No Scotch prescription applying to the case, the English Statute of Limitation is irrelevant; but if it had been material, it would not have afforded any bar, as the time now began to run. The distinction between the applicability of the lex loci contractus and the lex fori, with reference to the nature and character of the debt and the right to the remedy, is well exemplified in the case of the British Linen Company v. Drummond, in 10 Barnewall and Cresswell, 911, in the Queen's Bench, and in Don v. Lippman, in the House of Lords, in 2 Shaw and M'Lean, 723. In inquiring, therefore, into the title to compound interest, Scotch cases are not those which ought to be primarily consulted; and it would not be possible, upon English authorities, to support the claim. It happens that there is a decision of the House of Lords upon this subject which is conclusive against the claim—I mean the case of Boddam v. Ryley, reported in 1 Brown's Chancery Cases, p. 239; 2 Brown's Chancery Cases, p. 2; and 4 Brown's Chancery Cases, p. 561. In that case there were partnership accounts and a private account, and in the books the account had been made up with Indian interest and compound interest. At the hearing, Lord Thurlow said, “Spencer's representative claims 9 per cent. from year to year, upon the ground that the books were so made up, but I think no such interest can be allowed; for although, where there are cross-accounts, interest is as fair to the one as to the other; yet it is not fair after closing the account.” From this decision of Lord Thurlow's there was an appeal to the House of Lords, raising distinctly the claim to compound interest, but the decree was affirmed. The present is a much stronger case against the claim than that of Boddam v. Ryley, because there does not appear to have been in that case such an absence of any party to consent to the mode of stating their accounts as there is in this. On the other hand, and in favour of the claim to compound interest, several cases were cited as decisions of the Court of Session, of which Kemble v. Graham, 6 Shaw and Dunlop, p. 119, was one; but I do not find that in that case, as there reported, there was any question raised as to compound interest. In Cruikshank v. The British Linen Company, 13 Shaw and Dunlop, p. 91, there was a bond which, it was said, amounted to a contract for compound interest, as to the legality of which no question appears to have been raised. Palmer and Company v. Glas, 13 Shaw and Dunlop, p. 308, is the only case in which the point was expressly raised, and in that case the Court of Session certainly decided that compound interest was to be calculated upon the annual balances after the death of the debtor. The Court, however, very correctly considered that question as one to be decided by the law of the country where the debt was contracted, and not by the law of Scotland where the action was brought. The decision, therefore, is not a Scotch judgment upon a question of Scotch law, but a judgment of a Scotch Court upon English law, or an Indian custom, and seems to have been founded upon very imperfect information, which the accountant is stated to have received from some gentleman acquainted with the course of business in India, but how far applicable to the circumstances of the case, or what such information was, does not appear. The Lord Ordinary is represented as having thought it doubtful whether there should be any accumulation after the death of the debtor; and Lord Medwyn said that he felt a little more difficulty as to the accumulation. It is not possible, I think, to put this decision in competition with the others to which I have before referred. It appears to me, therefore, that the proper course will be to vary the interlocutor appealed from, by declaring that interest at 9 per cent. ought to be calculated upon the balance of 17,346. 5. sicca rupees, from the 30th of April 1810, up to the time of the decree, but without any compound interest or annual rests; and that the cause be remitted to the Court of Session with this declaration.

Interlocutor varied, and cause remitted with a declaration.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—(W.H.D.)

No. 189.—ANDREW BELL, Appellant, v. DR ANDREW MYLNE and OTHERS, Respondents.

Public Officer.—Schoolmaster.—Trustees.—Powers and Liability.—A testator left in trust a sum of money to certain parties "for the benefit of a charity or school for the poor" of the testator's native parish, but no conditions were inserted in the deed of bequest as to the way and manner in which these trustees were to execute the bequest. The trustees founded an institution for teaching, and appointed masters to continue at pleasure—Held, in an action of damages brought by one of the masters who had been dismissed (affirming the judgment of the Court of Session), that there was no obligation in law on the trustees to appoint ad vitam aut culpam only—that the pursuer's appointment was not ad vitam aut culpam, and action therefore dismissed.

Process.—A. S., 11th July 1828—In an action of damages by a schoolmaster for alleged illegal dismissal, the cause, after being sent to the jury roll, was retransmitted, previously to trial, to the Court of Session, for the determination of certain points of law, and the Lord Ordinary having, in terms of the 65th section of the Act of Sederunt 1828, reported the cause on cases, the record being unclosed—Held competent for the Court, at that stage of the cause, to dismiss the action de plano, as groundless.

The late John M'Nab, who was a native of the parish of Dollar, died leaving a large fortune. By his will, dated in 1800, written with his own hand a short time before his death, he gave a moiety of his property to his cousin; and in regard to the other moiety, he provided:

"The other moiety or share I would have laid in the public funds, or some such security, on purpose to bring one annual income or interest, for the benefit of a charity or school for the poor of the parish of Dollar, and shire of Clackmannan, whier I was born, in North Britain or Scotland. That I give and bequeath to the minister and church-wardens of that parish for ever, say to the minister and church officers for the time being, and no other person shall have pour to receive the foresaid annuity but the aforesaid officers for the time being, or their agent appointed for the time by them. This I beg my executors to put in a state to be executed."

The Lord Chancellor of England ordered the Accountant-General to pay over the moiety in his hands applicable to this purpose, "to the minister and church officers of the parish of Dollar, pursuant to the will of the testator, John M'Nab." The testator died without leaving any specific regulations as to the way in which the bequest was to be managed, other than the terms of the bequest expressed.

The defender, Dr Mylne, was the minister of the parish, and he and the kirk-session appeared to have acted under the advice of counsel, and of several eminent individuals, and of parties who were assumed into the trust, as to the management of the charitable bequest. Under the regulations which were adopted, Dr Mylne was appointed president of the institution, at an annual salary. An establishment was erected for teaching, and a mode and style of instruction were adopted, with the consent of the trustees and others, but no rules were enacted by the trustees as to appointing teachers ad vitam aut culpam; and it appeared to have been the practice, at least since 1818, for Dr Mylne, acting under the advice of the trustees, to appoint the masters of the various branches at pleasure only. In 1821, on the occasion of a vacancy in the mathematical class, Dr Mylne addressed a letter to the pursuer in the following terms:

"Dollar Manse, 5th October 1821.

"DEAR SIR,—I have not yet seen or heard again from Principal Haldane, but I am determined to delay the election no longer. I have received another certificate in your favour from Mr Liston. It is now obvious that it lies between you and Mr Wallace. I have not yet spoken to the other trustees on the subject, but we must make up our minds this week. I believe I mentioned to you at Dollar the outline of the duty required, the salary, &c. I beg again to state to you, that though at first you, if elected, may not have above two, or at most three hours of teaching, yet the trustees reserve to themselves the right of enlarging the hours according to circumstances. The salary is £120, with a house, or £35 for the rent of a house, at the option of the trustees. The appointment is only during pleasure, but this need not stagger you; all the other masters are in the same predicament; and the reason of our making the appointment in these terms is, that we may not be embarrassed with the claims about right by any of the masters, in getting an Act of Parliament to regulate the whole. I mention these things, that there may be no complaint afterwards, in the event of your being elected. My chief purpose, however, in writing to you, is to ask how soon it would be in your power to come here and enter upon duty, if you were immediately elected. This is an important point, as we have delayed, perhaps, too long in making up our minds on the subject. May I ask the favour of you to write regarding the matter by return of post. I am, dear Sir, yours," &c.

(Signed) "ANDW. MYLNE."

Thereafter Dr Mylne addressed the pursuer as follows:

"Edinburgh, 15th November 1821.

"DEAR SIR,—I waited anxiously several days for your letter, being under the necessity of coming here to assist at the sacrament. On Friday last, before setting out, I held a meeting of the trustees, and sounded them on the subject of appointing you to the mathematical department of our Institution, when they left it entirely to myself. As I had not heard from you, no minute was made at the time, but from what I have mentioned, you may consider the appointment as made. I am extremely anxious that you should lose no time in coming to Dollar, and I shall then hand you a regular letter. I hope this will reach you without any further delay. Your letter, after lying some days at Dollar, only reached me yesterday. In haste, yours faithfully."

(Signed) "ANDREW MYLNE."

On 21st November 1821, the minute of meeting of the trustees bear:

"Dr Mylne then laid before the meeting a number of certificates for candidates for the mathematical class, and the trustees having examined the same, agree to appoint Mr Bell from Perth to the office, upon the same terms and limitations as the other teachers."

The pursuer went to the Dollar Institution, making no objection as to the nature of his appointment, and he continued teaching down to 1828, when the trustees relieved him of his duties as teacher from and after

May 1828, paying him his salary up to the following October.

In 1836, the pursuer brought this action against the defenders for reparation, by way of damages, for alleged injury, in respect of having been dismissed without cause shown, pleading—(1.) A teacher regularly elected by the trustees or managers of a public educational institution, cannot be dismissed from his situation except upon cause shown. (2.) Even if it were legal to make such election to be held only during pleasure, there was no such stipulation in the present instance, or at least it was expressly understood that the exercise of such a power was to be limited to the occurrence of a specific event, which event never took place.

The event contemplated, alluded to in the second plea, was said to be the procuring of an Act of Parliament; and in reference to the letter of Dr Mylne, in which the expression is contained, the pursuer attempted to show, by a critical analysis of the letter, that he could only be dismissed in respect of culpa; and that though apparently the appointment was at pleasure, it was so qualified by the terms of the first letter, that if no Act of Parliament were applied for, the appointment should be absolute.

The defenders pleaded—That there could be no doubt that the appointment was merely at pleasure, and that they had undoubted right to dismiss if they saw fit. They also pleaded, that, in the circumstances, they were warranted in dismissing the pursuer.

It seems unnecessary to advert to the cause of dismissal, as the action came to depend entirely on the law raised by the pursuer, and the circumstances were differently stated by the parties.

The case was sent to the jury roll, but the issue clerks refused to give an issue till the questions of law were disposed of. Thereafter, the Lord Ordinary ordered cases to report to the Court, in terms of the 65th section of the Act of Sederunt.

At advising on 5th June 1838, the Court sustained the defences, and assolizied the defenders.

The pursuer appealed pleading—That the Court of Session had no right or power to assolizie the defenders without a trial by jury. The interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary remitting the cause to the jury roll, to be tried by jury, was final and conclusive. This is expressly provided by the 15th section of the 59th Geo. III. cap. 35. The 12th section of this Act, which authorises cases to be remitted back, before trial, to the Court of Session, for the decision of questions of law or relevancy, regards only interlocutory judgments. It does not warrant the retransmission of the cause, in order to be dealt with by the Court of Session as not a jury cause, in order that the Court of Session may judge in it without trial by jury. The appellant might even maintain, that since the abolition of the Jury Court as a separate tribunal, the provision in the Act as to the retransmission of causes from the jury roll to the Court of Session, cannot be in operation. This was the purport of the Lord Chancellor's opinion in the case of Montgomery v. Boswell, April 1839.

Answered—The appellant has, in the correspondence produced, which is the foundation of his case, shown the groundlessness of his action. It was therefore clearly competent and right for the Court to dismiss the action, and it has been lately held in the House of Lords, in the case of Duncan, that when, before directing an issue, the case is in such a state as to enable the Court to disapprove of it, judgment ought to be given.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, I certainly regret that your Lordships' time should have been occupied in hearing more than the opening of this case. It is a question raised as to the course of practice in the Court of Session, arising out of the provisions of several Acts of Parliament, which have been made the subject of discussion. Upon the merits, there is scarcely anything which I can see in the case upon which any argument can be urged. The appellant was appointed assistant instructor and master in a certain department in a school established under the provisions of a gift of John M'Nab, in which he says,—"The other moiety or share I would have laid in the public funds, or some such security, on purpose to bring an annual income or interest for the benefit of a charity or school for the poor of the parish of Dollar, where I was born. That I give and bequeath to the minister and church of that parish for ever—say to the minister and church officers for the time being, and no other person shall have power to receive the annuity." No appointment is made by the author of the gift—no direction that there shall be a master, and that he shall have a certain income for his support and maintenance, but the property is given to the trustees, with as large a discretion as can be intrusted to any body of individuals,—the only direction being, that it shall be applied in the establishment of a school for the poor of a particular parish. In execution of the trust, the trustees established a school; and among the letters written to the appellant, there were three from Dr Mylne, who was negotiating with the appellant upon the subject of being appointed an instructor in the school, by one of which it is stated, that "the salary is £120, with a house, or £35 for the rent of a house, at the option of the trustees. The appointment is only during pleasure, but this need not stagger you; all the other masters are in the same predicament; and the reason of our making the appointment in these terms is, that we may not be embarrassed with the claims about right by any of the masters, in getting an Act of Parliament to regulate the whole." Subsequently to that, another letter was written, and the appellant accepts the office. But among other letters which he states in his summons, he does not state the part of the letter which is important, which states it to be an appointment only during pleasure, but states it thus: That, in a subsequent letter addressed by Dr Mylne to the pursuer, of date 5th October 1821, the salary is stated to be "£120, with a house, or £35 for the rent of a house, at the option of the trustees." He states so much of the letter as provides him with a salary, but omits that part of the letter containing the statement, that the office is only to be held during pleasure,—a mode of proceeding not much approved of in this country, and one which is wholly useless; because, suppressing a document can answer no useful purpose, although it may occasion additional expense and delay. Where a document contains the substance of a contract, it is useless to set it out partially. However, the pursuer was bound to set out that part which stated the salary, and which constituted a part of the contract; and we have the letter of the 5th of October alluded to. Then he says,—"that in a third letter from Dr Mylne, his appointment was announced to him in the following terms:—'Edinburgh, 15th November 1821.—DEAR SIR,—I waited anxiously several days for your letter, being under the necessity of coming here to assist at the sacrament. On Friday last, before setting out, I held a meeting of the trustees, and sounded them on the subject of appointing you to the mathematical department of our institution, when they left it entirely to myself. As I had not heard from you, no minute was made at the time; but from what I have mentioned, you may consider the appointment as made. I am extremely anxious that you should lose no time in coming to Dollar, and I shall then hand you a regular letter.' Now, that letter neither specifies the duration of the office nor the salary: that letter of itself constitutes no appointment. It does not inform the party of the tenure of his office, nor the salary he is to receive. It was quite unnecessary to do so. That was stated in the former letter; and these letters constitute the appointment, because there can be no doubt of the nature of the conditions which were understood. The salary was £120 a-year, but the master was to hold it during pleasure. Thus a point of law is raised. It is said that it was contrary to the law of Scotland. Why, these trustees have the same power as the author of the gift. They are bound merely to apply it to the erection of a school for the use of the poor in a particular parish. They appoint the salary, of which they are the judges; and they say that the office shall be during pleasure. It is not disputed that there is no law in Scotland to prevent parties in a private establishment appointing a master during pleasure. It would be very strange if there should be such a law; but, fortunately, it does not exist. There are some schools in Scotland, and in this country also, where masters have a freehold in their office, and many contests have arisen in consequence with the trustees, which have generally ended in reducing the benefits of the charity by the expenses of the contest; and where they have succeeded, they have generally fixed a very heavy burden upon the funds out of which relief was to be afforded to the poor. There are cases of both descriptions in both countries, but nothing throwing any doubt upon the power of persons administering a private charity to appoint persons to execute the office of master during pleasure. That is the foundation of the pursuer's title. If he does not show the Court a case in damages from having been removed, he fails in his case. He seems to have been well advised before the commencement of his suit, because he carefully avoids setting out that part of the letter which is fatal to his case. He comes before the Lord Ordinary in the first instance; and he ought to show a prima facie case of damage to be tried by a jury; but before that stage of the cause arrives, the real state of the case becomes known, and it is found that there is an apparent objection on the face of the document, which raises a doubt whether the appellant can be entitled to any thing. The Court of Session had the case before them, and they viewed the question not as a matter of fact in dispute; but upon the face of the very document—the foundation of the title stated by himself,—they saw there was no possible case to entitle him to any damages. Then it is said, though the Judges of the First Division saw that manifestly upon the face of the proceedings, it was not competent to them to deal with it as they have done,—namely, to decide against the pursuer. For what possible purpose could it be sent to them (it is admitted it is well sent to them) but to decide the point of law, and prevent its going to a trial by a jury? The Court saw—not upon disputed facts, but upon undisputed facts, and the pursuer's own showing—that it would be quite absurd, in a case in which the Court saw he could not recover, that he should go to a jury. There can be no course of practice to lead to such an absurdity; and so the Court of Session decided. Taking the documents upon which his case rested, they decided against him, and held he was not entitled to what he asked. It appears to me that this is a case of all others, since I have had a seat in this House, which ought not to have been brought here, and the appeal must therefore be dismissed, with costs.

Appeal dismissed, with costs.

First Division.—Lord Fullerton, Ordinary.—Deans and Dunlop, Appellant's Solicitors.—Richardson and Connell, Respondents' Solicitors.—[W.H.D.]

27th May 1841.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—(W.H.D.)

NO. 190.—WILLIAM DILL, Appellant, v. MAJOR-GENERAL SIR ROBERT HOUSTON and OTHERS (Alexander Houston's Trustees), Respondents.

Succession—Vesting—Faculty—Obligation—Husband and Wife—Held (reversing the judgment of the Court of Session), that a clause in a postnuptial contract of marriage, by which the husband bound himself to make payment to "his wife, or to any person or persons she shall appoint by a writing under her hand at any time in her lifetime, or without the consent of her husband, and that whether she survive or predecease him, and whether she have issue or not, of the sum of

SCOTTISH JURIST.

£3000 Sterling money, or such other lesser sum as she shall direct," vested the sum absolutely in her; and that, although she had not uplifted it during her life, nor disposed of it by any writing under her hand, it transmitted after her death to her next of kin.

The late Alexander Houston, of Clerkington, was married to Helen M'Kie, only daughter of the deceased Alexander M'Kie, merchant in Glasgow. She was then a minor, and possessed of considerable property. No settlements had been made previous to the marriage; but the rights of the parties were afterwards arranged by a postnuptial contract, executed in April 1785. By that contract Mr Houston bound and obliged himself, his heirs and executors, to pay to his wife, during her life, after his decease, in case she should survive him, a free annuity of £400, and to grant to her a liferent infestment over certain heritable property in security thereof. By the same contract he likewise bound himself

"to make payment to the said Mrs Helen Houston, his wife, or to any person or persons she shall appoint by a writing under her hand, at any time in her life, with or without the consent of her said husband—and that whether she survive or predecease him, and whether she have issue or not—of the sum of £3000 Sterling money, or such other lesser sum as she shall direct, and that at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of her said husband, in case he shall survive her, or shall predecease her without leaving issue of the marriage, or at the first of these two terms next after the failure of the issue of the marriage, in case he shall predecease her leaving issue who shall fall before her, or at the first of these two terms next after her decease, in case she shall survive him leaving issue of the marriage then existing, or at any term of Whitsunday or Martinmas, after any of these events respectively; so that it shall not be in the power of the said Mrs Helen Houston, or the persons to whom she shall appoint the foresaid sum of £3000, or any part thereof, to be paid, to uplift the same during the life of the said Alexander Houston, or even after his death, during the joint existence of the said Mrs Helen Houston and the issue of this marriage, and with 4s. of penalty for each pound of principal, in case of failure; and the legal interest of the said principal sum, from the term at which the same shall be appointed to be paid, during the non-payment of the same. But with this provision alwise, as it is hereby specially provided and declared, that in case the said Mrs Helen Houston shall happen to survive her said husband and the issue of the marriage, and shall ask and recover payment of all or any part of the foresaid sum of £3000 Sterling, then, and from thenceforth, her said liferent annuity of £400 Sterling shall suffer such a restriction as shall be equal to the legal interest for the time of the principal sum which she shall so recover."

It was likewise provided that Mrs Houston, in the event of her survivance, should have £600 in name of furniture and mournings; and these provisions were declared to be in full satisfaction of all other claims, legal or conventional, which she could ask or demand through the death of her husband.

It was further mentioned in the contract, that Mr and Mrs Houston had, of the date thereof, granted a disposition to Robert Dunmure, Esq., younger of Kelvin-side, merchant in Glasgow, uncle of the said Mrs Helen Houston; Robert Houston, Esq., merchant in Glasgow, brother of the said Alexander Houston; and David Erskine, clerk to the Signet, as trustees for the said Alexander and Mrs Helen Houston, and the issue of this marriage, of the whole lands, heritages, debts, sums of money, and other estates and effects whatsoever, as well heritable as moveable, which belonged or was resting and owing to the said Mrs Helen Houston at the time of her marriage with the said Alexander Houston, to the end and intent that the said trustees might, in the first place, secure to the said Mrs Helen Houston upon land or other property, heritable security for the foresaid annuity of £400 Sterling, to be restricted in manner before mentioned; and, in the next place, that, after the said Mrs Helen Houston was so secured, the said trustees should convey the said trust-funds, under the burden of the foresaid annuity, to the said Alexander Houston in liferent, and to the child or children of the marriage between him and the said Mrs Helen Houston in fee; whom failing, to the said Alexander Houston and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, but always with and under the burden of the payment of the foresaid sum of £3000 Sterling, thereby provided to be paid to the said Mrs Helen Houston and her foresaids, in manner before mentioned; but which burden should only be personal on the said Alexander Houston, and his foresaids having right to the said estate for the time, so as to oblige them to relieve the other heirs of the said Alexander Houston of the payment of the said sum of £3000, or any part thereof, but nowise real upon the said trust-estate itself.

In 1816, Mr Houston executed a disposition and settlement in his wife's favour, whereby he settled upon her an additional annuity of £600, over and above her former provision. He likewise conveyed to her a liferent right to the mansion-house and offices of Clerkington, with the lawn, garden, park, shrubberies, &c., amounting to about seventy-eight acres. In the following year, Mr Houston executed a general trust-disposition of his whole property, heritable and moveable, in favour of the defenders.

The marriage was dissolved, by the death of Mr Houston, on the 22d March 1822, without issue; and thereafter, Mrs Houston continued to occupy the house of Clerkington until her death.

Mrs Houston died on the 13th May 1837, without having uplifted, or executed any appointment relative to the sum of £3000 during her husband's lifetime or after his death. The only deed of settlement executed by her, was a will, dated 25th February 1804, whereby she bequeathed to the person or persons who, upon her death, should succeed to the estate of Clerkington as heir of her husband, the whole furniture and effects of every kind which should be in the house of Clerkington at her death. Her nearest of kin having brought this action against Mr Houston's trustees, concluding for payment of the £3000, the defenders pleaded—1. Nothing was conveyed to the late Mrs Houston but a faculty or power to uplift or dispose of, by a writing under her hand, the whole or any lesser part of the sum of £3000. That faculty was personal to herself; and as she never exercised it during her life, it fell by her death; and as the sum of £3000 never vested in her during her life, it could not be taken up or claimed by her executors ab intestato; and, 2. As Mrs Houston left a will which contained no reference to this sum of £3000, it must be presumed that she purposely abstained from exercising the faculty, and from disposing of the whole, or any part of the aforesaid sum.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"27th February 1839.—The Lord Ordinary having heard the counsel for the parties on the closed record, writes produced, and whole process, repels the defences, and decerns in terms of the conclusions of the libel; finds expenses due; allows an account thereof to be given in, and remits the same, when lodged, to the auditor for his taxation and report.

"Note.—This case is not without difficulty, from the singularity of the terms in which the provision of £3000, in the post-nuptial contract, is conceived. But, on the whole, the Lord Ordinary has come to be satisfied, that according to the just construction and true meaning of that deed, the said provision was fully vested in the widow, and became, to all intents and purposes, her property, if not from the first constitution of the trust, at all events at the first term after the death of her husband, without surviving issue of the marriage. Even after that time, it is indisputable that she had all the rights and powers over this sum, which would be enumerated in the most comprehensive definition of absolute and entire property. She could call it up as freely and directly as if she had herself lodged it in a bank on a deposit-receipt. She could spend or lend it out anew to the original trustees, or to any other party, without calling it up herself. She could assign and make over the instant right to it, onerously or gratuitously, mortis causa or inter vivos, to any one she chose. If she married a second time, the entire right to it would pass to her new husband jure mariti, whether she wished it or not; and, finally, her own creditors, or the creditors of such second husband, could attach, pursue for, and recover it, in spite of both her and the defenders. It is difficult for the Lord Ordinary to conceive how a fund over which she had thus all the imaginable rights of a proprietor, should yet not be vested in her, so as to entitle her next of kin to succeed to it ab intestato.

"The opposite proposition, however, is rested on two points—first, and principally, on the omission of the ordinary destination in such provisions to the 'heirs, executors and assignees' of the wife, and the introduction, in its stead, of a precise specification of a person to be nominated in a writing under her hand, as the only party who was to take after her, or in her right; from which it is alleged that an absolute exclusion of her successors ab intestato, is necessarily to be inferred. The second, or corroborative argument on the part of the defenders, is derived from the apparent uselessness of this anxious power of nomination and appointment, if the wife was herself vested with the full right of property, which must necessarily have carried such a power, and a great deal more. When duly considered, however, neither of these views appears to be maintainable.

"The mere omission of the ordinary remainder to heirs, executors and assignees, is plainly of no consequence, where the words are sufficient to carry a direct (and not contingent) right of property to the person actually named, especially in the case of a mutual and onerous provision like that in a contract of marriage; while the specific power to nominate an assignee or successor, even during the life of the husband, might well have been thought not to follow from the mere constitution or vesting of the right itself in the person of a married woman. Even if it were to be held, therefore, that the wife was the proper beneficiary as to this sum, from the first constitution of the trust, the insertion of this specific power of appointment would not be either superfluous or unaccountable; since, without it, no such power could be competently exercised during the subsistence of the marriage.

"But the Lord Ordinary conceives that the best explanation of this perplexing part of the deed is to be found in the supposition, that it was understood by the parties to it (whether that view was legally correct or not), that the right to this £3000 would not vest fully in the wife during the life of the husband, or of children by whom she was survived, nor until the full right to demand payment of it had opened to her, free of all conditions or qualifications, by her being the only survivor. How the law would have construed the deed, if the first had been the case that occurred, it is not now absolutely necessary to determine, though it is easy to see that the claim of her representatives would then have been encumbered with difficulties to which it is not now liable.

"If she had died before her husband, and without making any appointment, it might obviously have been maintained that the property was still in the trustees, and that all the right she had ever over it, was truly a mere power or faculty to affect its ultimate vesting when the proper time arrived, by the death of the husband; and that if she predeceased him, without executing that power or exercising that faculty, it would remain with the trustees for the general trust-purposes, and would never be claimed by the legal representatives, as having never been truly in her person.

"The Lord Ordinary thinks the tenor of the deed is sufficiently explained by assuming that this was the view of the case entertained by the framer of it. But he is also of opinion that it is the sound and the true view. By the constitution of trust, the vesting of all future and contingent interests may be competently suspended, especially in mere money provisions. And so long as all actual rights are contingent as well as future, it will generally hold that they are so suspended, and that, in the interim, there is no vested property but in the trustees. Now, the wife was here to have no right to draw this money during the life of her husband, or even after his death, while issue of the marriage survived. Her own actual or beneficial right to it, therefore, was truly contingent, and might never have opened in her life; and if the property consequently remained vested in the trustees, while it was still in contemplation to give her a power to dispose of it by special deed; and not only was such a provision, as actually occurs in this contract, necessary, but it was obviously the fittest and most natural way of effecting that purpose; and what was given was truly nothing more than a power or faculty to affect a subject which did not belong to her, which must be exercised in terminis, in order to be available, and left nothing to be taken up by her representatives ab intestato, if she died without so exercising it.

"But after the husband's predecease without issue of the marriage, the whole aspect and state of the case was changed. There was no longer any contingency, or even futurity, in the description of her right; all pretence for a suspensive or fiduciary vesting in the trustees, as for uncertain beneficiaries, was at an end, and they were direct and full debtors to her, and to her alone, for the money. It seems really impossible, therefore, to doubt that the full property was then vested in her; and if it was so vested, it seems plain that, without a proper clause of return, or a most express exclusion of her representatives ab intestato, it must go to those representatives.

"To infer or construe such a clause of return, or such an exclusion out of the granting of a specific power of assignment, would be difficult, under any circumstances, and however hard it might be to account, on any other assumption, for the granting of such a power. But if there was no proper vested right in the wife herself till after the death of the husband and children, and if her ever having any such right was consequently a matter of contingency, the necessity and the object of granting that power, with a view to one result of the contingency, is at once apparent, and the whole difficulty of the case is solved, in the Lord Ordinary's apprehension, by holding that the power was granted to enable her to affect the fund in question, in the event of its never vesting in her, but flew off and became null and inoperative as soon as the object or necessity of it ceased by the full right to it vesting, by her sole survivance, in herself. The expression is not so lucid, perhaps, as might be desired, but the object and purpose are thought to be plain enough; and, at all events, the Lord Ordinary can never hold that the constitution of a special power which might be necessary in certain events, can either bar the vesting of a right in which all the imaginable tests and attributes of a vested right are combined, or imply a clause of return, or a capricious and most improbable exclusion of legal heirs or representatives."

The defenders reclaimed, and counsel were heard on 22d November 1839. The Court then delayed advising the cause. At advising on 7th December 1839, the Court recalled the interlocutor, and assoiled the defenders, but without finding them entitled to expenses.

The claim having, subsequently to the raising of the action, been assigned by Mr Houston's executors to Mr Dill, writer in Newton-Stewart, he appealed against this judgment.

Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, the question in this cause arises between the representatives of the wife, and the representatives of the husband; and the question is, whether a sum of £3000, which is the subject of a postnuptial settlement, in the event which has happened, of the husband dying first, and there being no issue of the marriage, vests in the representatives of the wife, or vests in the representatives of the husband? The Lord Ordinary was of opinion that the estate of the wife was entitled. When it came before the Inner-House, the learned Judges there were of opinion that it belonged to the estate of the husband, and that the title of the wife had never become, under the terms of the settlement, absolute, so as to give her representatives a title to the sum of £3000. My Lords, this, of course, can only be ascertained from an accurate examination of the terms of the settlement. The obscurity has arisen from an attempt, on the part of the individual who framed the settlement, to express a great deal more within one sentence than one sentence was capable of bearing, so as to be sufficiently explicit to ascertain the rights of the parties without difficulty. Now, it is quite clear that there were four events contemplated—the death of the wife, leaving her husband surviving, or the death of the husband, leaving the wife surviving. Those were two of the events. The two others would be either of those events happening—there being or there not being children; so that there were four contingencies that the parties had evidently in contemplation. Having those four events in contemplation, the provision was expressed in these terms: In the first place, an annuity of £400 a-year was provided for the wife for her life; and there was this proviso added, that in case the wife "shall, at any time during her life, uplift the sum of £3000 Sterling, therein provided to be paid to her in manner hereinafter mentioned, or any part thereof, then and from thenceforth the said annuity of £400 Sterling, provided to the said Mrs Helen Houston, as said is, shall suffer such a restriction and abatement as shall be equal to the legal interest for the time of the sum so to be uplifted by her." Then comes the covenant by the husband as to the £3000: And "the said Alexander Houston hereby binds and obliges himself, and his forebears, to make payment to the said Mrs Helen Houston, his wife, or to any person or persons she shall appoint by a writing under her hand, at any time in her life, with or without the consent of her said husband, and that whether she survive or predecease him, and whether she have issue or not, of the sum of £3000 Sterling money, or such other lesser sum as she shall direct, and that at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of her said husband, in case he shall survive her, or shall predecease her without leaving issue of the marriage, or at the first of these two terms next after the failure of the issue of the marriage, in case he shall predecease her leaving issue, who shall fail before her, or at the first of these two terms next after her decease, in case she shall survive him, leaving issue of the marriage then existing, or at any term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after any of these events respectively; so that it shall not be in the power of the said Mrs Helen Houston, or the persons to whom she shall appoint the foresaid sum of £3000, or any part thereof, to be paid, to uplift the same during the life of the said Alexander Houston, or even after his death, during the joint existence of the said Mrs Helen Houston and the issue of this marriage, and with four shillings of penalty for each pound of principal in case of failure, and the legal interest of the said principal sum from the term at which the same shall be appointed to be paid during the non-payment of the same; but with this provision alwise, as it is hereby specially provided and declared, that in case the said Mrs Helen Houston shall happen to survive her said husband, and the issue of the marriage, and shall ask and recover payment of all or of any part of the foresaid sum of £3000 Sterling, then, and from thenceforth, her said life rent annuity of £400 Sterling shall suffer such a restriction as shall be equal to the legal interest for the time of the principal sum which she shall so recover." Now, certainly, on reading that sentence, there is great confusion apparently in the construction of it, and a great variety of events are contemplated which are endeavoured to be provided for in the same sentence. Now, my Lords, the parties not only had those four events to provide against, but they evidently had in contemplation, that although the enjoyment of the £3000 was postponed, the wife, during the life of the husband, should have the power of bestowing that, or any part of that sum, upon any person she might please; and it was necessary, therefore, to provide that she should have that power; for although it may be that she might, by will, have had that power without any special provision, she could not have had it, except with the consent of her husband, by any deed executed inter vivos. It was necessary, therefore, in order to give to the wife that power over the property which the parties evidently intended her to have, that there should be an express provision in the settlement that she should have the power, during the life of the husband, of giving a future interest in the property in question to any person she might please. There were, therefore, these four events to be provided for, and there was also a power to be reserved to the wife of disposing of the principal, or any part of it that she might please, during the time of coverture. My Lords, these several provisions, if they had been provided for in different clauses of the settlement, would no doubt have been expressed in very different terms from those which we find upon the face of this deed. But the parties have endeavoured to express all under one provision; and from thence, as it appears to me, has arisen the obscurity. But the mode of dealing with a case of this sort is, first of all, to look at the event which has happened, and then to see whether that part of the deed which is in question in the present discussion, does or does not embrace within itself the means of ascertaining the intentions of the parties in that particular event. If that be sufficiently clear, it is not material whether the other events which have not occurred, are or are not provided for with a degree of obscurity, which, if those events had happened, might have created considerable difficulty as to the construction of the settlement. Now, the event that has happened is the death of the husband, leaving the wife, and there being no issue of the marriage. I have only to call your Lordships' attention to the different provisions to be found in this instrument relative to that state of circumstances; and the question for your Lordships will be, whether there are not to be found upon the face of this instrument, sufficient words of gift to the wife, in the event which has taken place. My Lords, in calling your attention to the first part of this settlement, I shall read it divested as far as possible of the other provisions for contemplated events which have not taken place. It begins by the husband binding himself to make payment to the wife of the sum of £3000 Sterling money at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas next after the death of the husband, if he shall predecease her without leaving issue of the marriage. All those words are to be found in the sentence. They are mixed up, it is true, with other words, which other words contemplate other events; but those words are to be found upon the face of the settlement, and those words contemplate the event which has taken place. Now those words, if they stood by themselves, would leave no doubt or ambiguity whatever, because they are so expressed as to be amply sufficient to bestow upon the wife, in the event which has happened—namely, her surviving the husband without issue—the sum in question. Then, is any ambiguity thrown upon this intention by the different parts of this instrument? There can be no ambiguity thrown upon this gift by the provisions made for other events that have not taken place; or, if there were any ambiguity from those provisions, in contemplation of other events, it must be of a very cogent nature, in order to destroy the effect of the terms which are found in this part of the deed. But I do not find that there are any words which throw any doubt upon the intention of the parties, in contemplating the event which has happened; but, on the contrary, I find very distinct provisions in this deed which very much confirm this construction of the deed, and to my mind, leave no doubt of that being the intention of the parties. For I find in a subsequent provision these words: that it shall not be in the power of the wife, "or the persons to whom she shall appoint the sum of £3000, or any part thereof, to be paid, to uplift the same during the life of Alexander Houston, or even after his death, during the joint existence of Mrs Helen Houston and the issue of this marriage." That contemplates, therefore, the wife being entitled; but in case of there being children of the marriage, it provides, that during the lives of those children, the wife shall not have the power of uplifting the £3000, but, after the expiration of the lives of those children, it is a necessary inference that that power was to exist in her of uplifting. But that is not so strongly expressed in this part of the sentence as it is in the following, where it is said, that in case the wife "shall happen to survive her husband and the issue of the marriage, and shall ask and recover payment of all or any part of the sum of £3000, then, and from thenceforth," her annuity shall suffer diminution to that extent. Now, that contemplates the precise event which has happened. It contemplates the wife surviving, and there being no issue of the marriage; and in that state of circumstances, which is the precise state of circumstances which has happened, it assumes that she would have the power of asking for, and recovering that £3000 or any part of it; and all that it provides is this, that in that event, that is, if she shall think proper to ask for, and demand that £3000, or any part of it, then the £400 a-year which she was entitled to for life, shall suffer a diminution equal to the amount of the interest of the sum she shall so recover. Now, although the party contemplated that if the wife survived, and there should be no children, she should have a right to the £3000, or any part of it, that she should not exercise that right, and demand payment, was very natural, because she had £400 a-year during her own life; and unless she had some occasion for the employment of the capital, her income would not be benefited by applying for the £3000, or any part of it, because she could not apply for the £3000, or any part of it, without sustaining a corresponding diminution in her income of £400 a-year. It was very natural, therefore, that unless some particular occasion had occurred which made her wish to have control over the capital, she should leave the fund in the state in which her husband had left it, namely, as a charge upon his property.—she receiving an income which would not be increased by the receipt of any part of the £3000. But then the words, "any part of it," were very much relied upon in the argument. It was said that it is clear that this party contemplated her exercising some power by which she was to receive part of the £3000. It is obviously necessary that those words should be introduced; because the object was not only to give her power over the whole, which would include a power over any part, but it was contemplated that she might, during her husband's lifetime, have exercised the power which the instrument gave her, of transferring her right to part of the sum to somebody else, and the individual, therefore, to whom she might thus transfer her right to part, would be entitled to demand, not the £3000, but to demand so much of the £3000 as he obtained through the power that was so reserved to the wife. It appears to me, therefore, that the introduction of those words refers to those who might claim through the wife, or to the wife herself, in the case of her demanding only part of the £3000. If she thought proper to demand only part, then, of course, her annuity of £400 a-year would be diminished, not by the interest of the whole £3000, but by so much as she might ask for and demand of it. She might ask for £1000 out of it. The £1000 might be paid, and of course the annuity would then be diminished by the amount of the interest of £1000, and not by the amount of the interest of £3000. These words, found in the instrument, therefore, do not at all appear to me to shake the construction of what is to be found in the instrument, as applicable to the event which has taken place. There are certainly to be found in this deed, terms of gift directly applying to the case which has occurred; and when there is found upon the face of an instrument a clear and distinct expression of the intention of the party, those terms of gift are not to be superseded by ambiguities not having reference to the particular state of circumstances which has occurred, but to other events which have not occurred, and which, therefore, call for no decision. My Lords, for these reasons, I am of opinion that the construction put upon this instrument by the Lord Ordinary was correct, and that the construction put upon it by the Inner-House was not correct. I shall therefore move your Lordships to reverse the interlocutor appealed from, and in its place, to substitute the interlocutor pronounced by the Lord Ordinary.

Interlocutor reversed.

No. 191.—LIEUT.-COL. H. F. HOLCOMBE, Advocator,
v. JOHN STEWART, Respondent.

Proof—Contract—Advocation.

This action was brought against the advocator for payment of the value of certain materials furnished, sums advanced, and personal expenses incurred by the respondent, in the character of superintendent in the erection of a house at Riemore, then the property of the advocator, together with a charge for making out specification and plans, and for superintendence. The advocator did not deny the furnishings, payments, or expenses, as detailed in the account libelled on, but rested his defence on the existence of a contract between him and the pursuer, under which, he alleged, the defender acted in the character of contractor, and not of superintendent, and that the amount sued for was included in the contract price, on an accounting, for which, it was alleged, the respondent had been overpaid, and was further liable in damages for an alleged breach of contract.

After a proof, the Sheriff held that there was no evidence in support of the defence, and accordingly decreed in terms of the libel. In an advocation, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

“3d December 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the record, advocates the cause; recalls the interlocutors complained of: Finds that the action, as laid in the summons, proceeds on the statement and on the principle that the pursuer was the superintendent of the building in question, and not the contractor: Finds that the evidence does not establish this, but on the contrary, establishes that he was the contractor, and not the superintendent: Therefore, on this ground of fact, sustains the defences, assoilzies the defender, and decrees, but without prejudice to any other action or proceeding which the pursuer may think proper to adopt as contractor, or to the defences thereto: Finds the respondent liable in expenses, both in this and in the Inferior Court; appoints accounts thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits the same to the auditor to tax and to report.

“Note.—The transaction was gone about with such excessive looseness that it is very difficult to arrive at any satisfactory result about it. But on the whole, the Lord Ordinary cannot reconcile the evidence, but particularly the written evidence, to the idea of the respondent having only been a superintendent. He can reconcile it, however, to the idea of his having been contractor, though under a contract not strictly framed—materially deviated from—and finally broken. All that the pursuer was entitled to under this contract, which made provision for deviations, it is still open to him to seek, only not under this action.”

On a reclaiming note, the Court adhered.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 192.—JAMES STEVENSON, Pursuer, v. JOHN LOVE and SAMUEL STEVENSON, Defenders.

Settlement—Lease—Assignment—Circumstances in which a lease for thirty-eight years, and not expressly secluding assignees, was held not to be assignable.

On 4th July 1814, Hugh Stevenson, by disposition and deed of settlement, disposed his lands of Threepwood, under certain burdens and declarations, to three of his sons, James, Andrew and Samuel Stevenson. Of the same date he executed a tack of the said lands in favour of two of these sons, Andrew and Samuel, equally between them, and failing either of them without heirs of his own body, to the survivor and his heirs. This lease, of which absolute warrandice was given, was to endure for thirty-eight years from its date, but there was specially excepted from it such part of the lands as had been, or might afterwards be let to two other sons, Robert and John Stevenson. In consideration of this lease, Andrew and Samuel Stevenson bound themselves, jointly and severally, and the heirs of their bodies, whom failing, the survivor of them and his heirs and successors, to make payment, after their father's death, 1st, of an annuity of £10 to their mother during her life; 2d, of an annuity of £5 (to be increased after their mother's death to £6,) to their brother James, or failing him to his children, during the subsistence of the lease; 3d, of an annuity of £4 to their sister Elizabeth, or conditionally to her children; farther, to make payment of an heritable bond of £300, secured over the lands in favour of James Wilson, at any time during the currency of the lease, when the same was demanded, or if not demanded, to pay the interest of the principal sum as it should fall due, from and after their father's death; and lastly, to make regular payment of the whole public and parish burdens on the lands,—it being declared that the above payments were to be in full of all tack-duty. It was also declared that the disponees, James, Andrew and Samuel Stevenson, “shall not be entitled to enter into possession thereof as proprietors during the bail space of this tack, but the said Andrew and Samuel Stevenson shall be bound and obliged, as by acceptation hereof they bind and oblige themselves, to hold the occupancy thereof in the character of tenants, in manner and for the purposes before mentioned; declaring that they shall not be bound to any rule of cultivation or management during this tack, but shall be left to manage the same as they may think proper; but they shall be prohibited from cutting any trees now growing on said lands of Threepwood, unless they have planted three for each one they chose to cut down; and declaring, that the annuity to be paid to the said James Stevenson shall be in full to him of all rent or other interest he can have in the premises during the existence of this lease. And as it is the evident intention of the said Hugh Stevenson, by this deed, to make provision for payment of the foresaid annuities, heritable debts, and public burdens, during the said space, in order that the lands may be disburdened at the expiry of this lease, it is hereby expressly provided and declared, that the said James, Andrew, and Samuel Stevenson shall not be empowered by any voluntary deed of their own to defeat this purpose, by renouncing or cancelling this lease, or by entering into any agreement in prejudice hereof, or by contracting debts so as to lay the foresaid lands open to be evicted from them; declaring that all such deeds, agreements, debts, and vouchers thereof, shall be null and void, and of no force whatever, to the effect of infringing this lease; reserving, however, to the said Hugh Stevenson, power and faculty to alter the same as he may see cause at any period during his life, and even on death-bed.”

To this deed Hugh Stevenson added a codicil in 1818, farther burdening his sons, Andrew and Samuel, with a payment of £5 to his daughter Elizabeth, the first term after his death, and making a new arrangement as to her annuity of £4, stipulated by the lease. Previous to Hugh Stevenson's death, the heritable bond of £300 was called up by the creditor, and the money with which it was paid was procured by a bill drawn on, and accepted by the father and his four sons, to whom he granted a letter, acknowledging that the sum contained in the bill was wholly his debt. On Hugh Stevenson's death in 1819, the three disponees took infeftment in the lands; while two of them, Andrew and Samuel, continued their possession under the lease till, by the death of Andrew, unmarried, in 1830, Samuel became sole tenant. At the same time, James and Samuel made up titles to their deceased brother's share of the lands, each of them thus becoming pro indiviso proprietor of the half. In 1835, the affairs of Samuel Stevenson having become embarrassed, his brother James Stevenson came forward to assist him, and obtained, in security of his advances, a disposition to Samuel's pro indiviso half of the lands, and an assignation to the tack. In this way James Stevenson became sole proprietor both of the lands and lease, and possessed accordingly till 1840, when he received payment of his advances from Samuel, who thereupon obtained a reconveyance to his share of the lands, and a retrocession to the lease. Shortly afterwards, Samuel Stevenson disposed his share of the lands, and assigned the lease to John Love for £1500,—the assignation providing and declaring,

"that the said John Love and his foresaids shall be bound and obliged, as he by acceptance hereof binds and obliges himself and his foresaids, to make payment to the person or persons entitled to receive the same, of the whole rents, annuities, and other sums stipulated by the foresaid tack to be paid by me and my foresaids, and also to perform, implement, and fulfil the whole other obligations and prestations incumbent on me by the said tack, and that yearly during the whole space thereof, and at the terms and times therein respectively specified."

Love having taken infeftment on the disposition, and entered to possession under the tack, James Stevenson brought the present action of reduction, declarator, &c., in which he called John Love and Samuel Stevenson as defenders, and concluded for reduction of the assignation, and any subtacks granted under it, on the following grounds:—Primo, (formal).

"Secundo, The original tack or lease was granted by the said Hugh Stevenson to his said sons, Andrew and Samuel, and to the survivor of them, and was truly a trust for family purposes, with which an assignation to a stranger would be altogether inconsistent, and destructive of the object and intentions of the granter; and the subjects were let to the deceased Andrew Stevenson and the said Samuel Stevenson equally between them; and failing either of them, without heirs of his own body, to the survivor and his heirs, but were not let to his assignees; and the right to the predeceasing brother's share and interest descended, therefore, to the survivor alone, and the defender, the said Samuel Stevenson, had no power to convey the right to any third party; so that the said assignation in favour of the other defender, the said John Love, was altogether ultra vires of the said Samuel Stevenson. Tertio, The tack-duty, or the payments stipulated to be made by the said Andrew and Samuel Stevenson in lieu of tack-duty, were not such adequate payments as would have been demanded from the defender, or any third party to whom the lands might have been let; and certain clauses contained in the tack are inconsistent with, and altogether exclude, any assignation thereof to a third party." "Quarto, The said lease, granted by the said deceased Hugh Stevenson to the said deceased Andrew Stevenson and the said Samuel Stevenson, and the survivor of them, imposed certain obligations on the said Andrew and Samuel Stevenson, which, by their acceptance of the said lease, they bound themselves to perform, and which the said Samuel Stevenson, as the survivor, is now liable to perform and fulfil; in particular, they were both bound to abide by their character of tenants, to avoid the contraction of debts, and to pay the whole debts specified in the lease, from the profits of the lease itself, so as to leave the fee of the lands clear and disencumbered of debts at the expiry of the lease, and the said Samuel Stevenson, defender, had no right or title to grant the said assignation to the said defender, John Love, for the purpose of endeavouring to relieve himself of the said obligations, or any other purpose inconsistent with the provisions made by the said deceased Hugh Stevenson, as aforesaid. Quinto, The said John Love, who resides in the immediate neighbourhood of the other defender, and was intimately acquainted with the family affairs, and with the intention of the said Hugh Stevenson, was perfectly aware of the circumstances in which the said lease was originally granted, and did not act in bona fide in the transaction made with the said Samuel Stevenson, whereby he acquired the said assignation, but, on the contrary, must be held as a conjunct and confident person with him, and not an onerous assignee of the said lease."

The defenders pleaded—1. The first reason of reduction is groundless, in respect the deed of disposition and assignation challenged is in every way regular and formal. 2. The second reason of reduction is also groundless, in respect—(1.) The original tack, both by its endurance and by its general terms, was sua natura assignable or transferable; and, (2.) It contained no express nor implied prohibition against assignation, and the defender, Mr Love, was entitled to deal with the tenant, relying upon the terms of, and legal construction of the lease, without reference to any understanding or arrangement not appearing ex facie of the tack. 3. The third reason of reduction is groundless, in respect—(1.) The payments imposed upon the tenants were quite adequate. (2.) The supposed inadequacy of the payments imposed upon the tenants could never render the lease unassignable. (3.) The present pursuer has no interest to maintain any such plea; and (lastly), He is barred personali exceptione from maintaining such a plea, in respect he himself actually took a transference of the tack from Samuel Stevenson. 4. The fourth reason of reduction is groundless, in respect the defenders have not attempted to elide or violate any of the payments or obligations imposed by the tack, all of which are anxiously secured by the transaction challenged. 5. The fifth reason of reduction is likewise groundless, in respect—(1.) The defender, Mr Love, received the assignation sought to be reduced in perfect bona fides, and for full consideration; and, (2.) The allegation in the reason is altogether irrelevant at the instance of the present pursuer.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"19th February 1842.—Having heard parties on the reductive conclusion, Repels the defences against that conclusion, and decerns in terms thereof: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses under this branch of the discussion; Appoints an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits to the auditor to tax the same, and to report."

"Note.—The Lord Ordinary thinks, that considering the terms and intention of the lease, it can only be construed as containing a virtual exclusion of assignees."

The defenders reclaimed:

When the cause was advised, both Lord Gillies and Lord Fullerton being absent, Lord Jeffrey was called in to make a quorum.

Lord President.—After careful consideration, I am not able to see any grounds for altering the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. The disposition by Hugh Stevenson in favour of his three sons, and the lease or deed of the same date in favour of two of them as tenants, compose an arrangement very much of the nature of a family settlement. The deed in favour of the two sons contains many of the clauses of style, and much of the common phraseology of a lease, but within the four corners of it are to be found many clauses, and reservations, and expressions of intention altogether inconsistent with an ordinary lease, and with the rules of law applicable to such a lease. It is true it bears to be for thirty-eight years, and in the ordinary case, as there is no seclusion of assignees, would be assignable; but then the obligations imposed are of a kind which appear to exclude the idea of assignation, at least to a stranger. It is given to the two sons, and failing one of them without issue, to the "survivor and his successors." Why not to his assignees? The deed is drawn by a professional man, who must have known this legal term, but who, instead of it, uses special terms for the purpose of showing that there was a special predilection for the sons. Then look to the particular clause as to possession. They are to possess as tenants only, and not as proprietors. Why? for the purpose of carrying out the intentions of the father. But is it not clear, that if they were not to possess as proprietors, they were not permitted to assign, since the necessary result of assigning would be to extinguish their possession as tenants, and compel them to continue it as proprietors only. Another material clause, showing the predilection for the sons, is that which gives them unlimited power to manage the cultivation in any way they pleased. Is it possible to believe the father would have given such a power, if he had supposed that the lease might pass, by assignation, into the hands of strangers, who, if they chose, might reduce the soil to a mere caput mortuum? Looking at the whole construction of the deed, as containing clauses altogether inconsistent with an ordinary lease: for example, the reserved power of the grantor to alter as he might see cause—a power, too, which he actually exercised by appending a codicil.—I am convinced that the Lord Ordinary has decided correctly in regarding it as a mere family settlement—by its very nature excluding the idea of assignation.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. The defenders maintain the right to assign, on the ground that a lease for thirty-eight years is legally assignable. Now, it is fixed that when an assignation is effectually made, the assignor is liberated, and the assignee takes his place. Is the present a case in which that can be done? I think it is not. Assignation is substantially excluded by the indicated intentions of the grantor or testator, or whatever he may be called. It was not truly and substantially a lease—certainly not such a lease as would stand good against singular successors under the Act of Parliament. But it is said that it was a quasi lease. If it was so for its whole endurance, it must have been during the lifetime of the grantor as well as after his death. But during his lifetime, the grant was not only revocable, but liable to any burdens he might be pleased to impose. Could any man imagine a grant of that sort assignable? Though called a lease, it was evidently a mere family arrangement. One remarkable feature of the deed, considered as a lease, is, that during the grantor's lifetime there was no rent. Then look to the kind of obligation laid on the tenants as to management. They are laid under no restriction, but are to manage at pleasure. Is that a power to be made over to a stranger for a price? Such a power a father might grant to his own son, or a joint proprietor, knowing that in such hands it would be safe; but it is not supposable that he would grant it to a stranger. There is a clause in the deed barring the tenants from renouncing the lease. Why so? If it could be assigned, one would think it might also be renounced, as being a milder act than assignation; but yet this act is expressly barred. The whole deed is framed in a manner implying that the right conferred by it was not assignable. Indeed several of its clauses appear to have been framed for the express purpose of preventing assignation.

Lord Jeffrey.—I concur in the view taken by your Lordships, and generally on the same grounds; but there is one separate ground to which I may advert, as showing that the deed was no lease at all in the sense of an onerous contract, but was merely a gift by a proprietor to his sons. It is in the form of a lease; but there is no pretext for calling it a lease, at least during the four or five years of the father's survivance after the deed was granted. During that time, not only was the deed revocable, but it wants the essentialia of a lease, inasmuch as it contains no stipulation for payment of rent—all payments being expressly postponed to the father's death. The effect of this consideration is to cut off several years from the duration of the lease, and bring it within the period which, according to our authorities, excludes assignation. But the substantive objection to the defenders' plea rests on a wider basis. The deed is called a lease by a mere misnomer; for I agree with your Lordships that the disposition and other deed, which continually refer to each other, are to be regarded as one family settlement, in which family arrangements are made for the sake of the family. In one word, the object of the deeds was to regulate the father's succession, and they were accordingly so construed both before his death and after. The nature of the burdens imposed, viz, certain annuities intra familiam,—the power to manage the lands without restriction as to cultivation,—and the reservation of the grantor to recal the deed on deathbed—all combine to show that the deed cannot be regarded as one of those ordinary leases to which the rule of law as to assignation admits of being applied. I am clear for affirming the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

The Court adhered.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G. D. F.)

No. 193.—The TRUSTEES of the late MARQUIS of BREADALBANE, Raisers, v. HIS GRACE RICHARD PLANTAGENET DUKE of BUCKINGHAM and CHANDOS, her GRACE the DUCHESS of BUCKINGHAM and CHANDOS, and LADY ELIZABETH PRINGLE and HUSBAND, Claimants.

Parent and Child—Legitim—Annuity—Heritable and Moveable—Trustees, Duties of—Executry—Entail—Meliorations—Probate—Expenses—Multiplepointing—Process—In a question raised in a multiplepointing as to what was the amount of a testator's personal property, with a view to fixing the amount of legitim due to a child, and the charges which properly formed burdens on the personal property, with reference to that claim—Held, 1. That the value of certain annuities payable by the testator could not competently be deducted from the fund prior to fixing the legitim, but fell on the heritage or dead's part: 2. That, though the testator only conveyed to trustees certain property and effects, and there were other personal subjects unconveyed, the party claiming legitim was entitled to have those separate subjects taken in computo with what was conveyed, so as to ascertain properly the amount of the fund; and that it was competent to call on the trustees to state the amount in the multiplepointing: 3. That valuations taken after the decease of the trustor by competent persons, for the purpose of settling with the Stamp-Office, were sufficient, if now verified on oath by the appraisers, and that the party in right of the legitim was not entitled to force a new valuation, on the ground that the previous valuation was too low, and that the interest of that party, which had not then been found good, had not been protected by some one attending on the occasion of the appraisal: 4. That the trustees were not bound to take up, and carry on a process which the trustor, as heir of entail in possession, had instituted, but allowed to fall asleep, for the purpose of constituting on the entailed estate and succeeding heirs certain sums of money which he had expended on meliorations, nor, in the particular circumstances, to lend their names to pursue the action to the effect that the legitim should attach to the sums which should be so constituted and recovered from the succeeding heir: And accordingly, that neither the sums in that action, nor a sum already rendered a burden on the next heirs, but specially excluding from the operation of the decree the heir who next came to possession (the brother of the party claiming the legitim), were to be taken into account in fixing the legitim: 5. That a bond of annuity payable to the truster was not to be taken into the account of the personal property in computing the legitim; and, 6. That the expense of probate in England was a proper charge against the personal estate, and fell to be deducted therefrom prior to striking the amount of legitim.

Continuation of case ante, Vol. VIII. p. 178 (26th January 1836), Vol. XII. p. 400 (5th March 1840), and Vol. XIII. p. 158 (15th January 1841).

This action was brought by the raisers to determine certain questions which had occurred in reference to the succession of the late Marquis of Breadalbane; and by the decision first referred to (affirmed on appeal 16th August 1836, ante, Vol. IX. p. 66), it was, inter alia, found that his daughter, the present Duchess of Buckingham, had not renounced by her marriage-contract, to which her father was a party, or otherwise, her claim to legitim; and the Court accordingly found that her claim of legitim extended over one third part of the free moveable estate of the Marquis. By the second decision it was found that the Duchess, having succeeded in her claim of legitim, against the evident intention of the Marquis, had repudiated thereby his settlements, and accordingly that she was not entitled to another claim she had advanced, to one-half of the yearly proceeds of the unentailed lands.

In order to ascertain the amount of the personal property, over which the claim of legitim extended, the raisers lodged a condescendence, in which they set forth what they considered the fund in medio to consist of, and stating the deductions which fell to be charged against that portion of the succession. The claimants having given in objections, a record was made up, and thereafter cases were prepared in regard to the various objections of the parties, which were afterwards reported to the Inner-House by the Lord Ordinary. Inter alia there occurred the following points:—

1. By a codicil, dated 26th August 1829, annexed to the trust-deed, the truster, in the exercise of a power therein reserved, gave the following directions to his trustees:

"That my said trustees, instead of investing the free rents of my unentailed lands and estates, in manner before mentioned, shall annually pay over the whole free proceeds of the same to my two daughters, Lady Elizabeth Campbell, and Mary Marchioness of Chandos, equally between them, while both shall be in life, and to the survivor, and shall continue to do the same as long as both or either of them shall be alive. But that always without prejudice to the obligations and provisions granted by me in favour of Mary Countess of Breadalbane, or to the obligations contained in the contract of marriage between John Viscount Glenorchy and Eliza Baillie, his spouse."

The Marquis had also become bound to pay certain annuities, amounting in whole to £2270 per annum, but none of them was in any way created a real burden upon the unentailed lands or rents thereof, and one of them stood upon a mere personal obligation; and in regard to these annuities the raisers maintained, that supposing it to be found that they did not form a primary burden upon the universitas of the late Lord Breadalbane's succession, then these annuities were burdens upon the unentailed lands, and the rents thereof,—and consequently, Lady Elizabeth Pringle could only draw her share of the free rents, under deduction of a proportional part of these annuities.

Lady Pringle pleaded—1. The free rents of the unentailed estates having been specially provided by the testator to his daughters, and there being other funds left by the testator sufficient to pay all his debts and engagements, no part of the subject of that special provision could be withdrawn, in order to implement any obligations he might have incurred to pay the annuities in question: 2. That the testator having directed all his debts and engagements to be paid by the trustees out of the general trust-funds, they were bound to pay the annuities in question out of these funds, and were not entitled to apply to that purpose the subject of the separate special provision made by the testator in favour of his daughters.

In regard to this point the Court (by interlocutor of this date) held,

"in the question between the trustees of the late Marquis of Breadalbane and Lady Elizabeth Maitland Pringle, and her husband, Sir John Pringle of Stitchell, Baronet, for his interest, that the annuities constituted by the late Marquis of Breadalbane cannot be laid upon the rents of the unentailed lands belonging to the said Marquis, so far as the same are payable to the said Lady Elizabeth Maitland Pringle; and find the said Lady Elizabeth Maitland Pringle and her husband entitled to the expenses of the discussion of this point."

In reference to the annuities, the Duke and Duchess of Buckingham objected to the value of these annuities being brought against the personal estate before the legitim was struck; and the ground they took was, that supposing they had been payable to, instead of by the late Marquis, they would have been held to be heritable, as having a tract of future time; and, accordingly, they maintained that the value fell to be laid on the unentailed heritage: Ersk. II. 2, 6. Stair, II. 1, 4. Bell's Com. II. p. 4. Principles, § 1480. Hill v. Maxwell, Feb. 5, 1663; M. 5473, Fol. Dict., Vol. I. p. 368, and Stair, Vol. I. p. 171. Ewing v. Drummond, 29th November 1752; M. 5476. Ersk. II. 9, 67; I. 6, 41.

The raisers seemed rather to acquiesce in this view, but they argued, that in the circumstances and peculiar shape of the case, into which it is unnecessary at present to enter, the point should meantime be reserved.

The Court

"Find that it is not competent to the said trustees to deduct the value of the foresaid annuities from the amount of the personal estate, and to the prejudice of the Duchess of Buckingham, before the amount of the legitim due to the latter is to be fixed, so as to leave the half of the free rents of the heritable property to be applied for the other purposes of the trust, according to the directions of the truster, out of whose personal estate legitim is due; and find that the said annuities must be paid by the trustees out of the said heritable property, or the dead's part; reserving all questions which may arise in the event of such funds being insufficient to meet the annuities."

2. Though the raisers had generally conveyed to them the whole unentailed estate and the truster's personal property, it was said there were certain portions of his estate which were not conveyed to them, and were either expressly assigned away to other persons, or not tested on; and there was a question involved, besides, whether certain English mortgages were heritable or moveable in succession? In regard to this the Duke and Duchess of Buckingham maintained, that whatever was not conveyed to the trustees, but otherwise specially conveyed away, must be looked on as gifts out of the dead's part, and that, though it was not necessary to convert them into money, their known amount should be stated, and that the whole should be put in computo, in order properly to ascertain the fund over which the legitim extended: But the raisers pleaded, that supposing, but not admitting, that there were portions of the estate not conveyed to them, it was not competent in this process to raise the question, as, if any such situation of matters existed, they were not accountable for subjects not conveyed to them. But, on the other hand, it was argued, that the whole personalty, whatsoever or wheresoever, should be ascertained, in order to fix the legitim, and that decree could competently go out against the trust-estate for the same. The Court

“ Find that the Duchess of Buckingham is entitled to insist that the amount of the legitim must be ascertained and fixed in this process of multiplepinding, raised by the general representatives and executors of her father, and that any property which may be shown to be personal, but which is not conveyed to the trustees, being the subject of separate and special bequests, must be considered to be gifts out of the dead's part,—the value of the whole personal property, whether conveyed to the trustees or not, being computed and taken into account in estimating the amount to be paid as legitim to the Duchess of Buckingham by her father's trustees and executors.”

3. When the late Marquis died, the usual inventory and appraisements were made by competent persons of the whole out-door and in-door plenishing,—of course before the question had occurred, as to whether the Duchess of Buckingham was entitled to legitim, and when the only parties who then appeared to have an interest were the Dowager and the present Marquis of Breadalbane. After the legitim question had been decided, the Duchess argued, that as she was no party to the valuation, another should now be taken, to ascertain the true value of the furniture in the different residences of her late father,—contending that the previous valuation was very considerably under the proper amount, having been made merely with a view to the Stamp-Office returns consequent on the death of the Marquis, and not in reference to any claims competent to her. The ground taken was, that as the trustees were bound in law to have known of the existence of her claim of legitim, her interests should have been provided for at the time, by affording her an opportunity of having some one present on her part during the valuation. The Court

“ Find, that the valuations of the furniture, linen, plate, books, pictures, wine, and other moveables in the houses occupied by the late Marquis of Breadalbane in London, Teymouth Auchlyne, Holyrood and Langton, were fairly obtained from competent persons by the said trustees, in perfect good faith, in order to ascertain the free amount of the executry of the late Marquis, and were fairly and properly left in the possession of the present Marquis, without intimation of the claim of legitim for the Duchess of Buckingham; and repel the objections stated by the said Duchess to the said valuations: Reserving, however, her right to obtain a commission and diligence if she is so advised, in order to have the accuracy of the said valuations verified by the examination on oath of the parties by whom they were respectively made, if still in life.”

4. Upwards of £100,000 had been expended by the late Marquis in improvements on the entailed estates, and part of these sums he might have rendered a burden (to the extent of £75,000) on the succeeding heirs of entail. In point of fact, he had followed out proceedings, and obtained decree in reference to certain entailed improvements, whereby he had constituted a claim against the succeeding heirs for three-fourths of £5089. 1. 8, being £3816. 16. 3; and in regard to the balance, he had raised an action in 1820, likewise to constitute it a burden; but the case, after being remitted to certain accountants to examine the procedure, fell asleep in 1830, in the lifetime of the Marquis, and before any thing final had been done, and it had never since been awakened. The Duke and Duchess of Buckingham argued, that from these steps it was plain that the intention of the Marquis was to constitute the whole a burden, and consequently, that the raisers, who refused to proceed with the action, or to allow their names to be used for the purpose, were bound to take up the same, and to follow it out to its practical results, in order that the claim of legitim should likewise apply to it.

The raisers stated that they were satisfied, from their knowledge of the circumstances, and the mind of the late Marquis, that he had given up all thoughts of carrying on the action, and had, in point of fact, abandoned it; and they were more especially satisfied of this, from the circumstance that it had been found, in the course of investigation before the accountants, that such objections occurred to the way in which the steps had been taken with the view of registering the vouchers, &c. &c., that the case could not have succeeded, and no part of the expenditure could have been rendered a burden on the estate. In these circumstances, and feeling that the truster had abandoned the action, they declined to moot the question at all; and they stated their belief, that if they were to proceed with the case, they should be acting in direct opposition to the will of the truster. In regard to the sum of £3800, it was explained, that it had not been constituted as a debt against the present Marquis, but only against the heirs succeeding subsequent to him,—a circumstance, however, which the Duke and Duchess of Buckingham argued was ultra vires under the Statute. The Court

“ Find that the deceased Marquis had not resting-owing to him at his death any sums of money due, as expended in improving his entailed estates, and that no such sums were, or ought to be, included in the fund in medio; and repel the whole objections and claims stated by the Duchess of Buckingham on this head of her supplementary condensation and claim; and repel the claim as made in the multiplepinding, that the trustees are bound either to enforce or follow out any actions against the present Marquis of Breadalbane, respecting his father's expenditure and improvements on the entailed estates, or to give their name to the said Duchess of Buckingham, in order that she may attempt to enforce or prosecute such actions.”

5. The late Marquis was in right of an annuity, payable by Mr J. A. Campbell, who, in the event of his death, is bound in payment of a certain principal sum. Over this sum the Duke and Duchess of Buckingham pleaded that the legitim extended, in respect, as they suggested, that it was not heritably secured. The raisers explained, that the late Lord Breadalbane had bought various superiorities, or rather that they were bought in the name of Mr John Campbell, W.S., then his law-agent. Mr Campbell conveyed them away in portions to the gentlemen for whom the freeholds were intended; and, as the purpose was to give them a liferent only, the transaction was arranged in the following manner:—An absolute disposition was granted to each, and each, in return, granted a bond, payable at his death, for a sum equal in amount to what was considered the value of the superiority. Where a feu-duty was attached to the superiority, the bond contained a farther obligation on the freeholder to pay, during his lifetime, an annuity equal in amount to the feu-duty. In subsequent years, some of these parties expressed a wish that the true nature of the transaction (which was to confer a liferent right only) should be put upon a more distinct footing; and, therefore, with Lord Breadalbane's concurrence, they reconveyed the superiorities to his Lordship, reserving only their own liferents; and, at the same time, the bonds for the price were delivered up to them. Two of the freeholds, however, remained upon the original deeds,—one of which, the annuity in question of £37, was payable by Mr J. A. Campbell, constituted by bond to Mr John Campbell, dated 24th July 1813. And by that bond he was likewise taken bound to pay the sum of £1403. 11. 2. Sterling, as the price of the superiority, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas, six months after his death.

It was admitted that it was not heritably secured; but its heritable nature was maintained on the same plea as that which was advanced by the Duke and Duchess of Buckingham, in reference to the previous annuities. The Court

“Find, that the sum payable under a bond by Mr John Archibald Campbell, after his death, must be viewed as a surrogatum for the annuity now payable by the said Mr John Archibald Campbell, and belongs to the party in right of that annuity: Find that the right in the said annuity is heritable, and that the sum payable as aforesaid, cannot be taken to be any part of the moveable estate of the late Marquis of Breadalbane, or subject to legitim.”

6. The late Marquis was an obligant on certain bills in reference to certain turnpike-road Acts, which the trustees claimed as a deduction against the personal estate. But this was opposed by the Duke and Duchess of Buckingham, on the ground that the road trust-funds, and not the late Marquis, was liable for the debt. It was answered, however, that that question could not arise here, but fell to be tried, if an arrangement could be made with one of the bill holders, in the form of suspension as of a threatened charge.

The Court superseded consideration of this point.

7. The raisers claimed deduction for the price of the lands of Kynachan, which they alleged the late Marquis had purchased before his death, the price being stipulated to be paid at the Whitsunday following the transaction, but his Lordship had died prior to the payment. The Duke and Duchess of Buckingham objected, that there was no evidence to show, and denied that there was, any completed transaction, and that if it had been entered into at all, it was by the Dowager Marchioness, and not by her husband, and therefore not conclusive or binding. The raisers explained the circumstances attending the transaction, and that it had been carried through, with the sanction of the Marquis, by the factor and his regular professional agents, assisted by the Dowager. The Court

“Find that the price of the estate of Kynachan is a debt which must be deducted by the trustees, if the bargain for the purchase of the said estate was sanctioned by the late Marquis of Breadalbane, and closed during his lifetime: Find that a bargain and transaction for the purchase of this estate, carried on during the lifetime of the late Marquis by his regular agents, his factor and his wife, the Dowager Marchioness of Breadalbane, must prima facie be taken to be a transaction sanctioned and directed by the said Marquis, there being no averment of incapacity, fraud or imposition: But find, in respect of the averments and pleas of the Duchess of Buckingham, that she is entitled to prove that the late Marquis did not sanction, know, or direct the said purchase, and that there was not a concluded bargain before his death; and appoint the following issues to be tried by a jury respecting these matters, of which issues declare and appoint that the said Duchess of Buckingham and Chandos, and her husband, his Grace Richard Plantagenet Duke of Buckingham and Chandos, shall stand as pursuers, viz.—1. Whether the late Marquis of Breadalbane did not give authority for the purchase of the lands of Kynachan, in the county of Perth, and did not approve of, and sanction the said purchase? 2. Whether the transaction for the said purchase was not a concluded bargain, and not binding on the late Marquis of Breadalbane?”

8. The raisers charged as a deduction from the personal estate, £6000 as the expense connected with the probate in England. The Duke and Duchess of Buckingham resisted this, on the ground that the charge should properly affect the dead's part, and not the fund over which the legitim extended. The raisers, on the following authorities, contended that it fell against the personal estate: Hog v. Lashley, 1795. House of Lords, 24th June 1802. Robertson on Personal Succession, 462, 6. The Court

“Find, that the trustees are entitled to charge, as a general deduction from the moveable estate administered and recovered by them, before the amount payable as legitim is ascertained, the whole legal expenses of such administration, whether by confirmation or probate, and on the inventories given up therewith respectively.”

The case having been reported by the Lord Ordinary to the Court, it was advised by the Second Division on 26th May, and a judgment pronounced in the terms above quoted, on the several points which have now been narrated.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—As to the first point, his Lordship thought, that as the bequest of the rents of the unentailed property to the daughter was special, and only subject to the proper expenses, these annuities must fall on, and be deducted, not from the rents, but from any other funds. The special nature of the bequest of the rents prevented it being burdened with any separate obligations. With regard to this question, as affecting the Duchess, whose share of these rents had fallen to the trustees in consequence of the judgment in March 1840, his Lordship considered that the trustees were not entitled to burden the personal estate with the annuities, and so to disappoint the legitim, but must repay them out of the half of the rents to which they acquired right, or out of the dead's part, to which also they had obtained right. As the heir, in a case of intestacy, would not be bound to repay them, so the trustees were not entitled to deduct them from the personalty. As to the point whether the Duchess was entitled to throw into account every subject conveyed or not conveyed to the trustees, his Lordship thought that she, as a creditor for the legitim, was entitled to claim it from her father's trustees, who were also his executors, leaving it to them to obtain their relief. She did not wish the unconveyed subjects to be converted into money, and brought into the fund; but she contended, as she was entitled to do, that the executors were bound to take the amount into the estimate of the personal estate. If there were any gifts, then these would fall on the dead's part. Bearing on this point, there are certain questions touching English law, as to what was, and what was not moveable, and as to them, a case should be submitted for the opinion of English counsel. (This was appointed to be done by the interlocutor). In regard to the valuations, his Lordship thought they had been fairly and bona fide entered into; and if the valuers now verified them on oath, that would be sufficient. Upon the question, whether the trustees should now be compelled to carry on the action of meliorations, his Lordship considered there was sufficient evidence in process to show that the late Marquis had abandoned the action; and in regard to the decree which he had obtained, that the trustees would run great risk if they endeavoured to insist in it as against the present Marquis, who was not comprehended in it. His Lordship was besides of opinion, that they could not be compelled to give their names, so as to enable the Duke and Duchess of Buckingham to carry on the action. As to the price of the estate said to have been purchased, his Lordship thought there was a prima facie case of a settled transaction, but in respect of the averments made by the Duchess, his Lordship thought she should be allowed an issue to try the case. As to the probate, his Lordship thought the case of Hog in favour of the raisers' plea, and that the expense of it must be deducted from the personal estate. The raisers had a right to claim the expense of making up their title from the estate; and if the Duchess had any claim of relief, it would be against the Crown, in regard to the legacy duty, in so far as duty was paid on her third.

The other Judges concurred, when an interlocutor, of which portions have already been given above, applicable to the points at present decided, was pronounced. There still remain other points, but consideration of them was postponed till the opinion of English counsel should be obtained, and certain other parties appeared in the case.

2d June 1842.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G. D. F.)

No. 194.—ROBERT HENRY ROBERTSON, Appellant, v.
THOMAS CLARK, Respondent.

Landlord and Tenant—Hypothec—Miscropping—Penal Rent.—Held, in terms of a lease which prescribed a certain system of cropping, and which stipulated for a payment "of £5 Sterling of additional rent yearly for each acre or part of an acre" that should be cropped differently, that a claim preferred by the landlord for this additional rent, fell under, and was secured to him by his right of hypothec, in the same way as his claim for the ordinary rent.

The late John Robertson, Esq. of Tullibelton, by formal lease let to James Baxter the farms of Corrielea and Mains of Tullibelton, for the space of nineteen years from Whitsunday 1827, as to the houses, yards, and grass, and from the separation of crop 1827 from the ground, as to the arable and laboured lands, at the rent, and under the provisions and declarations contained in the lease. With regard to the mode of cropping, it was specially provided that the tenant should observe and follow,

"strictly and undeviatingly, the following rotation of cropping, viz.,—1st, Green crop and fallow, properly dunged. 2d, Wheat or barley, properly sown down with grass seeds. 3d, Grass. 4th, Grass: And 5th, Oats."

It was declared also, that if this rotation should be departed from, the tenant should be bound "to pay at the rate of £5 Sterling of additional rent yearly for each acre, or part of an acre, that shall be laboured, manured, or cropped in manner different from that above mentioned,—the payment to continue while such contravention exists; and which additional rent is hereby declared not to be a penalty, but as conditional rent, which shall be payable at the same terms, and in the same proportions, with the original rent of the year in which such change or deviation shall take place, and which additional rent shall be payable every year in which the said rotation shall be altered."

The landlord was to be entitled to put a stop to any deviation from the stipulated rotation, if he should think proper to do so; but it was expressly declared, that "his not doing so, even if it should come under his notice, shall not bar his right to said additional rent."

The late Mr Robertson died in 1834, and was succeeded by the appellant as proprietor. It was provided in the lease,

"that in the event of the tenant in possession of the farm becoming bankrupt or insolvent, it shall, in like manner, be in the power of the proprietor forthwith to declare his tack irritated, in which case the tenant shall be bound to remove from the lands hereby let, in the same manner as if the tack had finally terminated."

Baxter was sequestered in July 1841, under the Bankrupt Act, and the appellant exercised the power conferred on him by the clause above quoted, of declaring the tack at an end. The appellant then discovered that the tenant had, for crops 1840 and 1841, miscropped to the extent of 44 acres, by following a four-years' shift instead of a five-years' shift rotation. Previous to the date of Baxter's sequestration under the Bankrupt Act, the appellant had used a sequestration of the crop and stocking on the farm, for payment of the ordinary rent for crop 1841, and he subsequently brought a supplementary sequestration for the proportion of additional rent due, on account of the deviation from the prescribed mode of cropping to the extent set forth, and demanded payment both of the ordinary and additional rent from the trustee on Baxter's sequestered estate, as preferably secured by his diligence. The trustee paid to the appellant the ordinary rent for 1841, as preferably secured by his sequestration, but he refused payment of the additional rent, at all events, as a preferable debt. The appellant accordingly lodged a claim for the additional rent, as a preferable debt in the sequestration, but the trustee disallowed it.

Clark, who was the tenant's trustee in the bankruptcy, stated, that the tenant had carried on an extensive distillery on the farm, which, at his entry, was so divided as to be incapable of the adoption of the five-course shift. And it was accordingly admitted, that instead of cultivating according to the regulations in the lease, a four-shift rotation had been followed, which, it was averred, was of itself more beneficial to the farm, as it enabled the tenant to place on it a greater quantity of manure, of which he had a superabundant supply from the distillery, than he could have done had the five-course shift been followed. There was an averment that the late proprietor was cognisant of the impossibility of dividing the farm, so as to carry on the course of cropping established by the lease, as well as of the opposite system of cultivation which had been pursued; and it was explained, that he had taken payment of the ordinary rent down to 1841, without preferring or reserving any claim for additional rent as for the alleged miscropping. It was, however, denied that the late proprietor was cognisant of the system, or that, by granting receipts for rent in the usual terms, he had at all departed from the claim for additional rent.

It was admitted by the parties, that in the event of it being held that the appellant was entitled to his claim for additional rent, the extent of deviation should be taken at 44 acres, which, at £5 per acre, gave £220 as the amount of the claim.

The appellant argued—That the landlord's claim for rent under his hypothec was preferable over the subject of the hypothec to the claims of all ordinary creditors of the tenant: That the additional rent stipulated in this case, as payable on a deviation from the mode of cropping prescribed by the lease, was not of the nature of a penalty, and so subject to modification, but of proper conventional rent, payable in full, on a deviation from the prescribed mode of cropping, and was secured as rent over the subject of the hypothec, for payment of the rent of each year in which it might become due, in the same way as the ordinary rent for each year. And as it was admitted that the tenant had deviated, the corresponding amount of stipulated additional rent claimed by him was consequently due, and was preferable to the tenant's other debts, in virtue of the appellant's hypothec as landlord, and sequestration.

On the other hand, the respondent maintained—That the claim for penal rent must be held to have been abandoned, and the system of rotation followed by the tenant homologated and acquiesced in, both on account of the successive discharges for the ordinary rent, as in full of the landlord's demands for the years in which they were granted, and on account of the knowledge of the landlord, and the parties in his employment, of the deviation, without the expression of disapproval,—more especially, seeing that the system was highly beneficial to the landlord: That the additional rent was not exigible, seeing that it was fixed as a liquidate penalty for loss by miscropping. Whereas, not only had there been no miscropping, and no loss sustained, but the farm had been greatly improved and benefited by the system adopted. But assuming that the additional rent were exigible, it could only form the ground of an ordinary claim against the estate, and could not be exacted as a preferable debt, in respect the hypothec right of a landlord only extended to proper rent, and not to penalties for contravention of the terms of the contract of lease, whether liquidated or not. The fact that the landlord was, in the present case, entitled by the lease, not merely to exact the additional rent, but to prohibit the acts by which right to demand the rent may emerge, while no power was given to the tenant, on payment of the stipulated sum, to crop the lands otherwise than according to the rule prescribed by the lease, was decisive as to the rent being truly a liquidated penalty for contravention, and consequently not being secured by the right of hypothec. Besides, the stipulation by which it was provided that the extent of the contravention, and consequent amount of the penal rent should be ascertained in a reference to the Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute, admitting the uncertainty of its amount, and necessary delay in ascertaining it, was also decisive against the use of the immediate summary remedy of sequestration for recovery of that additional or penal rent.

The trustee refused to sustain the claim as preferable, and as being covered by the hypothec; but on an appeal to the Lord Ordinary, his Lordship pronounced the following interlocutor:

"4th April 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having considered the note of appeal, the revised condescendence, the revised answers, and whole productions, and having heard parties' procurators—Alters the interlocutor submitted to review, and remits to the trustee on the sequestrated estate of the said James Baxter, to sustain the preference claimed by the appellant for the sum of £220 Sterling of additional rent for the farm of Corrilea, for crop and year 1841, payable at the term of Martinmas 1841, and ordains him to pay the said sum to the appellant out of the first and readiest monies in his hands, as trustee on said sequestrated estate; and finds no expenses due."

On a reclaiming note, the Court unanimously held, that as the lease expressly stipulated for additional rent in case of deviation, there was no room for doubt that the claim was covered by the tack, in the same way, and as extensively, as the rent due in the ordinary course, and could not be viewed as penalty, in respect the lease conclusively stated it to be additional rent. Their Lordships accordingly adhered.

No. 195.—ROBERT LAIDLAW, Pursuer, v. CHRISTOPHER SMYTH, Defender.

Agent and Client—Contract—Proof.

This was an action raised by an Edinburgh agent to recover from a country agent, who had employed him in certain cases before the Court of Session, the expenses connected therewith, of which the Edinburgh agent had been unable to obtain payment directly from the clients—Circumstances in which the defence of the country agent, which turned on the correspondence in process, &c., sustained, that the pursuer had undertaken the employment on condition that the defender was not to be liable.

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—Act. Solicitor-General (M'Neill), Russell; Party Agent.—Alt. Patton; James Malcolm, Agent.—T. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

2d June 1842.

No. 196.—WILLIAM ARMSTRONG, Pursuer and Advocate, v. THE REV. ROBERT WILSON, Defender and Respondent.

Bill of Exchange—Vitiation—Process—Proof.—A creditor pointed his debtor's effects, which, notwithstanding, were thereafter sold by a creditor who used a pointing subsequently. The first pointer brought an action, to recover from the second double the appraised value, as for an unlawful pointing, and the second pointer raised a reduction of the bill on which the diligence first in date had proceeded, on the ground that the date of the bill was vitiated or erased. The Lord Ordinary found that one figure in the date was erased, but held that it was competent for the defender to prove prout de jure, that the erasure was made prior to the issue and discount of the document, and to correct an inadvertent mistake; and his Lordship, on a proof, subsequently found that the proof was affirmative of the question of fact remitted to probation. But the Court, on a reclaiming note, reduced, decerned, and declared in terms of the libel, in respect the defender had failed to prove that the vitiation on the bill was made with the knowledge or consent of all parties thereto.

George and John Sharpe having dishonoured a bill due by them to the defender, the latter pointed their effects, and obtained from the Sheriff of Dumfriesshire the usual warrant to sell. Notwithstanding this procedure, the same effects, or part of them, were thereafter poinded and sold by Armstrong, in consequence of which Wilson brought an action on the Statute 54 Geo. III. c. 137, in the Sheriff-Court of Dumfries, to recover from him double the value of the appraised goods, as having rendered himself liable therefor as for an unlawful poinding. Appearance was entered for Mr Armstrong, who, besides other grounds, stated that the bill on which Wilson founded, and which was produced, was not probative, but, on the contrary, was vitiated in substantialibus, as the date was either erased, or one date had been superinduced on another, and he accordingly stated as a plea, that the vitiation, which was apparent ex facie of the bill, was a bar to the action. This plea, however competent in a reduction, not being relevant ope exceptionis, the Sheriff repelled, in consequence of which Armstrong first raised an action, concluding that the bill should be reduced and set aside, in so far as it was the ground and warrant for the diligence and proceedings following thereon, and he also presented a note to have the Inferior Court process advocated, ob contingentiam of the reduction.

The Lord Ordinary having advocated the Inferior Court cause, and the same being conjoined with the reduction, certain procedure took place, which is sufficiently intelligible from the note of the Lord Ordinary appended to the following interlocutor:

"15th June 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel in these conjoined actions of reduction and advocacy, and thereafter considered the record, documents produced, and whole process, finds that one figure in the date of the bill under reduction is written upon an erasure, but finds it competent for the defender, in support of his claim and diligence raised upon the said bill, to prove pro ut de jure, that the erasure was made prior to the issuing and discounting of the bill, and to correct an inadvertent mistake made by the writer of the document: Therefore, before farther answer, appoints the cause to be enrolled in the motion-roll, that parties may be prepared to state in what manner they propose such proof to proceed; reserving consideration of all the other pleas of the parties, both in the reduction and advocacy, till the question as to the validity of the bill, and of the diligence raised thereon, be discussed.

"Note.—The pursuer and defender are both poinding creditors of one of the common debtors, but the defender's diligence is prior in date to the pursuer's. The latter, therefore, seeks by this action to reduce the defender's bill, on the ground of vitiation alone.

"Upon inspecting the bill, it is plain that one figure is written upon an erasure, and it may still be perceived that the date first written on the bill was 7th March, though it has been afterwards changed to 8th March. Under that aspect of the document, the Lord Ordinary intimated, that he held the defender, who was poinding and doing diligence on the bill, was bound, in the first instance, to undertake the onus of showing that the date was corrected or adhibited to the bill as it now stands, before it was completed or issued, and to correct an innocent mistake. The defender answered, that he was willing to adduce such proof, and as affording prima facie evidence of the error said to have been first inadvertently committed in writing the bill, the almanac for 1838 was referred to, showing that the 7th of March in that year fell on a Sunday, and it was added, that as the 8th of March was Monday, that was the market-day of the adjoining village of Thornhill, where the bill was drawn, and where the parties usually met weekly.

"The Lord Ordinary was impressed with the apparent bona fides of this explanation, and, at all events, he was of opinion that the offer of proof by the defender was relevant. But the pursuer took a different view of the law, and maintained, that in every case of erasure, summary diligence was incompetent till the holder of the bill has constituted his right by ordinary action. Having stated that he wished a judgment to that effect, the prefixed interlocutor has been pronounced.

"There appears to be no authority for the proposition contended for by the pursuer as an abstract and inflexible rule of practice. It is no doubt possible, that in some cases of very suspicious erasure, complained of by the obligants in the bill as perpetrated to effect fraud, the Court may have held the creditor bound to proceed by action, and not by summary charges; but even in questions with the obligants, sundry cases of erasure are on record of suspensions of summary diligence, the charges in which have been sustained. See the cases of Sutherland, 2 Shaw, p. 442; Miller, M'Kay and Co., 11th July 1832; and Mr Thomson, in his last edition, p. 612, observes, that the plea of erasure 'may be pleaded either against an action, or in a suspension of the charge.'

"It is observed, however, that the cases reported have been chiefly questions with the obligants in the bills, and not with third parties, and it was added, that a bill erased cannot be founded on in a question with third parties, till its authenticity is established by an ordinary action; but where the direct obligants, in the present instance, do not challenge the bill,—when, on the contrary, they received charges, and acquiesced therein, it seems to follow, a fortiori, that the holders of such bills must be entitled to follow out ulterior diligence against the effects of the debtors. The very circumstance that other creditors were in the course of doing diligence against the common debtor's effects, entitled the defender to raise summary diligence on his bill; he was not bound to lie by and see the effects of the debtor swept off by other creditors; but if the proceedings of the pursuer had been correct, a proper process of competition should have ensued before the Judge Ordinary, in which all competitors for the debtor's effects would have been heard on the report of the poindings. Both claimants would have been in the same situation as if, under other circumstances, a process of multiplepoinding had been brought. In a competition of poindings, as well as of arrestments, and in other competitions, the process for extricating the preferences of parties is a congeries of actions, in which the attaching creditors may prove their claims habili modo, as in a constitution, on the principle explained by Lord Stair and Mr Bell (2 Bell, p. 299): hence the plea of the defender, as a creditor holding a bill admitted by the debtor, is in no respect barred by the consideration that he is here competing with third parties."

Thereafter the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"16th July 1841.—Of consent, and upon special motion of both parties, allows the defender a proof pro ut de jure, that the erasure was made prior to the issuing and discount of the bill, and to correct an inadvertent mistake made by the writer of the document, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation thereanent; grants diligence at the instance of both parties, or either of them, against witnesses and havers, and commission to the Judge Ordinary of the bounds within which the witnesses and havers reside, or may be for the time, to take the said proof,—to be reported at first calling of the cause in November next; holds the reservation contained in the interlocutor of 15th June last as herein repeated."

A proof was accordingly adduced, when the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:

"16th March 1842.—The Lord Ordinary officiating for Lord Cuninghame, Ordinary in the cause, having heard counsel for the parties on the proof adduced, and whole process, and thereafter considered the same,—in respect it was found competent by the interlocutor of Lord Cuninghame, of 15th June 1841, now final, 'for the defender, in support of his claim and diligence raised on the said bill, to prove pro ut de jure that the erasure was made prior to the issuing and discount of the bill, and to correct an inadvertent mistake made by the writer of the document,' Finds that the proof adduced is affirmative of the (question of ?) fact remitted to probation: Therefore, in the reduction, repels the reasons of reduction, sustains the defences, and decerns; and in the advocacy, disjoins this process from the reduction,—remits the original cause to the Sheriff, with power to him to direct the proceedings to be completed, which were interrupted by the advocacy ob contingentiam; and generally, to proceed in the cause as to him shall seem just; allows the decret absolutor in the process of reduction, and the act and remit in the advocacy, to go out and be extracted separately: Finds the defender entitled to expenses in the conjoined actions in this Court; appoints an account thereof to be lodged, and when lodged, remits the same to the auditor to tax the same, and to report.

"Note.—The result of the evidence in this case is, that the bill was written by the second witness, George Sharpe: That he never altered the bill, and that the figure 8 is not in his handwriting: That after it was signed in his presence by John Sharpe and Samuel Buchanan, he gave the bill to Mr Wilson, who carried it into his house, and in a few minutes returned it with his signature to the witness, in whose custody it remained from the time that he wrote it, until the time that he delivered it to Mr Moffat (the agent for the Glasgow Union Banking Company at Thornhill), 'excepting for the few minutes that Mr Wilson had it in his house when he signed it.' This witness 'is quite certain that the bill was never altered from the time it was written, till it was delivered to Mr Moffat, unless it was so altered when Mr Wilson had it in his house for signature.' It is clear from Mr Moffat's evidence, that the bill bore the date of the 8th January, when brought to the bank for discount; and although Moffat did not observe the alteration of the date, which is not very apparent unless narrowly looked into, there seems no reason to doubt that it was either done at first, or made by Mr Wilson when the bill was delivered to him, and can be attributed to no other circumstance than that mentioned by Lord Cuninghame in his note, that the 7th was a Sunday. George Sharpe swears 'that he is quite certain it was written upon a week-day, and not upon a Sunday, as he never wrote any bill whatever on a Sunday.' He may, however, have inadvertently dated it the 7th, and the parties observed the mistake and corrected it, though this witness does not recollect it.

"In many cases the issuing a bill is a distinct act from discounting it; but here the bill remained in the hands of the writer who got it signed, until he discounted it at the bank. The issuing and discounting took place, therefore, at the same time. Although any alteration in the date of a bill is to be viewed with extreme jealousy, the Lord Ordinary, after reconsidering the case, and consulting with Lord Cuninghame, has come to be of opinion, that where the bill is issued and discounted at the same time, and no alteration has taken place in the date after it was discounted, a previous alteration of the date cannot be fatal to the bill; and that, therefore, this action of reduction is not well founded.

"Lord Cuninghame has furnished the Lord Ordinary, since this opinion was written, with some English cases, which seem to confirm it, and which are subjoined for the information of the parties."

"Hemnan v. Dickenson, 1829, Bingham's Reports, Vol. V. Skerrington v. Jermy, Carringt. and Payne, III. 374. Jacob v. Hart, Maule and Selwyn's Reports, VI. 143. Begbie v. Levy, Jervis and Crompton's Reports, I. 180. Leykariff v. Ashford, Moore's Reports, XII. 281."

Armstrong reclaimed, when the Court, viewing the proof differently, pronounced the following interlocutor:

"In respect the defender, Robert Wilson, has failed to prove that the vitiation on the bill was made with the knowledge or consent of all the parties thereto, Alter the interlocutor reclaimed against; and in the reduction, sustain the second reason of reduction founded on the vitiation of the bill libelled, and reduce, and decern, and declare accordingly; and in the advocacy, advocate the cause, and assolvie the said William Armstrong, the defender, in the original action, from the conclusions of the libel, and decern: Find the said William Armstrong entitled to the whole expenses incurred by him, both in this Court and in the Inferior Court; appoint an account," &c.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 197.—HARRY LEITH LUMSDEN, Pursuer, v. JAMES GORDON and WILLIAM SIMPSON, Defenders.

Arbitration—Decree-Arbitral—An attempted reduction of a decree-arbitral, as ambiguous and ultra vires compromissi, repelled.

Harry Leith Lumsden of Auchindoir, and James Gordon of Craig, agreed to submit to William Simpson of Glenythan, advocate in Aberdeen, as sole arbiter,

"all disputes, questions and differences, depending and subsisting between us in regard to the line of march between our respective properties of Clova and Craig, on the eastern or south-eastern face of the hill called the Buck, hereby authorising and empowering you to lay down, fix, and determine the line of march between the said lands of Clova and Craig, on the said face of the said hill, in so far as the same is disputed, with power to you to receive the claims of the parties, hear them thereon, and take all manner of probation by writ, witnesses, or oath of party."

After visiting the ground, leading a proof, and hearing parties, Mr Simpson pronounced a decree-arbitral, by which he fixed

"the line of march between the said lands of Clova and Craig, on the eastern or south-eastern face of the said hill, called the Buck, to be in all time coming the following:—namely, the Burn of the Buck, from the ford thereof, a little above the town of Silverford, and continuing up the said Burn of the Buck by its principal stream to its source, and from that source in a straight line to the rock or stone, called the Rock of the Buck."

Mr Lumsden brought the present summons of reduction and declarator, in which, calling Mr Gordon and Mr Simpson as parties, he concluded for reduction of the decree-arbitral, on grounds which are sufficiently explained in the note appended to the following interlocutor pronounced by the Lord Ordinary:

"15th February 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties in this process of reduction and declarator, sustains the defences, assolvies the defenders, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses; appoints an account thereof to be given in, and when lodged, remits to the auditor to tax the same and to report.

"Note.—There were three points maintained at the debate against the decree-arbitral:—

"First, That while the submission only empowered the arbiter to determine the line of march on the 'face' of the bill, he has made part of the line, consisting of the burn, run along the hill's base. This objection turns entirely on the pursuer's adopting his own view as to where the face of the hill ceases and its base begins,—a fact plainly within the cognisance of the arbiter.

"Secondly, That the award, which makes the line run up the burn 'by its principal stream to its source,' is ambiguous, as the stream has various sources. Now, the arbiter may possibly have taken for one of his marks a natural object, the fixing of the exact position of which may require another proceeding; but this is not a ground for setting the decree aside. He has given the mark, and even though it should require a verdict to settle a dispute which one of the parties may choose to raise about its identity, this is not a reason of reduction. Suppose the source of the stream had formed part of the boundary in the titles, would this have become inoperative as a point denoting a line of march, because an application to the Sheriff, or some such proceeding, might be necessary, in order to refute the assertion made by a party, that what should be held the source was questionable? If two proprietors referred their boundaries to an arbiter, and he decided that all the lands in the parish of A belonged to one party, and all in the parish of B to the other, the decree surely would not be reducible because at one part, or at all parts, there was a doubt about the limits of either parish?

“Thirdly, That part of the remainder of the line, which the arbiter makes to run ‘from that source in a straight line from the rock or stone called the Rock of the Buck,’ goes beyond the range of the disputed ground. Assuming this to be the fact, it forms no ground for setting the award aside, in so far as it is within the range. The pursuer says that the arbiter may have taken away ground within the submitted space, on the idea that he compensates for this by giving ground beyond it. But he was not empowered either to give or to take. It was not a straightening of marches. It was a mere ascertainment of the fact as to the existing line.”

The pursuer reclaimed. At advising,

Lord President.—I am satisfied there are not sufficient grounds in law for interfering with the award of the arbiter. A decree-arbital is a solemn deed, and is not to be interfered with on light grounds. The arbiter appears to have proceeded in the most careful and regular manner, and taken the utmost possible pains to arrive at a correct decision. After inspecting the ground, and giving parties a full opportunity of proving their claims, he pronounces his decree in terms which, notwithstanding of the ambiguity alleged by the pursuer, appears to me perfectly explicit. I don’t say that I assent to everything contained in the Lord Ordinary’s note. What we have to do with is the interlocutor, to which I am clear we ought to adhere.

Lord Gillies.—I concur, and have very little to add to what your Lordship has said. The arbiter appears to me to have fixed the disputed boundaries very clearly and naturally. This burn of the Buck must have a principal source, unless it can be shown that there are two of the very same dimensions. This may not be absolutely impossible, but I should think the chances against it are a million to one. There have been many disputes as to the sources of the Nile, but I suspect there is little room for dispute as to the sources of the Buck.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. It is impossible to reduce this decree-arbital on the grounds here alleged against it. It is perfectly intelligible; and as to the objection that it exceeds the limits of the submission by going to the base of the hill instead of keeping to the face of it, it is a great deal too nice, and in the circumstances scarcely seems to be made bona fide.

Lord Fullerton concurred.

The Court adhered, with additional expenses.

No. 198.—ARTHUR DINGWALL FORDYCE of Culsh and Brucklay, Pursuer, v. SIR HENRY BRIDGES, Knight, Defender.

Process—Jurisdiction—Domicile—Lis alibi pendens—Foreign—Res Judicata.—A testator living in England, left a will in the English form, by which his trustees were directed to invest the residue in landed estate in England or Scotland, under the fetters of entail, on the same series of heirs as contained in a previous Scots entail of his property executed by him. The trustees invested part of the fund in land in Scotland as directed; but after their decease, A, an heir of entail, took measures in the English Court of Chancery to bar the English will, by orders from which Court he obtained possession of the balance, and thereafter bought land in Scotland, the titles of which he took in fee-simple to himself, without including the heirs of entail; and on his death, B, a domiciled Englishman, succeeded by settlement of A thereto, and was infeft. A challenge was then brought by an heir of entail succeeding to A, in the Court of Chancery in England, of the previous procedure had there by A, which was directed against A’s executor, B; and concurrently therewith an action was raised against B in the Court of Session, with the view, by using diligence on the dependence, of attaching the Scots estate, alleged to have been purchased with the trust-funds, and to which B had now made up titles, and thereby acquiring a security which could not be obtained in England, intermediate to, and to await the issue of the challenge there,—decree in the Scots action being craved conform to the order to be pronounced in the Court of Chancery. Plea in defence of lis alibi pendens repelled, and action sustained, in the circumstances, as relevant, and consequently the diligence used on the dependence. But observed, that the Court had the right to prevent the remedy being abused, by calling on the party to show the nature of the progress of the English suit; and that the diligence might be modified, altered, or recalled, as the Court in the circumstances should see fit.

The late John Dingwall, who was by birth a Scotsman, and possessed the estates of Brucklay and others in the county of Aberdeen, died in May 1812, leaving two deeds regulating his succession. The first of these was a tailzie, dated 7th September 1807, whereby, under the fetters of a strict entail, he conveyed his estates of Brucklay, &c., to his grandnephew, John Dingwall, then of St James’s Street, Westminster, and the heirs of his body; whom failing, to the heirs-male of the body of William Dingwall of Culsh; whom failing, to the series of heirs therein set forth. The second deed was a will executed in England on 13th June 1808 in the English form, by which he (in the first place) conveyed to James Chalmer of Abingdon Street, Westminster, George Burley of Lincoln’s-Inn, Middlesex, and Alexander Crombie of Aberdeen, the survivor or survivors, and executors, administrators, and assigns of such survivor, as trustees, his real property situated in London and Croydon, for the use and behoof nomination of the series of heirs contained in the entail of the estates of Brucklay. The testator then, after providing for payment of all debts, &c., conveyed the residue of his estates, whatsoever and wheresoever, after being realised, to the same trustees, to be invested by them in the purchase of lands in England or Scotland; and these purchases, whether in England or Scotland, he expressly bound the trustees to settle, “to the uses upon, and for the trusts, intents and purposes, and with, under, and subject to the powers, provisions and declarations, and in the manner to, upon, for, with, under, subject to, and in which I have settled my estates at Brucklay in Scotland, by a certain deed of settlement, bearing date” 7th September 1807.

After the death of the testator, on 28th May 1812, the institute made up titles under the entail, and the trustees administered under the English will, and confirmed in Scotland; and it appeared, that after defraying all lawful claims on the estate, there remained in the hands of the trustees a balance of upwards of £260,000 to answer the trusts of the testator. In the course of their actings, and while the whole of the trustees and the institute were in life, the trustees invested a portion of this sum, amounting to upwards of £173,000, in certain estates in the counties of Aberdeen and Kincardine, and these purchases the trustees entailed according to the testator’s injunctions, under the fetters of strict entail, on the same series of heirs as contained in the entail of Brucklay. On the death of the trustees there remained a considerable balance, amounting to £100,000, exclusive of interest from 1812, still uninvested, and applicable to the purposes of the will. It is in regard to this sum that the present question has arisen.

The institute having died on 21st January 1833, by which time the whole of the trustees had deceased, the succession opened to his son, John Duff Dingwall, a minor, who then adopted certain proceedings in the English Court of Chancery, for the purposes of setting free from the trusts, and operation of the English will, such sum or sums of money as yet remained uninvested by the trustees; and this appeared to have been done ostensibly in consonance with, or, as alleged, under colour of the views of English practice, by which an entail may be defeated or barred by certain procedure. Neither the pursuer nor the series of heirs of entail in Scotland were subpoenaed, nor were they parties to these proceedings in Chancery, but it appeared that one of them, having a very remote interest, and who lived in London, was subpoenaed, and the grandfather of the pursuer, who lived in Scotland, had lodged a protest against the validity of the proceedings, which resulted in certain orders of the Master of the Rolls, by which John Duff Dingwall received into free and uncontrolled possession the remaining uninvested balance of the testator's estate, part of which, it was alleged in the summons, he had invested in the purchase of two estates, Fedderat and Ardlaw, in Aberdeenshire, taking the titles to himself in fee-simple.

John Duff Dingwall died in October 1840, leaving a trust-disposition, executed a short time before his death, whereby he conveyed his whole property, heritable and moveable, to certain trustees and executors; inter alios, the defender, for the use and behoof of the said defender, who was a stranger in blood, and a domiciled Englishman, and who thereupon completed titles to the foresaid two estates of Fedderat and Ardlaw. By the death of John Duff Dingwall, who survived his wife without issue, the heirs of the body of the institute became extinct, and the succession opened to the second branch of the destination in the Brucklay entail, viz., to the pursuer, Arthur Dingwall Fordyce of Culsh, as heir-male of William Dingwall of Culsh, and he accordingly took up the estates under the old entail, as well as those entailed by the trustees of the testator.

The pursuer then brought this action, in which he set forth, that under colour of obtaining the opinion of the Court of Chancery in England, as to whether, or how far the residue of the testator's means had been applied by the trustees in conformity with his will, and as to how the uninvested balance should be applied, John Duff Dingwall had adopted certain proceedings in that Court, in which, professedly with the above view, but really in virtue of an alleged illegal scheme, concocted by him and certain parties who had officiously interfered with the minor and the estate, he attempted to defeat the trusts of the will, by obtaining the residue to be invested in lands in fee-simple; and that, in pursuance of such scheme, certain orders of the Court of Chancery were procured, by means of which the money was taken possession of by the defender's author, who thereafter invested a portion of the funds, as now exclusively his own, in lands in fee-simple in Scotland, namely, Fedderat and Ardlaw. The summons specially set forth at length the alleged nature of the various steps in Chancery, subsuming that they were inept, as in defraud of the will, and funditus null and void, and alleging that the pursuer had accordingly raised a suit in Chancery in England against the defender, who was a domiciled Englishman, to set aside the previous procedure had by his author John Duff Dingwall. The pursuer then set forth, generally, the nature of his bill of complaint in the Court of Chancery, which was, that that Court was called on to ordain and decern the defender to account for, replace and reinvest in Court, all the sums of money illegally transferred to his author, and to have it declared that these sums were still subject to the trusts of the will.

The summons then proceeded—

"That the pursuer has been advised that the said proceedings, now commenced, and in dependence in our said Court of Chancery in England, are necessary or expedient for the end and purpose of annulling and setting aside the several decrees and other matters complained of: Nevertheless, necessary it is for the pursuer to raise and follow out this present action before our Court of Session in Scotland, concurrently therewith, and to the end and effect that he may be able, by process of law in Scotland, to procure and enforce implement and satisfaction of the decree or decrees to be pronounced in the said cause, now depending in our said Court of Chancery in England, in so far as certain portions of the foresaid residuary trust-funds and effects, attempted to be diverted by the said John Duff Dingwall, or others in his name, were, by him or others acting for him, laid out and invested in the foresaid lands and estates of Fedderat and Ardlaw or Ardley and others, as hereinbefore narrated, and which lands and estates are now, according to the writs and title-deeds thereof, in hereditate jacente of the said John Duff Dingwall, as in fee-simple, or are pretended to be vested, by personal or feudal right, in the said Sir Henry Bridges, as the sole accepting trustee of the said John Duff Dingwall, or of the said Sir Henry Bridges himself, as an individual pretending to have lawful right thereto, and beneficiary interest therein, and which lands and estates are not subject to, or within the jurisdiction of our said Court of Chancery in England, and so cannot be attached or secured by any diligence or process of law executorial, issuing out of the said Court: And further, et separatim, that the pursuer may obtain decree of declarator and otherwise, on the grounds and to the effect after mentioned."

The conclusions of the present action were—(1.) That it should be found and declared,

"by decree of our said Lords," "conform to, and in concurrence with, the aforesaid cause now depending in our said Court of Chancery in England, and to the end and effect that the pursuer may obtain implement and satisfaction of the decrees or decrees, order or orders, to be pronounced therein:"

that the sums paid and transferred to John Duff Dingwall, under orders of the Court of Chancery, formed part of the residue of the testator, and were, and are now subject to the trusts of his will, and that the trusts of said will were not discharged by the proceedings adopted by the defender's author, and that the same ought now to be invested and secured for the benefit of the pursuer, and the series of heirs under the Brucklay entail: (2.) That the defender should be bound to exhibit a particular account of his and the deceased John Duff Dingwall's intromissions with the residuary estate of the testator, so that the sums remaining in his hands should be applied, under the authority of any competent court of law or equity, according to the testator's will: (3.) That it should be found that the estates of Fedderat and Ardlaw were purchased out of the residue, or funds improperly diverted from the trusts of the will: (4.) That the defender ought to be ordained to convey these lands to the pursuer, and the series of heirs in the Brucklay entail, conform to the said will,—the said defender, in that event, being allowed to take credit in his and J. D. Dingwall's account of intromissions with the residue, for such sum or sums as had been laid out in these purchases: (5.) That as to the value of the residue which would then remain, after giving credit as aforesaid, it should be found that the defender ought to consign the same in Court, to the effect of being applied in this or any other competent process, in pursuance of the trusts of the said will, "and in implement of the decree or decrees to be pronounced in the said action and cause now depending in our said Court of Chancery in England, and in this present action."

The summons then contained a conclusion, that in the event of the defender failing to compare, it should be held, after giving credit for the purchases of the said two estates, that £60,000 was the balance remaining over of the trust-funds.

The defender pleaded—1. That the action was incompetent, in respect of the lis pendens in the Court of Chancery; and farther, in respect that it related to the powers and actings of executors under an English will, and that the matter was already res judicata by the decrees of the Court of Chancery,—the competent Court for the decision of questions arising upon the will of the testator. 2. The Court of Session being excluded from the consideration of the merits of the case, or the validity or regularity of the English decree of the Court of Chancery, it was incompetent to raise action in this Court merely as a means of obtaining diligence in security, more especially without leave obtained from the Court of Chancery, in which alone the merits of the questions in dependence could be tried. 3. The conclusion, that the defender should convey to the pursuer the lands of Ardlaw and Fedderat, as purchased out of the funds devised by the will of John Dingwall, was also incompetent,—(1.) Because it was consequent on the other conclusions for setting aside the decree of the Court of Chancery, and for having it declared that, by the purposes of the will, the trustees were bound to invest the residue in lands in Scotland, which could not be maintained before this Court: (2.) Because, even if these estates had been purchased out of the residue, which was not admitted, the pursuer could not insist for a conveyance of the estates so purchased, but only for repayment or replacement in the Court of Chancery of that portion of the residue with which they were purchased. 4. The decrees of the Court of Chancery fixing the interpretation of John Dingwall's will, and the place and mode in which the residue of his personal estate was to be invested, were res judicata, until set aside on the ground of irregularity in the proceedings. 5. The whole proceedings having been regular, these decrees are valid and unchallengeable.

The general scope of the defender's argument was as follows:—

The pursuer's real object was not so much to discuss the questions here as to the validity of the previous Chancery suit, as to obtain diligence in security by inhibition or arrestment on the dependence. But could an action with such conclusions, SCOTTISH JURIST.

and in such circumstances, be sustained to any extent? Sir Henry Bridges was an English executor, living and domiciled in England, and in that character administering to an English will. Now, he is called here to answer as executor of John Duff Dingwall in reference to trust-matters arising out of the English will of the original testator, and in reference to the conduct and discretion of the trustees, and that, too, under an admission that the pursuer had taken steps in England with precisely the same object. But it is clear law that an English executor, administering to, and acting under an English will, cannot be called on to account, by any action in this country, as to his intromissions, still less for the actings of others whom he does not represent. It is in England only that he could be called on to account, being an executor under an English will,—and the Court of Chancery was the only competent forum for such a question. An executor is bound to account only in the Court from which he derives his authority, and where he must obtain his exoneration. Supposing, then, that the pursuer had tried to found a jurisdiction against the original trustees of the first Mr Dingwall, by arresting the funds of the trust in Scotland with the view jurisdictionis fundandæ causæ, and had then brought an action against these trustees, to have it found that the residue of the trust-funds was to be invested, like the former part, in Scotland, this Court could have had no right to entertain the action, or interfere as to the construction of, or rights arising out of the testator's will, because it was an English deed, and the Court of Chancery was the proper forum for such a question. In such a case, the trustees would have been entitled to say, the propriety of our actings is a question of English law on an English will; we can only be called on to account in England,—and that answer must have been sustained. It was quite possible that there might be jurisdiction in the abstract, if an arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causæ be used; or if the parties had heritable estates in Scotland. But that does not remove the difficulty; which does not so much rest in the absence of jurisdiction, as that the party ought not to be called to account, except within the Courts which are the proper interpreters of the rules according to which he should have acted. It was also true that the general rule suffers an exception which, with the cases bearing upon it, would probably be founded on on the other side, viz., where an English executor, administering under an English will, leaves that country and arrives in Scotland with the funds of the trust. In that case, the Court here might sustain action against him, but in doing so, the Court would proceed on equitable grounds entirely; because in that case, although in the abstract the English Courts would be the proper forum to call him to account, yet the party would be deprived of a remedy altogether if the Court here refused to sustain action. But it would be on equitable grounds alone—on the ground that the party, by coming here, had rendered it impossible to sue him within the proper forum to which he was primarily answerable—that the Court would proceed. See the case of Brown, 17th December 1830, S. and D., Vol. IX. p. 224; and Dickson, 7th June 1833, S. and D., Vol. XI. p. 685. In this case, the defender is called on to account, not for his own actings, but for something done by the trustees under the original will of Mr Dingwall, senior. Now, independent of the Chancery proceedings, Sir Henry Bridges, who could not be in a worse situation than the original trustees, could not be called on to account here, being an English executor administering to an English succession, and who must get his exoneration in the Court of Chancery; and that particularly, seeing that he was called on to account for a sum transferred to his constituent by authority of that Court. The whole question raised on the merits in the present action, regarding, as it did, a question of discretion of trustees acting under an English will, was not one for this Court, even if there had been no previous proceedings elsewhere. The Court of Chancery was the proper Court to say if the trustees have acted rightly. But that Court had already decided; and the decree is against the pursuer. And, supposing that that decree was a subsisting decree, then, besides the objection arising from the case being brought in Scotland, the decree forms res judicata against the pursuer's claims. The pursuer, however, says that he has taken proceedings in England to try the merits of the decree;—that he has commenced proceedings in Chancery for having it set aside—equivalent to our action of reduction. But surely it would be a singular result if the action here, being originally incompetent, should become competent, in consequence of the lis alibi pendens in Chancery. It surely rendered this action the more incompetent, that the pursuer cannot reach any of the conclusions now maintained against the defender, except by a judgment of the Court of Chancery reducing its former judgment. No judgment on the merits of the questions at issue could be pronounced by this Court; the decisions of the Chancery are final till set aside in Chancery, and the pursuer did not pretend that he could ask this Court to determine the matter; he only says, when the Court of Chancery so determine, I ask a decree conform; and in the meantime security by arrestment and inhibition. This notion was probably grounded on the case of Wedderburn, (supra, p. 336). But as to that case, at the utmost it brings out nothing more than the principle, that where an action, which would have been originally competent in this Court, is brought here mainly to obtain security, after an action raised in England, the Court would consider the whole circumstances, and say, if in equity the party was entitled, over and above his original suit, to maintain action here. This case was a contrast to the Wedderburn case. It is a question as to an English will, and as to the discretion of the trustees acting under it in England. Now this was eminently a question for the Court of Chancery, and so it had been submitted to that Court, and decided. 1st, In the Wedderburn case, it was not a question as to an English will, or any one where the Court of Chancery was particularly or exclusively entitled to try the case. It was a mere question of partnership accounting. Therefore, it might have been as well raised originally in the Court of Session, and the defenders there could not have maintained the objection, viz., that they were bound only to account in England as executors there. Some of the defenders in that case were English executors, but not all. But at all events, the question involved nothing peculiar to the English Courts. In this way it was reasonable for the Court here to say, that as the case might have been raised in either Court, they would not throw out the one in this Court till they saw the result elsewhere, and that, in the meantime, they would enable the pursuers to obtain the remedy of diligence. 2d, The Wedderburn case did not involve any questions as to the regularity of proceedings in England, nor was there any previous decree of that Court finding that the trust-money should be invested in England; but here the circumstances are the reverse. Both the regularity and the justice of a previous Chancery judgment are involved, and unless both points are decided in favour of the pursuer, he could not proceed a step here. 3d, Then, in the Wedderburn case, there was authority granted by the Court of Chancery to pursue an action in this Court. That Court had granted leave to the pursuer to obtain such security as he could get by the law of Scotland. The way in which the granting or refusing of leave by the Court of Chancery comes to be relevant, is this, that the plea of lis alibi, strictly applied, would go to exclude the action in Scotland entirely; but from equitable motives, it may be competent to the Court in Scotland to say if they will grant, in the circumstances, an intermediate remedy to the extent of supporting diligence in security; and if so, the circumstance that leave has been granted by the Court of Chancery—the Court best acquainted with the merits of the case—is an important consideration in estimating the apparent equity in favour of the pursuer. The consulted Judges in the Wedderburn case did not go the length of saying that when the plea of lis alibi is pleaded, it will, or will not, exclude the action here; but they say they have entirely the right to judge whether the action shall be allowed or not. (See page 13 of Opinions at end.) Here no leave had been asked, the pursuer foreseeing that, in the circumstances, none would have been given. In regard to that part of the case which was previously pressed, viz., as to the defender being an English executor, reference is made to the opinions of the majority of the Judges in the Wedderburn case, p. 4. As to the conclusions of the summons, there was one which, it may be said, could not fall within the scope of the previous observations, but then it is one which is clearly put in to give the summons an appearance of competency, viz., the conclusions as to Fedderat and Ardlaw;—that these lands being purchased with moneys belonging to old Mr Dingwall's trust-estate, must be held truly to belong to the pursuer. It may be true that that point was not, and could not come within the jurisdiction of the Chancery Court, but then this conclusion is thrown in to give the action an appearance of containing a separate ground of action. But in reference to that ground, 1st, It is not admitted that the money which was paid for these properties formed any part of the trust-property. 2d, But assuming that the case was to be taken as stated by the pursuer, still that was no ground for supporting the action, because this conclusion could not be reached before making out the other conclusions, which, it was maintained, were not relevant in this Court. This conclusion was just the sequence of the others; and if they could not be supported, neither could the conclusion alluded to. If the Court could not say whether the previous Chancery judgment was right or wrong, they cannot entertain the conclusion which proceeds on the assumption that it is wrong. 3d, But there is another view. If the lands were purchased, as was alleged on the face of the summons, this conclusion could not follow from the premises. The pursuer says, Mr Dingwall appropriated part of the trust-funds, and purchased lands with them, and these ought to be conveyed to him. Now, it was conceived that the only extent to which the pursuer, if otherwise right, could claim, is, that Sir Henry Bridges would be bound to replace the money uplifted by Mr D. Dingwall in the hands of the Court of Chancery in England; the pursuer could not call upon Mr D. Dingwall's executor to execute a conveyance in his favour of all the lands which Mr D. Dingwall may have purchased with the funds uplifted. He could only ask that things should be put in statu quo.

For the pursuer it was argued—

That the pleas of the defender would have been relevant but for the recent case of Wedderburn, supra, p. 336, and the several cases there referred to. Now it was a shut point, that it was competent to carry on a suit here professedly for the same purpose, and against the same parties, and concurrently with a suit in Chancery for the intermediate remedy of diligence, as well as to enforce the decree to be pronounced by the Court of Chancery in the cause. This case was identical in principle with that of Wedderburn. No substantial difference could be pointed out between them, except this, that the present was a stronger case for the application of the principle. The only question, therefore, was, whether the pursuer had set forth a relevant case on the record? because, if so, then he was entitled to have the action supported to the extent of diligence. Now it was distinctly set forth, that the previous proceedings in Chancery were in fraud of the will, and taken in pursuance of a scheme, and quite repugnant to the actings and wishes of the trustees, as alleged to have been duly and publicly announced. The pursuer might not be able to substantiate his averments in the Court of Chancery; but meantime, in a question of relevancy, the truth of them fell to be assumed, and he was therefore entitled to a proof of his averments. The defender had not attempted to show that the pursuer had failed in alleging a relevant case. He only attempts to exclude this action by pleading certain grounds of law which either were inapplicable to the circumstances, or irrelevant after the case of Wedderburn, which must rule the present case. It was said that the previous proceedings formed res judicata, but they were now under reduction; and besides, being foreign decrees, they were not to be looked on as final, but decrees in absence, to open up which the pursuer was entitled to time; and he had set forth a relevant ground to show that they were inept quoad him. It was also said, that it was incompetent to compel an English executor acting under an English will, and domiciled in England, to account in this Court. But that was to mistake the case; for the defender was not the executor of the testator under the English will, but the executor of John Duff Dingwall under his Scots settlement, and, besides, infert in Scots heritage. The pursuer finds the defender acting under this Scots trust-deed, and also that he is an heritable proprietor in Scotland. Is he not entitled, in these circumstances, to sue that party over whom the Court here have confessedly jurisdiction? It might be true that the process would require to be sisted for the English proceedings before decree conform could be pronounced. But then, with jurisdiction over the party, were not the Court here entitled to interfere and support an action which was perfectly relevantly laid, while parts of the very funds which were alleged to have been illegally diverted, were actually brought within Scotland, and invested in landed estate? Then again, and besides these pleas, the summons contained conclusions as to the defender being obliged to convey over the landed property to the pursuer, in respect of being bought with the trust-money. These conclusions formed a separate ground of action; and, irrespective of any other ground, they were sufficient to support the case. As to obtaining any order from Chancery to enable the Court here to allow the pursuer to bring an action, it was contended that that was absurd, as neither would the Court here attend to it, even supposing the action were in itself competent, any more than it could render an action competent which otherwise was wholly inept.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"19th March 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel on the preliminary defences, and made avizandum.—In respect it is not competent for this Court to entertain any challenge (whether in the shape of declarator, reduction, or otherwise) of the decrees, orders, or other proceedings of the English Court of Chancery, under authority of which the trusts of the will in dispute were discharged and extinguished, and the residuary estate under said will transferred and paid over to the late John Duff Dingwall (whom the defender here represents), freed from the said trusts, and in all respects as his own absolute and unlimited property,—the said Chancery decrees, &c., having to this effect been carried within their own proper forum, into complete and perfect execution: In respect, further, that the mere dependence at the pursuer's instance of such a challenge in the said Court of Chancery, as in truth the only Court competent to entertain the same, is not sufficient to confer upon this Court a primary jurisdiction in the matter, which it would not otherwise have possessed, and, in the absence of such primary jurisdiction, there are not, and cannot be, termini habiles for any mere accessory diligence in security, on a dependence in itself radically unsubstantial and unreal: And finally, in respect that so long as the foresaid original proceedings, whereby the trusts of the said will stand at this moment extinguished and discharged, shall not, by due and competent authority, have been recalled, the same must operate in this Court as a complete and absolute bar to any demand on the part of the pursuer (even supposing the same were otherwise competent), whether for carrying into execution the trusts of the said will, or any of them, as if they were still lawfully subsisting and effectual trusts; or for replacing under the said trusts any portion of the original trust-estate, or any moneys which may have been realised by disposal thereof, or any new property or estate which may have been purchased by means of the said moneys as a surrogatum for the original estate, or otherwise.—Sustains the said defences, and dismisses this action; finds the pursuer liable in expenses, and appoints an account thereof to be given in, and remits the same, when lodged, to the auditor to tax and report, and decerns.

"Note.—This case seems clearly distinguishable from that of Wedderburn, in which there was a recent consultation of the whole Court; inasmuch as there is here a radical want of primary jurisdiction.

"Accordingly, had there been no depending challenge in the Court of Chancery of the original proceedings, whereby that Court put an end to the will, and discharged the various trusts contained in it, it is thought it could not for a moment have been argued that an action, with the conclusions of the present, would have been maintainable. The decree of Chancery must in that case have been received as res judicata; and it could not in any respect have been got the better of. It was quite different in the case of Wedderburn, for there the action was one which the primary jurisdiction of this Court to entertain (as apart from equitable considerations of expediency, comitas, &c.), was not disputed.

"Is the case then bettered by the mere dependence of a recessory process in the competent forum? It is conceived not; for in this shape, all the difficulty implied in the old objection of his pendens comes just to be superadded; and this too under the most unfavourable circumstances.

"In short, the attempt here made is just an attempt to obtain the security of Scots diligence in aid of an English Chancery suit, under circumstances where there are no termini habiles for a proper Scots dependence, and where, therefore, the pretended dependence on which the diligence is to rest has truly in itself no legal substance. But it is essential, in all diligence on a dependence, that the primary action be competently entertainable before the accessory diligence can be supported.

"The analogies of the case seem to approximate it more closely to Findlater in not. to Leith, 17th January 1811, than to Wedderburn. See also Ross, 26th November 1782, and Douglas, Heron and Company, 18th November 1793, as reversed on appeal (Dict. 4600 and 4602)."

The pursuer reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Medwyn said, that he could take no difference between this case and that of Wedderburn. He retained the opinion he formed in that case; but, seeing no difference between the cases, this one fell to be ruled in conformity with the case of Wedderburn. It appeared, however, to him that this was an illustration of the progress which was sometimes made in the application of a principle when once it has been fixed; but he agreed that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor must be altered.

Lord Justice-Clerk could not distinguish this case from that of Wedderburn, and thought it a more favourable one for the principle then decided, than the case of Wedderburn itself. (Stated the circumstances of the case). Two things were clear from the record: (1.) That J. Duff Dingwall was not a party charged in any way with the execution of the testator's will, but carried through proceedings in Chancery to defeat it, which are said to have been collusive and illegal. He had not in the face of the summons any connection with England or the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, other than his interest as a beneficiary under the trust, which enabled him to appear there: (2.) That the ground of action against the defender does not depend upon any connection with the law of England, nor with his birth or residence as being in England, but as having received, by the settlement of his author, the money of the trust, and, indeed, the estates in this country, alleged to have been purchased by the very funds themselves which are said to have been unwarrantably appropriated, and so liable for the wrong of his author. The action is the same as if it had been directed against any other party who happened to be the executor of J. D. Dingwall, and who was never out of Aberdeenshire. The defender, being an Englishman, has nothing to do with the validity of the proceedings instituted in Chancery by his author, nor has he any connection with the testator's will; and these appear to be important facts in the case. The action narrated that the pursuer has raised a suit in Chancery to set aside the proceedings of J. D. Dingwall as having been fraudulent and illegal under the will, and it claims the money so misappropriated, either as it may remain free in the defender's hands, or as invested in Federat and Ardlaw. There are conclusive authorities on this point in Scotland, and, his Lordship thought, also in England, in support of such a claim. The pursuer finds the defender in Scotland, or what is the same thing, his heritable property there;—in fact, property purchased, as alleged, out of the misappropriated funds; and the defender represents J. D. Dingwall by universal title. Now, the pursuer does not insist on being allowed a double litigation, but he requests that the action here may be sustained meantime, to the effect of diligence, and that this Court should sist procedure while he follows out his suit in England, where the defender must appear, and if he is successful, then he claims to have the English decree rendered effectual in this case by a decree conform. The pursuer is entitled, in this question of relevancy, to assume that he will succeed in England, and if he do so, he would undoubtedly be entitled to render the estate of the defender in this country answerable for whatever decree he shall obtain there. But if so after the litigation, he has the same claim by our practice intermediately. We are constantly in the practice of allowing diligence on the dependence, as intermediate security. As to leave not having been obtained from the Lord Chancellor to carry on this case, that is out of the question, as no such leave would render an incompetent case competent in this Court. It was said that this Court would have had no jurisdiction to sustain action against J. D. Dingwall himself; but his Lordship could not assent to that in the circumstances set forth in the summons, though it might have been a question, on that supposition, as to how the case would have been explicated,—whether by compelling him to appear in Chancery, and directing the pursuer to go there, keeping the action here in dependence in this Court,—or in what other way? But it was not necessary to consider that case. And on the view his Lordship took of this case, and of that of Wedderburn, he did not think the competency of the action at all depended on the consideration, whether this Court had jurisdiction to try the case or not, as on the merits between the parties. The principle on which the case of Wedderburn rested was, that a party who raises a suit in England against his debtor there, was entitled to institute a process in Scotland against the same party, if he had property in Scotland, in order to make that estate available here, in case of succeeding in England. There is no intermediate remedy in England pending process; while here the law recognises that, which is a very material difference. In this view of the principle of Wedderburn, it is of no consequence whether this Court had or had not jurisdiction over the merits of the case between the parties. Such action, it is admitted, could competently be raised against the defender, in the circumstances of the case, after the pursuer's success in Chancery; but what difference could be taken between the decree obtained and the action raised? None whatever. The dependence of the suit in England is a civil right and interest to be promoted and vindicated in this country, if the defender has property here. His Lordship was not prepared to say that there was any anomaly in permitting a suit to be instituted in this Court, the merits of which could not be tried; because he could not say that the Court had no jurisdiction over a person with heritage in Scotland, to the effect of trying any questions material to be tried between him, and another raising an action against him. The delay or sisting, to enable the point to be tried in England, was matter rather of discretion, and was distinct from any question of competency. Besides, it rather seemed that the sisting, in order to the case being investigated in England, was just advancing the case, and preparing it for determination ultimately here. The dependence of a suit in England gives the Court in Scotland full jurisdiction over a defender with heritable property here, if there be any end, in material justice between the parties, which the entertaining a suit here may advance and promote. The present case illustrates, as forcibly as any that could be conceived, that the ends of justice would be essentially served by sustaining the action now before the Court. The pursuer appears to have a clear title and interest, in the circumstances stated by him, to call on this Court to sustain his action, to the effect of making the defender's heritage answerable for any decree in his favour which he may obtain in Chancery, by showing that the Chancery proceedings were illegal, and to prevent him dilapidating the property alleged to be purchased out of the very fund in dispute, which, but for our decree, the defender might at any time effect. His Lordship also considered, that by the tenor of the Articles of Union, a pursuer, in such a case as this, had a clear ground of right to insist against a defender so circumstanced, and that the dependence of an action in one of her Majesty's Courts in one part of the United Kingdom, as in England, was a civil right by the law of Scotland and the Treaty of Union, sufficient to found action in this country; and this Court could prevent any abuse of the right, by calling on the party at any time to state the progress of the Chancery proceedings; when, if no satisfactory explanation were given, the Court could easily control the party, either by modifying or recalling the diligence used on the dependence, or by altogether dismissing the action itself. His Lordship, in conclusion, stated, that he considered that the principle decided in the case of Wedderburn was truly involved in Leith v. General Hay, 17th January 1811.

Lord Meadowbank could not agree at all in the observation, that this was any illustration of advance in principle. He could see no difference whatever between this case and that of Wedderburn. It just showed the wisdom with which the Court gradually got at the principles which support the ends of material justice. He concurred in altering the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Moncreiff absent.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Alter the interlocutor complained of: Repel the preliminary defences; and remit to the Lord Ordinary to do further in the cause as to his Lordship may be deemed just."

SECOND DIVISION.—(G.D.F.)

No. 199.—JOHN M'FARLANE AND OTHERS, Pursuers and Suspenders, v. RANDAL WILLIAM CALLENDER and ROBERT LOWIS, Defenders and Respondents.

Suspension—Reduction—Remit to Person of Skill—Process—Property—Damage.—A pursuer challenged an operation begun by the defenders on their own property, on the ground of its being injurious to his adjoining property, and craved a remit to a person of skill. The Sheriff named a person, who was not objected to, and who reported that the operation was positively beneficial to the complainer, on which the Sheriff recalled his interim interdict, and found the complainer liable in expenses, reserving to him any claim for damages competent to him. In a reduction of the decree on the merits, and suspension of the decree for expenses, the Court repelled the reasons of suspension and reduction, but remitted to the Lord Ordinary to ascertain, 1st, whether the defenders had done every thing to protect the complainer's property from injury by their operation? and, 2d, if not, what further operations should be done for that purpose? and, 3d, whether any damage had been done to the complainer's property by the operation complained of?

The suspenders and Lowis are conterminous proprietors. Callender, the tenant of the latter, having in 1838 commenced to straighten a small stream which flowed principally through his farm, and merely touched the suspenders' march at two points, with the view of making it run close to, and parallel with, the march-dyke for about three hundred yards, the suspenders presented an application to the Sheriff of Stirlingshire to interdict the operation, as injurious to their property. Lowis became a party to the suspension,—in the prayer of which M'Farlane craved the Sheriff to "appoint a person or persons of skill to be named by your Lordship or the parties, to examine and report upon the proposed alteration of the channel of the burn." The Sheriff appointed a Mr Blackadder to report as craved; and on considering the report of that person—who stated that the operation was beneficial rather than otherwise to the property of the suspenders—his Lordship (October 1838) recalled the interdict which had been granted, reserving to the suspenders any claim for damages competent to them, and found them liable in expenses. On a charge for these expenses, the present suspension (on caution) was brought, on the grounds mainly stated in the reduction; and they likewise raised an action to set aside the grounds and warrants of the Inferior Court process, and for damages. The reasons were, that there were no grounds for having subjected the suspenders in expenses, but, on the contrary, good grounds for having interdicted as originally craved, in respect the operations would injure their property.

"Quarto, The former channel of the said burn was, except at one place, at a very considerable distance from the foresaid march-dyke and the pursuers' lands, and the pursuers did not apprehend any injury from it; but the defenders, or the said Randal William Callender, acting with the approbation and sanction of the said other defender, the said Robert Lewis, has illegally and unwarrantably, to an extent of near 300 paces, altered the course or channel of the said burn, and has diverted the burn into a new channel, which approaches within two feet or thereby of the foresaid march-dyke and the pursuers' lands, and thereby has endangered the march-dyke, and placed it in continual risk of being thrown down, and has exposed the pursuers' lands to continual risk of injury, whereby the pursuers will eventually be put to considerable expense by repairs on the said march-dyke, and the value of their property be deteriorated. Quinto, That though the said Sheriff, on a pretended report of Alexander Blackadder, land-surveyor in Stirling, recalled the interlocutor of interim interdict first pronounced by him, and pronounced the said decree or decrees, yet the said report is erroneous and unfounded in various of its statements and in its conclusions, and the said decrees founded thereon are also erroneous and illegal; for, since the same were pronounced, the said burn, as so diverted from its old channel, and made to run in said new channel by the said defenders, or the said Randal William Callender, with the approbation and sanction of the said Robert Lewis, has actually injured and damaged the said march-dyke, and the pursuers' lands and property: Therefore," &c.

And they concluded that

"the said Randal William Callender and Robert Lewis, or at least the said Robert Lewis, ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, to bring back or restore the said burn to its former channel, and to replace the said march-dyke and the bed and banks of the said burn, as near as may be, in their former state: Or at least, it ought and should be found and declared, by decree foresaid, that the said Robert Lewis is bound to take immediate and effectual means to protect the said march-dyke and the pursuers' property from all risk of future injury, in consequence of the alteration in the course of the said burn, and he ought and should be decerned and ordained immediately to execute the necessary works for that purpose; and failing his doing so, the pursuers ought and should be authorised and empowered to make the operations necessary for the above purpose at the expense of the said Robert Lewis: And the said Randal William Callender and Robert Lewis ought and should be decerned and ordained to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £40 Sterling, or such other sum as shall be ascertained to be the damage done to the said march-dyke and the pursuers' lands, by the change of the channel of the said burn."

The defenders, Callender and Lewis, gave in defences denying the allegations in the summons, and averring that the operation had been rendered much more complete than the one recommended by Mr Blackadder in his report (the nature of the alleged improvement was set forth), in consequence of which not only no injury, it was stated, could arise to the suspenders, but the course of the burn, as altered, would prove beneficial to the property of the suspenders.

The defender, Callender, ceased to hold his farm after Martinmas 1839, but the other defender, Lewis, had completed the operations which had been commenced by Callender.

It was pleaded in defence—1. That in the circumstances stated, there were no grounds for complaint, or for reducing the Inferior Court process; and, besides, the pursuers were barred from reducing the decree of the Sheriff, or from challenging the operations in question. 2. Mr Blackadder's report having been obtained on the pursuer's own application, and on consent of both parties, who selected this as the proper mode of ascertaining the facts, was conclusive against both parties: Rowat v. Whitehead, 17th November 1826; 5 S. and D., 19. Halket v. Earl of Elgin, 9th February 1831, 9 S. and D., 412. 3. The conclusion to have the burn restored to its former course was improperly directed against the defender, Callender, who had ceased to have any connection with the subjects.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"21st January 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties in the conjoined processes of suspension and reduction, and considered the record, repels the reasons of suspension; finds the letters orderly proceeded; sustains the defences against the reductive and declaratory conclusions; assoilzies the defenders against these conclusions, and decerns; and with respect to the conclusion for damages, appoints the cause to be enrolled among the motions, in order that the parties may say how they wish it to be disposed of: Finds the suspender and pursuer liable in the expense of discussing the reasons of suspension, and the declaratory and reductive conclusions of the reduction; appoints an account thereof to be given in, and, when lodged, remits to the auditor to tax the same, and to report.

"Note.—The question, both in the suspension and in the reduction, is, whether the Sheriff's interlocutor was right when it was pronounced? And this is settled by the facts, that when the pursuer challenged an operation begun by the defenders upon their own property, on the ground of its being injurious to him, he craved a remit to a person of skill, to be named by the Sheriff; that the Sheriff named a person, who was not objected to; that the person's report was, that the operation was absolutely beneficial to the complainer. What, in these circumstances, could the Sheriff do, but recal the interdict, with expenses, reserving the pursuers' right to damages if injury was done.

"He now says that subsequent injury has occurred. But instead of going on only with his claim of damages, he insists that the original decree shall be suspended and reduced, these being the decrees obtained in consequence of the remit craved by himself.

"If the damages be not settled privately, the Lord Ordinary recommends another remit. If this be not agreed to, he must send this conclusion to the issue clerks; but the party who makes this necessary may possibly have to pay for it."

The suspenders reclaimed, praying the Court

"to recal and alter the foresaid interlocutor; and in the process of reduction, declarator and damages, to reduce, declare and decern, in terms of the conclusions of the libel; and in the suspension to suspend the letters and charge simpliciter, and to find the pursuers and suspenders entitled to expenses; or to do otherwise in the premises as to your Lordships may seem just."

But the Court

"Adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, in so far as, in the suspension, the Lord Ordinary repels the reasons of suspension, and finds the letters orderly proceeded; and in the reduction and declarator, repels the reasons of reduction and assoilzies the defenders from these conclusions of the libel; adhere also to the interlocutor, in so far as the Lord Ordinary sustains the defences against the first alternative of the declaratory conclusions, and assoilzies the defenders from these, and so far refuse the prayer of the reclaiming note: Recal, in hoc statu, the finding as to the other declaratory conclusions; and with respect to these conclusions, and to the conclusion for damages, remit to the Lord Ordinary to ascertain, 1. Whether the defender, Lewis, has done every thing which was incumbent on him, in the circumstances of the case, to protect the march-dyke and pursuers' lands from injury in consequence of the alteration in the course of the burn? 2. If he has not done so, what further operations should be performed, or changes made by him? 3. Whether any damage has been done to the march-dyke and the pursuers' lands by the change of the channel of the burn? Adhere also to the expenses found due by the interlocutor, and reserve the question of further expenses as to the defender, Lewis; but as to the defender, Callender, find him entitled to additional expenses, and assoilzie him from this process, as having no longer any interest therein, and decern."

4th June 1842.

No. 200.—SIR WILLIAM RAE (Her Majesty's Advocate), Complainer, v. JOHN DOUGLAS, Respondent.

Small-Debt Act—Arrestment on dependence—Fees—Declared irregular and illegal, 1st, to issue and charge a fee for precepts of arrestment on the dependence of small-debt actions; and, 2. to give discount on fees to pursuers, especially without providing that the full fees should not afterwards be charged as expenses against the defenders.

Sir William Rae, her Majesty's Advocate, presented a petition and complaint, stating, that in the discharge of his public duty, he found it necessary to bring under the notice of the Court "certain malversations in office of John Douglas, writer in Glasgow, clerk to the Justices of the Peace within the county of Lanark." The first alleged malversation was,—that though the Justice of Peace Small-Debt Act (6 Geo. IV. c. 48,) distinctly enumerates the fees of the clerk and other officers of court, declaring (§ 17), "that the following, and no other or higher fees shall be allowed;" and (§ 19) "that if any clerk or depute-clerk of the peace, or any constable or other officer, shall exact or take from any party in a case of small-debt, any fee not expressly authorised by this Act, or any higher rate or fee than is authorised thereby, the person so offending shall be liable to a penalty," &c.; and though no authority was given by the Act to issue precepts or warrants to arrest on the dependence of small-debt actions, yet the respondent and his deputies had been in the habit, since his appointment to the office of clerk, of issuing such precepts without any authority, and exacting for each of them a fee of one shilling. The second alleged malversation was,—that the respondent was in the habit of "giving an allowance or discount upon the regular fees to certain parties taking out a number of complaints, and who may be styled, as it were, wholesale dealers in litigation in the Small-Debt Court, while, at the same time, the full fees are apparently charged against those parties in these complaints by a false marking on the back thereof, or in the act book, by the clerk of court, and they consequently get them included in their decrees, and recover them from the defenders in all cases in which they are successful. The obvious tendency of this arrangement is to increase litigation in the small-debt court of the Justices of the Peace, by holding out a premium or bonus to pursuers to bring their cases into that court, by giving them an undue advantage, to the prejudice of the defenders, and evidently for the object of increasing the emoluments of the clerk of court." On these allegations the petitioner prayed the Court, "upon due inquiry, and admission or proof of the premises, to find that the said John Douglas has been guilty of malversation in his said office, and in respect thereof, to inflict such punishment upon him, by suspension from office, pecuniary penalty, censure or otherwise, as to your Lordships, in the whole circumstances, shall seem meet, and to find him liable in expenses."

Mr Douglas admitted, that till the present complaint was served upon him, but not since, the practices now complained of existed; but to the first of the charges of malversation founded upon them, he answered, that the practice not only existed during the whole period while his predecessor held the office, but had been invariably observed in Lanarkshire, and in almost all the other counties of Scotland, from the institution of the Justice of Peace Small-debt Court. The practice had not originated with the clerks of the peace; for in 1832, several years before the respondent's appointment, the Justices of Lanarkshire, at a statutory meeting of the Quarter-Sessions, and in the exercise of powers supposed to be conferred upon them by the 23d section of the Act, which empowers them, "from time to time, to make such rules and orders as they shall find to be necessary and most conducive for carrying into effect the purposes of this Act, such rules and orders not being inconsistent with any of the express enactments or conditions therein contained, or otherwise contrary to law,"—issued the following regulation:

"The Justices, in respect that, in cases of small-debt complaints, it is often of importance to the complainer to have an opportunity of securing the effects of his debtor before the day of hearing the cause, authorises the clerk, when required to do so, to grant warrant or precept to arrest the effects of the person complained against, for which a fee of one shilling shall be payable."

In like manner, under the first Sheriff-Court Small-debt Act, which on this point is verbatim the same with that of the Justices, it is understood that the Sheriff-clerks were in the practice of issuing and charging for precepts of arrestment on the dependence, in the very manner now complained of.

To the second charge—of giving a discount on the regular fees to parties taking a number of complaints—the respondent answered, that in giving these discounts, he had only followed the practice of the depute Sheriff-clerk at Glasgow; and so far from suspecting there was any irregularity in giving such discounts, he had prominently stated the fact in an official return to the Home Office in 1838. No dissatisfaction with the practice was intimated till 1841, when the respondent immediately ordered it to be discontinued.

At advising,

Lord President.—The charges against the respondent are made in very pointed terms, but after considering the answers, it appears to me that the justice of the case will be satisfied by our declaring our opinion of the practices complained of. As to the practice of granting precepts of arrestment on the dependence of small-debt actions, I am clear that it ought not to be sanctioned. Whether or not the granting of such arrestments be for the convenience of one party or other, it is not authorised by the Statute, and must be discontinued. I see, however, that it has existed for a long time, and has been followed in the Sheriff Court. This affords a strong defence to the respondent, as showing that he has not been intentionally wrong. He finds the practice in existence, and he, moreover, produces a resolution of the Justices, expressly authorising the clerk to issue such warrants, and charge one shilling for each of them. The Justices had no power to pass such a resolution; and the clerk, by looking attentively to the Statute, might have seen cause to doubt if he could safely act upon it; but still, its existence is sufficient to satisfy us that here no corruption is proved. It seems enough for us to declare, that the continuance of the practice will not be sanctioned. As to the other matter of giving discounts, I must express a similar opinion. It is not the proper way of bringing business to Court, and therefore ought not to be sanctioned. I see no ground, however, for impugning the respondent's motives. There is not only the length of time, but a similar practice appears to have existed in the Sheriff-Court, though it is no doubt true, as observed in the replies, that an improper practice in one Court will not justify the same practice in another. The respondent says he allowed the discounts out of favour to the parties; but then he should have taken care that the deduction allowed to the pursuer was not afterwards charged against the defender. It is plain, however, that the practice could not put any additional fees into the respondent's pocket, and cannot form a ground of personal exception against him. I am of opinion, then, that instead of pronouncing any censure or personal findings against Mr Douglas, it will be sufficient to declare that the practices complained of ought not to be continued, and that if they are continued, the consequences will be serious.

Lord Gillies.—I am of the same opinion. The practices are undoubtedly illegal, but the excuse is sufficient; and all that is necessary, is simply to declare the illegality. I cannot see what end could be proposed in inflicting punishment, which, as the respondent is not morally culpable, is not deserved, and which, moreover, could be of no use by way of example, as the practices have ceased.

Lord Mackenzie.—I agree as to both points. The practices were incorrect, but they involve nothing of personal delinquency, and indeed nothing even of gross neglect. The respondent might fall into the practices naturally, and it would be hard to censure him for not looking more narrowly into the power of the Justices. It was proper to stop when the irregularity was pointed out; and in point of fact, Mr Douglas did immediately stop.

Lord Fullerton absent.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Find that the practices complained of are irregular and illegal, and prohibit the continuation thereof; but find, that, in the circumstances of the case, it is not necessary to award any sentence of punishment or censure against the respondent, and decern."

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 201.—AMBROSE GRIMSHAW AND OTHERS, Suspenders, v. JOHN MALCOLM, Respondent.

Debtor and Creditor—Donation—Bankrupt—Bill of Exchange—A party, after being discharged on a composition-contract, granted to one of his creditors, who had not claimed in the sequestration, a bill for the full amount of his debt. Suspension of a charge on this bill refused, in the absence of any averment that it had been obtained from the granter through fraud or concussion.

Joseph Grimshaw, post-master in Glasgow, having become indebted to John Malcolm, hay-dealer, Falkirk, in the sum of £71. 12. 10., he, along with his father, Ambrose Grimshaw, granted a bill for the amount, of date 28th September 1840, and payable at three months. The bill was discounted at Falkirk, but on the 16th of October, during its currency, the estates both of Joseph Grimshaw and Ambrose Grimshaw were separately sequestered. The bankrupts obtained their discharge, on a composition, in the beginning of April 1841. Shortly after, on the 28th April, Malcolm who had not claimed in the sequestration, obtained from Joseph and Ambrose Grimshaw a new bill for £71. 12s., in lieu of the former one for the same amount which had fallen due subsequent to the sequestration. When this bill fell due it was protested for non-payment; and diligence having been used upon it, an arrangement was made, by which Joseph and Ambrose Grimshaw, on 15th February 1842, granted two new bills, being the amount of the former bill for £71. 12s., with interest and expenses. The one of these bills, bearing the additional names of James Richard, and James Brown Adams, was for £36. 3. 5., payable at two months; and the other, without any additional names, was for £36. 18. 5., payable at five months.

The former of these bills having fallen due and been protested for non-payment shortly after Joseph Grimshaw had again been sequestered, a charge was given upon it. This charge is the subject of the present note of suspension, in support of which the suspenders—averring (art. 6), that "a few days after the date of their discharge, the charger prevailed upon, and induced the complainers, Ambrose and Joseph Grimshaw, to grant him a bill for £71. 12s., being the full amount of the claim the charger had against the said Joseph Grimshaw previous to their sequestration. No value was given for this bill to either of the acceptors,"—pleaded, 1. There being no debt due by the complainer, Ambrose Grimshaw, to the charger, under the bill charged on, and the only value given by the charger being for the furnishings of hay, under the original bill for £71. 12s., dated prior to April 1841, and the complainer being discharged of all debts granted prior to that period, on payment of a composition, the charger cannot legally demand any sum beyond the amount of that composition. 2. The other complainers having received no value for the bill, and none having truly passed, excepting for the said original furnishing of hay, no claim lies against them. 3. Unless the charger could allege and prove any other value given subsequent to the date of the sequestration, it is illegal and incompetent in him to demand more than the amount of the composition, which would, in law, be to claim an undue preference; and as no other value can be stated or proved, the present charge ought to be suspended.

The charger denied that he had used any undue means to obtain the bills from the suspenders, and averred his belief, that in granting them, the suspenders "were actuated partly by a sincere desire, at the time, to prevent the charger from suffering loss in transactions in which he had derived little or no profit, and partly from the expectation that, by acting in the manner they did, the charger would be induced to continue to supply them with hay upon credit; in this expectation they were not altogether disappointed; the charger subsequently sold and delivered hay to Joseph Grimshaw upon credit, to the extent of about £25, more than one-half of which remains unpaid."

The charger pleaded—1. There was a moral obligation on the Messrs Grimshaw, notwithstanding their discharge, to pay their debts in full if they had it in their power. Such an obligation has been recognised in law. Sutherland v. Mackay, 14th January 1830, S. and D., Vol. VIII. p. 313; Roy v. Scoular, 18th June 1831, S. and D., Vol. IX. p. 766. 2. At all events, it is always competent to a party to make an irrevocable donation. 3. If the Messrs Grimshaw had meant to challenge their agreement to pay the charger's debt in full, it was incumbent on them to have suspended the charge on the promissory-note for £71. 12s., instead of granting renewed promissory-notes, with additional security in respect of one of them. 4. The charger is not in the position he would have been if the Messrs Grimshaw had not agreed to pay his debt in full. In consequence, he refrained from exacting the composition on his debt, while Joseph Grimshaw is again sequestered. 5. If one party to a bill or promissory-note is legally bound in payment, his co-obligants are also bound, although such co-obligants may not have received any value for interposing their security. 6. There is no statement in the note of suspension which can sanction the passing of it without caution or consignation.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"19th May 1842.—The Lord Ordinary, in respect it is admitted by the suspenders, (article 6,) that they granted a bill to the charger for the full amount of his original debt, after their discharge, and subsequently granted the bills in question, refuses the note: Finds no expenses due."

The suspenders reclaimed. At advising,

Lord President.—Had the suspenders alleged that they had in any way been concussed into the granting of these bills, investigation must have been allowed. But there is no allegation to this effect, and there is no appearance of any improper influence having been used. We must refuse the note.

Lord Gillies.—I am of the same opinion. In consequence of the discharge in the sequestration, the obligation to pay the original bill was extinguished; but the suspenders voluntarily agreed to pay it, from no deception or concussion having been used, but merely, as averred by the charger, in hope of future benefit. There are instances of bankrupts, who have obtained their discharge, coming forward at a future period and paying the whole amount of their debt. Suppose, in any such instance, the bankrupt, instead of paying money over the table, were to grant bills for the amount—could he, when these bills fell due, plead his discharge as exempting him from liability to pay?

Lord Mackenzie.—There is no doubt that, under the Statute, these bankrupts were discharged from all the debts contracted before sequestration, and that the only claim which any debtor could have enforced against them was for the amount of the composition, and nothing more. Now, had it been averred here that the suspenders had been concussed, or even that they had acted in error—that they had mistaken the law, and thought that, notwithstanding of the discharge, they were still liable to be sued for the debt, and offered to prove this,—the case would perhaps have been different. But the suspenders won't aver this. They don't say they acted unwittingly; while there is an averment by the charger which gives by no means an improbable account of their motives. I think we must refuse the note.

Lord Fullerton absent.

The Court refused the note.

No. 202.—CHRISTOPHER WOOD, Pursuer, v. ROBERT ANSTRUTHER and JAMES RENTON, Defenders.

Obligation—Contract—Condition—Life-Policy—In security of a loan, the debtor conveyed to the lender certain policies of insurance on his life, and under an obligation to advance the necessary premiums to the lender, who became bound to keep up the policies during the debtor's life, and to pay the premiums as they fell due. The debtor became bankrupt; and having fallen into arrear of the premiums, and being unable to implement the agreement, the lender brought an action to be freed of the obligation of continuing to pay the premiums to his own loss, and to have it found that he was entitled to sell the policies, and to apply the price in extinction of the premiums in arrear, and towards payment of the principal, and also to have it found that the arrangement was at an end.—The Court decerned in terms of the libel.

The defender, Mr Anstruther, borrowed from the pursuer the sum of £10,000, and for this sum he granted his personal bond on 17th March 1835. By another bond of the same date, narrating the previous one, Anstruther conveyed to the pursuer certain policies of insurance which had been effected on his life, for the better securing to the pursuer the sum lent by him on the first bond, and in order that they might be kept up and made effectual, he became bound to pay annually to the pursuer the sums or premiums annually due on the policies, amounting in the aggregate to £285. 5. 5, besides any sums that should become exigible as extra premiums. Wood was taken bound, on his part, to pay the premiums, and to keep up the insurances during Anstruther's life, and so soon as the sums assured, or any part, became payable, to apply the same towards the extinction of the loan. As an additional security, the bond conveyed to Wood the lands of Caiplie and Thirdpart; but as these were entailed, the deed contained the usual proviso, that the conveyance should not be held to infer contravention, and that any adjudication or legal diligence should only attach the rents, mails and duties, for no other than Mr Anstruther's lifetime.

The summons set forth,

"That the pursuer advanced the foresaid principal sum of £10,000 Sterling, and accepted of the foresaid policies of insurance in part security thereof, entirely in reliance on the faith of the said Robert Anstruther regularly and punctually making payment to him of the yearly premiums due upon the same, in terms of the obligation to that effect contained in the bond and disposition in security before cited: That instead, however, of implementing the same to any extent, the said defender has grossly violated the said obligation, not merely by not paying any of the said premiums, or yearly sums due upon the said policies of insurance, but has also, in consequence of his conduct, compelled the pursuer to pay heavy extra premiums on the foresaid policies, so as to keep them in force and prevent them from being forfeited: That amongst other acts of misconduct on his part, in reference to the said policies, and in direct violation of the obligation undertaken by him, the said Robert Anstruther, while he ceased, at the term of Candlemas 1837, to make payment of any interest to the pursuer on the foresaid loan, thought fit to leave this country for America, having solicited and obtained an appointment to serve in Canada during the rebellion in that province, and this without giving the least intimation to the pursuer or to the insurance offices of his intention so to do: That in consequence of the defender's violation of his obligation, and of his failure to pay the interest on the foresaid principal sum of £10,000, and the foresaid premiums of insurance, there is altogether now due to the pursuer, in name of arrears of interest and premiums, no less a sum than about £4000, exclusive of the principal sum itself, and a large sum in name of expenses: That while this is the case, a great variety of adjudications and other diligence have been led and used at the instance of creditors of the said Robert Anstruther, and his life-rent of the heritable subjects conveyed to the pursuer, also in part security of his debt, is in course of being sold, under a process of ranking and sale presently in dependence."

It then subsumed,

"That, in such circumstances, and while the said Robert Anstruther is bankrupt, and unable to implement his obligations, the pursuer is not bound to continue the payment of the said yearly premiums upon the foresaid policies of insurance, but is entitled to discontinue the payment of the same, and to sell and dispose of the whole of the foresaid policies, and all benefits comprehended under the same, together with the relative obligations undertaken by the said Robert Anstruther for payment of the annual premiums of insurance and others, contained in the foresaid bond and disposition in security, and that either by public roup or private bargain, in ordinary form, and to apply the prices that may be obtained for the same in extinction pro tanto of the premiums already advanced, or that may be yet advanced or paid by him on behalf of the said Robert Anstruther, or otherwise, to account of the large sum of debt due to him, as aforesaid : That while entitled to absolute relief and indemnification under the foresaid bonds, and while, as already said, the whole principal sum of £10,000 Sterling, with the legal interest thereof since Candlemas 1837, is still resting-owing and unpaid, the pursuer is not bound to increase or augment his own loss and liabilities, by continuing the farther payment of the said premiums of insurance for the ultimate benefit and behoof of his bankrupt debtor, but, on the contrary, is entitled, as he judges it expedient, to have the whole of the foresaid certificates or policies of insurance, with the existing or accruing benefits thereby embraced, sold and disposed of, and the prices or proceeds to be realised from the sale applied for the purpose and in manner before mentioned."

The conclusions were framed so as to meet the objects contained in the subsumption. There was likewise the following conclusion :

" And farther, it ought and should be found and declared, by decree foresaid, that the obligation on the pursuer, contained in the foresaid bond and disposition in security, to apply the sums assured by the foresaid policies, on the same becoming payable by the death of the said Robert Anstruther, in satisfaction or extinction of the sums, principal and interest, due by him under the foresaid bond, and to pay and account to him, the said Robert Anstruther, or his foresaids, for whatever balance then remaining in the hands of the pursuer, after satisfying and paying the principal sum of £10,000 and others, thereby obliged for, is, from and after the sale or sales to be effected, as aforesaid, void, extinguished, and of no force or effect, and that the said Robert Anstruther has lost and forfeited all right and interest in such obligation, as well as in all benefits or advantages that may arise, by or through the said certificates or policies of insurance, to the party or parties purchasing the same as aforesaid, and that in all time coming."

Against this action Anstruther's trustee, acting under a trust for behoof of creditors, pleaded—That the policies in question were only constituted an operative security to the pursuer, in the event of the defender's death, and could not be realised or disposed of during the defender's lifetime : That the pursuer was not entitled to sell the policies in question without an express power of sale being contained in the deed constituting the security ; but no such power was granted. And further, it was maintained that the proposed sale of the policies was at direct variance with the terms, meaning, and spirit of the contract between the parties, and so could not be authorised or sanctioned by the Court.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor :

" 19th March 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the process, repels the defences, and declares and decerns in terms of the conclusions of the libel, with this explanation, that the sale must be by public auction, and on articles and previous advertisements prepared by the clerk, to whom a remit for this purpose is hereby made: Finds the defender liable in expenses ; appoints an account thereof to be given in, and, when lodged, remits to the auditor to tax and to report.

" Note.—This is not a question under the contract at all. The defender has broken the contract and cannot insist on its strict fulfilment. In the situation to which his breach has brought matters, there is no fair or practicable course except to sell."

Renton reclaimed, but the Court adhered.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 203.—SIR ALEXANDER RAMSAY, Pursuer, v. The PRINCIPAL and PROFESSORS of the UNITED COLLEGE of ST ANDREWS, Defenders.

Mortification—Bursaries—Prescription.—A contract between a patron of bursaries, and the university where they were to be enjoyed, agreeing to create a new bursary for every £20 additional obtained from the mortified lands, reduced, after subsisting above forty years, on the ground of its being a violation of the original deed of mortification, which limited the number of bursaries to three.

By deed, of date 4th June 1681, Master John Ramsay, minister of the gospel at Markinch, for the glory of God, and increase of piety and virtue, mortified his lands of Dunifae "for the education and entertainment of three youths at school and college for the space of years," viz., "one year at the humanity school in St Leonard's College at St Andrews, thereafter four years in the study of philosophy in the said college, and thereafter other four years at the divinity in the said town of St Andrews, making in whole nine years' education." Sir Charles Ramsay of Balmain, and Sir Andrew Ramsay of Abbotshall, "they and their heirs of these said heritages," were appointed "undoubted patrons of the said mortification, with full power to present either per vices, or if they can agree betwixt themselves, to present three youths to the benefit, and for the space foresaid, of the surnames in order following, viz., first, Ramsay ; secondly, Durham ; thirdly, Carnegie ; fourthly, Lindsay." Failing either of the patrons, the other was to succeed to the full patronage ; and failing both, and their heirs of their heritages of the name of Ramsay, the Archbishop of St Andrews was to "have the absolute power of patronage to present for the space and benefit for the education at schools above express ; he always observing the surnames foresaid, and in the method and order above express." It was also provided, that "when these three youths shall have followed their study of philosophy in St Leonard's College four years, and their inclination thereafter leadeth rather to the study either of physick or the law than to the study of divinity—each of them shall have his benefit of the last four years,—he closely following his inclination foresaid in the study of physick or law." It was further provided, that "if any of them go abroad for the study of physick or law," they were not to leave Scotland without license from the Archbishop of St Andrews. "For the better and more sure effectuating" of the mortification, full power was given to the Principal and Masters of the College to set tacks and draw the rents of the mortified lands,—the Archbishop of St Andrews being requested "to take particular inspection from year to year, to the end the foresaid mortification may be yearly forthcoming, and faithfully employed for the use foresaid." It was further "expressly provided, that what shall be over and above the entertainment of the foresaid youths, and payment of their regents, it shall be bestowed entirely upon the said youths in three proportions, for buying of books and other necessaries." From 1710, when the deed of mortification took effect, to 1780, not more than three bursars were on the fund at one time ; but in 1784, when the value of the lands mortified had considerably increased, the Principal and Professors of the United College, and Sir Alexander Ramsay Irvine of Balmain, who had succeeded to the sole patronage, entered into a contract, which, after briefly narrating the deed of mortification, proceeds as follows :

" And whereas, from the conception of the above deed of mortification, it is evident that the mortifier restricted the number of bursars to three, in respect of the small revenue arising from the fund ; but as there is now a prospect of a considerable rise in the rents of the mortified lands under the administration of the college, the patron and administrators are on this account desirous to follow out the pious intentions of the mortifier, both by making the provision for each bursar adequate to the purpose intended, and by rendering the fund more extensively useful, by increasing the number of bursars.—Therefore they hereby agree and declare, that as soon as the fund will admit of it, the provisions for each bursar shall be increased from £15 or thereabouts to £20 Sterling yearly, and that as many new bursars shall be added, with the like provision, as the fund will bear ; the surplus, if any be, not amounting to the sum of £20 Sterling, or a provision for an additional bursar, after the public burdens and other necessary expenses are defrayed, to be equally divided among the bursars ; and the said principal and masters bind and oblige them, and their successors in office, to give the said patron, and his heirs and successors, three months' intimation previous to the erection of every additional bursary, so as he may be thereby enabled to present, in terms of the mortification and of this present contract of agreement."

On the execution of this contract, the number of bursars was increased to five. In 1818, it was increased to six ; in 1832, to twelve ; and in 1840, supposing a bursar for every £20, the number admissible was thirteen.

Sir Alexander Ramsay, the present patron of the bursaries, considering that the contract of 1784 was an illegal violation of the original deed of mortification, raised a summons of reduction and declarator, in which, calling the Principal and Professors of the United College as defenders, he concluded to have it found and declared, " that the defenders are bound to apply the funds of the said mortification, in terms of the deed of mortification, to the entertainment at college of three youths of the surnames favoured by the founder, to be recommended for trial, and presented by the pursuer and his successors, as patron of the said bursaries, and admitted to the same by the defenders as often as one-third of the revenues of the mortified fund shall be set free and disencumbered of the bursars now or afterwards incumbent on the said fund, in the order and manner provided by the deed of mortification, as nearly as the same can be observed in all respects."

Pleaded by the pursuer—1. The expressed will of the founder of a mortification is, by the law of Scotland, the rule for the administration and application of the funds of the same. 2. No right to administer or apply the funds of a mortification in a manner contrary to, or at variance with, the expressed will of the founder, can be acquired by the administrators of the same by usage or by prescription. 3. A party having by the will of the founder a title to insist that the administration and application of the funds of a mortification shall be according to the terms of the deed of foundation, cannot be deprived of that title by the negative prescription, or by acquiescence in a contrary course of administration and application of the funds. 4. The provisions of the alleged contract of 1784, sought to be reduced in this action, and the practice which has followed upon it, in so far as these are complained of by the pursuer, are contrary to the will of the founder of the Ramsay bursaries, as expressed in the deed of foundation, and the said contract ought therefore to be reduced, and the administration of the fund ought to be restored, in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

Pleaded by the defenders—1. The agreement of 1784 cannot be reduced, inasmuch as it was not inconsistent with the spirit of the original deed of mortification, but was only a wise and beneficial adaptation of the original regulations to the improved state of the mortified fund, and consequently it was not ultra vires of the parties by whom it was executed. 2. The contract of agreement having been entered into by the then patron and Principal and Professors of the United College, to whom the execution of the founder's will was intrusted, and having subsisted and been acted on without challenge or interruption for upwards of forty years, all right of challenge is cut off by the negative prescription. 3. As that agreement was entered into by a predecessor of the pursuer, whom the pursuer represents, and as the pursuer himself has taken benefit by that contract, by availing himself of the more extended patronage thereby conferred on him, he is barred from insisting in the present action of reduction.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor :

" 15th February 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the process, repels the defences ; reduces, declares, and decerns, in terms of the conclusions of the libel, and finds no expenses due.

" Note.—The contract of 1784 is a clear violation of the deed of foundation, and in its most essential provisions.

" That deed mortified an estate for the education and entertainment at St Andrews of three youths, each for nine years. There is no provision made in the deed for more than three. On the contrary, anticipating the possibility of there being a surplus after maintaining and educating these in the way he describes, the founder declares that this surplus shall be ' bestowed entirely upon the said youths in three portions.' It is added, that this is to be 'for buying of books and other necessaries,' which shows the style in which he meant them to be kept up. He alludes to the chance of their going abroad 'for the study of physic or law,' another indication of the same kind.

" But the contract provides that there shall be one bursar on the fund for every £20, which has already increased the number to thirteen. There are now thirteen, each getting £20, whereas, by the foundation, there ought only to be three, each receiving about £86.

" If it were necessary for the Lord Ordinary to make up his mind on the problem, whether a greater number of small bursaries, or a small number of great ones were best, he would be very clear in favour of the latter. But this speculation is not for a court, and therefore he does not enter at all into the expediency or in expediency of what the foundation ordained, or of what the contract has done. If it be necessary or useful to interfere with the founder's will, Parliament may do it. The duty of a court consists in enforcing the will, wherever it is clear.

" What can be a stronger example of this than the case of the Managers of the Perth Hospital, 20th May 1795 (Bell's Folio Cases, p. 173), where rents being mortified for the maintenance of four hospital paupers, the Court refused to interfere, though the rents rose so that each pauper received £40 yearly. Some obiter dicta were thrown out about the possible occurrence of cases in which the Court might interfere. But in that actual case, far exceeding any thing that has arisen here, the Court refused to interfere.

" If there has been a violation of the will, the defence is, that the pursuer, who is the patron, is barred by acquiescence from now objecting, and that the violation is sanctioned by prescription. This defence makes the case important; for if it be well founded, the managers of all mortifications may pervert them for ever, provided they can succeed in doing so for forty years. The Lord Ordinary cannot bring himself to think that the doctrine either of prescription or of acquiescence, or even of positive and personal ratification, can apply to such a case. These doctrines may affect parties managing their own interests, but they do not apply to trustees, the responsible managers of a private charity, instituted for public purposes, who can claim no right to violate their duty in time to come, by having violated it in time past.

"But the pursuer having himself adopted the contract since 1811, cannot blame the defenders for adhering to it; and therefore, is scarcely entitled to his expenses in now impeaching the system he has been so long acting under."

The defender reclaimed. At advising,

Lord President.—I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. We have nothing to do with policy and expediency in interpreting deeds of mortification. The question is, has any thing happened to prevent the deed, as framed by the granter, from being carried into execution? I do not think that we could listen to the plea, that by any arrangement between the patron and the professors, the provisions of the deed could be superseded. If so, they might apply the funds to purposes altogether apart from the object of the grant. No length of time can give effect to such an arrangement. I am willing to give all credit to the parties who entered into it. In most universities, there are many bursaries of limited amount, and these parties seem to have thought it advisable to increase the number of the Ramsay bursaries, at the same time diminishing their amount. But that will not do. The deed is free from the slightest ambiguity. Three persons are to be educated for nine years in divinity, law or medicine; and if they wish to go abroad to prosecute their studies, they are to be allowed to do so with a certain consent, still enjoying the bursary. Now, to lay down the proposition that £80 a-year is too large a sum to carry out the course of education here contemplated, is entirely beyond my comprehension. Indeed, looking to the date of the deed, and the sum then afforded by the subjects mortified, I am not sure, considering the difference in the value of money, and the mode of living, that it was much less than that now afforded. But at any rate, we have nothing to do with any thing but the will of the donor. He says that three individuals are to get the means of education, and if there be any surplus of the proceeds of the provisions, that is to be laid out in the purchase of books or other necessities, in three proportions. There is nothing in the deed which warrants us in holding that the provision to each of the three has grown to be excessive. There is nothing in the circumstances which have occurred that calls on us to sustain the total departure which has been made from the directions of the deed;—the subdivision of the grant into portions so miserably small, that it is impossible that any one of the bursars can be educated as the granter contemplated.

Lord Gillies.—I entirely concur. If, instead of £86, the funds had afforded double the amount to each of the bursars, I don't know that we could have interfered.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am entirely of the same opinion. This is a case without difficulty. Cases are supposable which might be more doubtful. If a property in the neighbourhood of a large town, left for the maintenance of a few paupers, were, by the town happening to extend over it, to increase a hundred fold in value, it might be difficult to say that the patrons would be bound to divide the feu-duties among a few persons who were thus to be translated from pauperism to opulence. But no such thing has occurred here;—on the contrary, we cannot be sure that the increase of value which has taken place is greater than the founder contemplated. Land has generally been rising in yearly value in Scotland; and why should we assume that a granter of land for a permanent purpose did not contemplate a rise as great as has taken place? Nor has the rise been such as to make the amount payable to each bursar extravagantly large. Indeed, it is impossible to say whether, in proportion to the ideas now entertained of comfortable life, it has increased at all. Is £80 too much, at the present time, to educate a youth for one of the liberal professions, with the discretion of going abroad, and also so as to leave a surplus for the purchase of books? Even at home, education as a lawyer, and the purchase of a competent law library, would exhaust the sum; and still more would a medical education, and competent medical library, do so. The founder evidently intended that the education should be a liberal one; and I do not see any thing will happen anywise absurd, or different from what he probably intended, in the payment of £80 to each of the bursars. I believe, if we could summon up his ghost, that he would have no dissatisfaction with this result of his grant. As to the right and title of the patron to pursue this action, I have no doubt. I dare say the arrangement with the professors was a fair one; and the patron was a party to it. But it was erroneous; and when the error was found out, there could be nothing to hinder any of the parties from getting it corrected. The only shadow of doubt arose from the plea of prescription, to which some regard appeared to be paid in the case of George Heriot's Hospital. But that case was very different from the present; and here I see no room for prescription, either positive or negative. Indeed the professors do not seem now to plead prescription as vesting any right in them for their own personal advantage; and if so, it is hard to see for whose interest it could be pleaded.

Lord Fullerton.—The only point to which we can listen is, whether this arrangement be within the fair meaning of the deed of the founder. We can pay no regard to the lapse of time. That is of great importance in matters raising questions of patrimonial right on one side, and of obligation on the other. But there is here no such question. The defenders found no right on the arrangement of 1784. No interest could arise under that arrangement, except that which of course they disclaim, viz., the greater amount of fees in consequence of the increase of bursars. If the agreement, then, be clearly inconsistent with the deed of the founder, it can derive no support from the lapse of time. It is impossible to hold that any lapse of time can sanction and secure the continuance of a violation of duty by the administrators of a trust. I do not think that any support was given to the doctrine of prescription as applicable to such a question in the case of Heriot's Hospital. There a regulation in regard to the age of the entrants had lasted for more than a hundred years, but that circumstance was utterly disregarded by the majority of the Judges, who held the regulation to be unwarranted by the deed of foundation; and although some others took a different view, our opinion proceeded not on the lapse of time, but the ground that the regulation was within the powers conferred by the founder. The contract here rests entirely upon the statement with which it commences, that it would be agreeable to the conception of the grant to increase the number of bursars. Looking at the grant as it stands, I see nothing of that in it. And I entirely concur with the rest of the Court, that the number of bursars must be limited to three. Even though an extreme case of increase of the value of property left for a similar purpose were to occur, I do not think it would be within the province of the Court to interfere. The remedy would be an application to Parliament, and not here.

The Court adhered.

Lord Ordinary, Cockburn.—Act. Rutherford, Cook; J. H. Burnett, W.S., Agent.—Alt. Solicitor-General (M'Neill), Anderson; W. and J. Cook, W.S., Agents.—[H.B.]

9th June 1842.

FIRST DIVISION.—(H. B.)

No. 204.—JOHN ANDERSON, Pursuer, v. The GOVERNOR AND COMPANY of the BANK of SCOTLAND, Defenders.

Property—Disposition—Heritable Creditor—Records.—A father, in feft in the plenum dominium of certain lands, executed a disposition and settlement, by which he conveyed, subject to revocation, the dominium utile to his eldest son, and the superiority to his second son. Some years after he disposed the lands, as they stood in himself, to the eldest son, recalling the previous conveyance to the second son, without mentioning that in favour of the eldest son, but declaring that the disposition settlement should be effectual in so far as not revoked or altered. The eldest son having predeceased his father without issue, after granting an heritable security over the lands—Held, in a competition between the heritable creditor and the second son claiming as his father's heir, that the security extended over the plenum dominium of the lands—the eldest son's right extending to it, and not being limited to the superiority.

By Crown-charter, dated 20th December 1793, and instrument of sasine thereon, recorded 24th January 1794, Robert Anderson stood infeft in the lands of Milliganton, described as,

"Totas et integras duas mercat terras de Milliganton mercat terram vocat Kilncroft Corson's croft et Crossflat cum domibus edificii hortis pomariis silvis piscariis partibus pendiculis et pertinentiis ejusdem tam bene non nominat quam nominat et decimis rectoriis et vicariis earundem jacen infra parochium et baronium de Holywood et vicecomitatum de Dumfries."

This title was burdened with two feu-rights,—one of them including "the just and equal half of the lands of Milliganton," and the other "Kilncroft, Corson's Croft and Crossflat." On 30th December 1805, Robert Anderson executed a disposition and settlement, by which he disposed to his eldest son, James Anderson, under certain burdens, and with an express power of revocation, inter alia,

"All and whole my half of the lands of Milliganton," described in the titles as the two-merk land of Milliganton, "with the houses, biggings, yards, orchards, woods, fishings, parts, pendicles and pertinents of the same, lying within the parish and barony of Holywood, and shire of Dumfries; together with all right, title, and interest which I, my predecessors or authors, heirs or successors, had, have, or any ways may have, or can claim or pretend to the same in all time coming."

Of the same date, Robert Anderson executed another disposition (said to be for the purpose of bestowing a freehold qualification) in favour of the pursuer, John Anderson, his second son, of

"All and hail the two-merk land of Milliganton, the merk-land called Kilncroft, Corson's Croft, and Crossflat, with houses, biggings, yards, orchards, woods, fishings, parts, pendicles, and pertinents thereof, lying within the parish and barony of Holywood, and sheriffdom of Dumfries, with the teinds thereof, great and small, parsonage and vicarage, but excepting always from this disposition the property or dominium utile of the said lands of Milliganton, disposed by me on the date hereof to James Anderson, my eldest son, and also the property or dominium utile of the other half of the lands of Milliganton, and said lands of Kilncroft, Corson's Croft, and Crossflat, belonging to Edward and William Elton, conform to their titles thereof," &c.

This disposition also contained a power of revocation. In 1809, Robert Anderson executed another disposition, which, after narrating

"that by a disposition and settlement, bearing date the 30th day of December 1805, I disposed the two-merk land of Milliganton, and the merk-land called Kilncroft, Corson's Croft, and Crossflat, with the pertinents hereafter mentioned, in favour of John Anderson, my second son, but excepting from the said disposition the property or dominium utile of the lands of Milliganton belonging to me, which I, by another disposition and settlement of the same date, disposed to James Anderson, my eldest son, and by the said disposition and settlement, I reserved full power to myself to alter, revoke, and annul the same at pleasure," proceeds as follows: "And now seeing, that for certain good causes and considerations, I have resolved to revoke the said disposition and settlement in favour of my said son, John Anderson, in so far as regards the said lands, therefore wit ye me to have revoked and recalled, as I hereby revoke and recall the

"said disposition in favour of my said son, John Anderson, in so far as regards the said lands and others hereafter disposed."

"And to have given, granted, and disposed from me, my heirs and successors, to and in favour of James Anderson, my eldest son, his heirs and assignees whatsoever, all and whole the two merk-land of Milliganton, the merk-land called Kilncroft, Corson's Croft, and Crossflat, with houses, buildings, yards, orchards, woods, fishings, parts, pendicles, and pertinents of the same, as well not named as named, with the teinds, parsonage and vicarage, of the same, lying within the parish and barony of Holywood and sheriffdom of Dumfries, together with all right, title and interest, claim of right, property, and possession, which I, my predecessors and authors, heirs and successors, have had, or can any ways claim or pretend thereto, in time coming."

The deed farther contains the following clause:

"Declaring always, that my settlements above mentioned in favour of my said sons, John and James Anderson, with the whole conditions and provisions therein contained, shall stand good and effectual, except in so far as the same are altered and revoked by this present deed, or may be altered by any deed to be executed by me hereafter during my life, conform to the powers reserved by me in the said settlements."

James Anderson expedite a Crown-charter of resignation on this disposition, which authorised two modes of holding, and was infeft in March 1810. In 1820, Robert Anderson executed another disposition and settlement recalling the deeds of 1805, and conveying to James Anderson his half of the lands of Milliganton, described in terms similar to those used in the deeds.

In 1827, James Anderson having become indebted to the Bank of Scotland in £10,000, executed in their favour a disposition in security of, inter alia, the lands of Milliganton, as described in the Crown-charter expedite in favour of Robert Anderson in 1793. On this disposition, which contained a precept of sasine a me vel de me, infeftment was duly taken. James Anderson having predeceased his father, a competition arose between John Anderson, the second son, and the Bank of Scotland,—the former maintaining that the disposition of 1809, in favour of James Anderson, conveyed merely the superiority of the lands contained in it, and that consequently the disposition in security, obtained from him by the bank, could not extend to the dominium utile. He accordingly Pleaded—1. Under the disposition of 1809, granted by the late Robert Anderson in favour of James Anderson, on which infeftment was taken by him, nothing was conveyed, or meant to be conveyed to James, except the same subjects which had previously been conveyed to the pursuer by the settlement of 1805, which it revoked, viz., the superiority of the lands of Milliganton, Kilncroft, Corson's Croft, and Crossflat. The deed of 1809 describes the settlement of 1805 in favour of the pursuer, as excepting the dominium utile of the lands of Milliganton, which the granter had by another disposition of even date, conveyed to James Anderson, and instead of revoking it, confirms that previous disposition of the dominium utile of Milliganton in favour of James Anderson. 2. If it be competent to refer to any evidence extrinsic of the deeds referred to in the record, the limitation of the conveyance in the deed of 1809 to the superiority of the lands of Milliganton is farther proved—(1.) By the terms of the claim given in by Robert Anderson for enrolment, in which the conveyance to James Anderson is expressly described as a conveyance of the superiority: (2.) By the fact that Robert Anderson, as proprietor of the dominium utile of those lands, continued in possession, and drew the rents as before the execution of that deed, and that James Anderson never had any intromission with the rents, or possession of these lands: (3.) By the fact, that Robert Anderson disposed the property of these lands to his son James by a mortis causa deed in 1820, expressly on the footing that they had not previously been conveyed to him by the deed of 1809. 3. No right to the property of the half of the lands of Milliganton ever vested in James Anderson, inasmuch as the mortis causa conveyance by Robert Anderson in 1820, by which the property of these lands was intended to be conveyed to him, never took effect, he having predeceased his father. 4. On the assumption that no right to the dominium utile of Milliganton vested in James Anderson, the pursuer cannot be affected by any representations made by James Anderson to the bank, or any belief on the part of the bank that he was the proprietor of these lands. 5. But further, looking to the plain meaning of the deed of 1809, the bank cannot plead that they viewed it as a conveyance to James Anderson of the dominium utile of the lands in question, or as conveying anything beyond the superiority of these lands.

Pleaded by the Bank—1. By the progress of titles referred to in the statement for the defenders, James Anderson was validly vested in the plenum dominium of the lands of Milliganton as the absolute unlimited fiar thereof. 2. Seeing James Anderson so validly vested in the property and superiority of the aforesaid lands, and transacting with him on the faith of the public records, the defenders, for an onerous consideration, obtained from the said James Anderson a valid and effectual conveyance to these lands by the disposition which he executed in their favour on 8th June 1827. 3. It is incompetent, the more especially in a question with onerous third parties transacting on the faith of the public registers, to refer to any evidence extrinsic of the feudal title completed by James Anderson in order to control or limit the express terms of that title. 4. The conveyance by James Anderson in favour of the defenders of the plenum dominium of the lands of Milliganton is a valid and effectual conveyance against the pursuer and all others, and cannot in anywise be affected by any latent deeds or declarations on the part of his father or others.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

“10th February 1842.—The Lord Ordinary having considered the separate record made up of consent as to the heritable security granted by James Anderson to the Bank of Scotland over the lands of Milliganton, together with the title-deeds produced, revised cases, and other productions on this branch of the cause, Finds, that at the date of the security in question, the late James Anderson, who granted the same both from the terms of the conveyance and infestment obtained from his father in 1809, and from the titles of his author on record, assigned to him, stood feudally and irredeemably vested in the superiority of the whole lands of Milliganton, and in one-half of the dominium utile thereof: Finds that the defenders, as onerous and heritable creditors transacting with the said James Anderson, were not put in mala fide, nor in any respect precluded, on any legal or equitable ground, by the terms of James Anderson's titles, from taking a security from him as the true owner of the said portion of the dominium utile of Milliganton: Therefore, repels the claim and pleas urged on this branch of the process for the pursuer; sustains the pleas of the Bank of Scotland, and appoints the cause to be enrolled, that the parties may state in what manner they wish these findings to be applied in the accounting: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses, as the same may be taxed by the auditor, and decerns.

“Note.—As this is a question which depends upon a short progress of titles, and as the parties have stated their views upon these in revised cases of great perspicuity and accuracy, it will suffice now to state very briefly the grounds on which the pleas maintained by the defenders at present appear to be insuperable.

“In the first place, there can be no doubt that Robert Anderson, the father, was feudally vested in the whole superiority of Milliganton, and in one-half of the property thereof under his Crown-charter of 1793, and infestment following thereon.

“In the next place, it does not seem to be disputed that, in the conveyance by Robert Anderson to his son James of these lands of Milliganton in 1809, he used the very same descriptive terms, whereby both superiority and property were previously vested in himself by his own charter of 1793. The Lord Ordinary begs to refer to the full and perspicuous analysis of the title given in the narrative of the revised case for the bank, which is sufficient of itself to demonstrate the clear and unassailable nature of the right to the property in dispute, latterly vested in James Anderson.

“In the ordinary case, then, there cannot be a doubt that the whole subjects, and right thereto vested in the disponent, would be held to have passed to the disponent; and this is almost admitted in terms by the pursuer. But his claim is rested on certain pleas alleged to arise under clauses on the face of the principal conveyance by Robert Anderson to James in 1809, which it is said were sufficient to put the bank on their guard, and to indicate that James only got right to the superiority of Milliganton under that disposition, and of course that the security of the bank must be limited to that right. It is humbly thought, however, that the pursuer's construction of this title, and the pleas raised thereon, are in every view untenable. Thus,—

“1st, The main plea of the pursuer is, that there were clauses or references in the disposition of 1809, which clearly showed that Robert Anderson only meant to convey, and only did convey to his son James by that deed, the superiority of the half of Milliganton, and no part of the property. For it is said that that disposition contains a recital that the granter had, by prior deeds in 1805, conveyed the superiority of the said half of Milliganton to John Anderson, his second son, and the dominium utile by another deed to James Anderson, his eldest son, both subject to his own power of revocation and alteration; and as he expressly declared in the conveyance of 1809, that he meant to recel the disposition of the superiority in favour of James Anderson, but to confirm the deeds of 1805 in all other respects, it is contended that Robert, by his disposition of 1809 to James, only conveyed the superiority to him, leaving his right to the property to stand on the revocable settlement of 1805, which was neither feudalized nor delivered at the date of the bank's security.

“But this plea appears to be altogether unsupported by any just or safe view which can be taken of the legal import of the deed on which it is founded. It is true that the disposition of 1809 recites that the granter had conveyed one-half of the property of Milliganton to James Anderson by a revocable deed in 1805; but that created no inference that he would not be disposed to give his eldest son a further right in 1809 to the superiority and property of the same estate by an irrevocable deed. In every case of the kind, the intention of the granter must be collected from the terms of the last deed that he granted; and the disposition of 1809 seems to be framed in terms which absolutely exclude the construction or inferences drawn by the pursuer as to the limited nature of the right given by old Anderson to his son James, now under consideration. In that disposition the lands were described in the most comprehensive terms, and the whole parts and pertinents, as appears in the records to belong to Robert Anderson, were given over to James; in particular, there was not only no exception of any prior revocable feu-right granted to the disponent, but the conveyance of 1809 specially contained procuratory and precept; and the right given to the disponent was to him and his forefathers heritably and irredeemably. It humbly appears to the Lord Ordinary that it would be contrary to every principle of sound and safe construction, to hold such a feudal title as of a limited nature, on the ingenious but strained inferences raised up by the pursuer in the present case.

"2d, The pursuer, however, founds strenuously on the clause in the conveyance of 1809, whereby the granter declared that his settlements above mentioned, executed in 1805 'in favour of my said sons, John and James Anderson, with the whole conditions and provisions therein contained, shall stand good and effectual, except in so far as the same are altered and revoked by this present deed, or may be altered by any deed to be executed by me hereafter during my life.' And it is argued, that Robert Anderson, by this clause, preserved entire the revocable feu-right granted to James Anderson (though never feudalized) in 1805. But this is a begging of the whole question at issue. The granter only declared the deed of 1805 subsisting, in so far as 'not altered or revoked by the present deed;' but surely he altered and recalled the feu-right in the most decisive and effectual manner in 1809, when he gave a new conveyance, in terms which included both the superiority and property of Milliganton, to his son James and his heirs, heritably and irredeemably.

"It is impossible not to hold that this was, quoad that property, a complete alteration of the settlement of 1805. Nevertheless, the reservation quoted by the defender was a clause of material efficacy, although the pursuer's interpretation of it be rejected. As the settlement of 1805 by Robert Anderson on James contained various other properties besides Milliganton; and the effect of the reservation was to preserve the former deed as to these, good and effectual, 'excepting so far as altered or revoked.'

"While these views of the title now appear clear, with all the light we possess, from production of the whole deeds referred to, including the undelivered settlements of 1805, it is a circumstance not without its weight, that the defenders, as onerous creditors of James Anderson in 1827, had not that advantage. They apparently treated with Anderson on his feudal title alone, as he had not then the settlement of 1805 to exhibit. And, therefore, the plea of the pursuer comes to this, that the defenders, as creditors and singular successors of Anderson, were bound to recur to every document, even generally referred to in the title of their debtor. But it is apprehended that the right vested in proprietors, under an unlimited feudal title in our law, cannot be controlled by other deeds only mentioned by reference in the narrative of the title. It is unnecessary, however, in the present instance, to enter into any discussion on this point, as the Lord Ordinary is of opinion, that even if a skillful conveyancer had actually got a perusal of the settlements of 1805, when the title of James Anderson, obtained in 1809, was exhibited to him, he certainly would have come to the conclusion that this title gave James Anderson an undeniable right to the dominium utile in dispute.

"It is stated by the pursuer, as a strong circumstance to show that Robert Anderson did not intend to give his son James any interest in the property in question, that the old man continued to draw the rents and annual profits of the whole subjects conveyed by the disposition of 1809 for years after that date. It is apprehended, however, that this state of the fact, even if proved, could not affect the right of onerous parties trusting to the disponee's title on record, when an heritable security was granted at a subsequent period. There is no allegation that the bank knew that James Anderson did not get possession immediately after his infeftment. And the fact that he was in possession long prior to the date of the heritable security under challenge, hardly seems to be disputed."

The pursuer reclaimed. At advising,

Lord Gillies.—I think the interlocutor is right.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. The bank hold an heritable security as onerous creditors, and are entitled to maintain it against the granter and all representing him. Here John Anderson, the survivor of his elder brother and father, claims the lands over which the security was given, on the ground that his brother's right in them extended only to the superiority. I cannot admit this. The conveyance has every characteristic of a conveyance of the dominium plenum, and not of superiority merely. The subject conveyed is not the superiority but the lands. There is no exception of the dominium utile. Two modes of holding are authorised, and there is an assignation to the rents after Martinmas, with an obligation of relief thereafter, and with a farther obligation of relief from burdens, which all fall on the property and not on the superiority. But it is said that, ex facie, one-half of the property was reserved, because the granter, who had previously executed two revocable dispositions,—one of the dominium utile, and the other of the superiority,—expressly revoked the latter, but not the former. It is plain that the words used were fit to revoke the grant of the property to John Anderson; for they do so expressly; but as to James Anderson they were not fit to revoke any thing. As to him they do not revoke, but supersede the previous grant, and add to it,—expressly conveying the lands to him,—"together with all right, title and interest, claim of right, property and possession, as well petitory as possessory, which I, my predecessors and authors, heirs and successors, have had, or can any way claim or pretend thereto in time coming." Here he conveys not only the superiority, but all right of every kind which he had or might acquire as to the subjects. The mention of the lands in the subsequent settlement of 1820, does not prove that the plenum dominium had not been conveyed by the deed of 1809. It is unnecessary to say any thing of the pursuer's other pleas, which are sufficiently adverted to by the Lord Ordinary. The disposition on which James Anderson was seised, implying a conveyance both of the property and superiority, and there being nothing on the face of the records to prove the contrary, the security is good to the bank. It is said that the bank stands in the shoes of James Anderson. This is not correct. The father, after granting the conveyance, might have been able to prove by James's oath that he was bound to reconvey; but he could not have done so after the lands had been conveyed away to onerous creditors, who are entitled to look only at the records.

Lord Fullerton.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The question is, if the security of the heritable creditor is limited to the superiority? This question must be decided, first, by the terms of the security, and the right existing in the party granting it; and, second, by the state of the records. On both points, I have no doubt that the claim of the bank is well founded. It is admitted that, ex facie, the deed of 1809 conveyed to James Anderson all the right existing in Robert Anderson. It is also admitted that nothing to the contrary appears on the records. In these circumstances, how can we limit the right of the bank? As to the presumptive evidence of the conveyance, I agree entirely with Lord Mackenzie. I see nothing from which it can be fairly inferred that there was an intention to limit the grant to the superiority. The granter revokes what he had disposed to the second son. This was necessary in order to give the eldest son the whole; and he does accordingly give him the whole, in the precise terms in which it stood in himself. The heritable security extends over the whole property thus conveyed; and as there is nothing to the contrary in the records, I have no doubt that the title of the bank is good.

Lord President.—From the time I first read the papers in this case, I have been of the same opinion. The whole property was conveyed to James as it stood in the father in 1793, and he conveyed the whole in security to the bank. In these circumstances, there can be no doubt that the security carries both the dominium utile and the superiority. We are told, indeed, of certain extrinsic family arrangements which are said to prove that the superiority only was conveyed. Nothing of this appears on the records; and it would be dangerous to hold that an heritable security in favour of creditors could be affected by such pleas as the pursuer's.

The Court adhered, with expenses.

SECOND DIVISION.—(G. D. F.)

No. 205.—SAMUEL BEVERIDGE, Advocator, v. WILLIAM MOFFAT and ALEXANDER BRASH, Respondents.

Superior and Vassal—Agreement—Joint and Several Obligation—Intromission—Liability—A prime superior feued out certain subjects to A, who subfeued part of them to X and Y; Y subfeued his out to C; C never completed any title to his feu, but possessed under the personal obligation derived from Y. A, the mid-superior, to whom the several subfeuars had regularly paid their feu-duties, fell into several years' arrear of feu-duty to the prime superior, and he having threatened eviction therefor of all the subfeus, X paid the amount, and brought an action of relief against C for a proportion of the arrears corresponding to his feu-duty—Held that X was entitled to demand relief from C of a proportion corresponding to the amount of his feu-duty.

Mrs Gavin and husband feued out certain subjects at Darling's Brae and Yardheads, Leith, to Alexander Grant, builder there, at a feu-duty of £120, and the latter subfeued them to different individuals, in a variety of lots, for certain annual feu-duties, which, in the aggregate, amounted to the precise sum he had to pay to his own superiors, the Gavins.

One of these lots Grant subfeued to James Nichol, messenger in Leith, at a feu-duty of £37, and he afterwards conveyed it away in two portions—one of which was disposed in feu to the defender in 1825 for a price of £550. By the feu-disposition the defender was taken bound to relieve Nichol of the feu-duties applicable to the subjects disposed to him, as well as of the public and parish burdens, and likewise to pay to him a yearly feu-duty of £15, which was stated to be the proportion effeiring to the subjects (conveyed to the defender), of the cumulo feu-duty payable by Nichol to Grant.

The defender entered to possession, but was never infeft under Nichol's feu-disposition, nor did he enter with Grant as superior, but he possessed under the personal right derived from Nichol, and paid the feu-duty to Grant up to Martinmas 1827.

Prior to Martinmas 1827, the feu-duties due by Grant to the Gavins, the prime superiors, had fallen into very considerable arrear, and at the time of his sequestration, in November 1829, they amounted to £740, exclusive of interest.

As stated by the pursuers, it appeared that the subfeuars had taken alarm at this situation of matters, and the probability of eviction at the instance of the prime superior, and that, in order to prevent this result, they, or part of them, had a meeting, at which they resolved to pay up the arrears to the Gavins and obtain relief, by allocating the same among the several subfeuars in sums proportioned to the feu-duties respectively payable by them for their several feus. It did not appear that the defender attended this meeting, but he was subsequently made aware of its nature, and of the resolution of the subfeuars; and it also appeared that several states of accounts had been handed to him, containing particulars of the arrears due by Grant, and of the outstanding feu-duties, and of the way and manner in which it was proposed to allocate the sum of arrears among the several subfeuars. It did not appear that the defender protested against, or opposed this arrangement, or that he had directly approved of the proceeding, but he had signified by letter his belief that the state of arrears was correct, for any thing he knew.

The trustee in Grant's sequestration exposed the mid-superiority of the subjects held by him to public sale at a sum of £30, and it was bought by the pursuers at the upset price. The pursuers, who were two of Grant's subfeuars to the largest extent, stated in regard to this purchase, that the mid-superiority was valueless in a pecuniary point of view, as the feu-duties payable under it were just equal to those exigible by the prime superior. But they were desirous to acquire it, to prevent any future loss accruing by the bankruptcy of another interjected mid-superior. In the conveyance of the mid-superiority, which was granted by the trustee and commissioners, with the concurrence of Grant himself, in favour of the pursuers, and which excepted all the feu-rights which had been entered into by Grant, there was the following stipulation:

"And farther, in regard the feu-duty of the said subjects is greatly in arrear, and it being expressly in the articles of roup that the same should be sold under the burden thereof, therefore the said William Moffat and Alexander Brash bind and oblige them and their foresaids to free and relieve the said James Macdowall, as trustee foresaid, and the said sequestrated estate of Alexander Grant, of the payment of all feu-duties now due or to become due in all time coming; and farther, of and from all cess, ministers' stipend, and other public burdens whatsoever, now due or to become due for the said subjects hereby disposed in all time coming; without prejudice to the said William Moffat and Alexander Brash exercising any right of ranking which may be competent to them upon the sequestrated estate of the said Alexander Grant, but reserving all objections, if any, which may be competent against such claim."

The pursuers brought this action in the Sheriff-Court of Edinburgh, alleging that the prime superior had called upon them for payment of the whole arrears of feu-duty, amounting with interest to £894, due by Grant, and threatened to evict the feus in case of non-compliance, and that they were accordingly obliged to pay up the same, to save eviction. It did not appear, by any evidence in process, that they had paid up the whole arrear, but only a part of it, when the summons was raised. The summons then set forth,

"That the feu-duty payable by the defender, under the feu-contract or other conveyance of his subjects by the said Alexander Grant, to his authors or to himself, is £15 per annum, and as the cumulo feu-duty payable to the said Alexander Grant by the whole feuars was £120, the defender was consequently bound to pay or to relieve the pursuers of the sum of £111. 17s. 2d., being the proportion of the foresaid arrear of feu-duties corresponding to the extent of feu-duty payable by him as aforesaid: That the defender is still resting-owing a balance of his proportion of the foresaid arrear, amounting to £71. 6s. 5d., including interest to the 15th of May last, conform to the state or account marked No. 2, herewith produced, referred to, and held as repeated brevitatis causa."

It then proceeded, that in virtue of their purchase of the mid-superiority, the pursuers were in titulo to receive the feu-duties due by the defender from and after Martinmas 1830, and they accordingly concluded, 1st, for payment and relief of the sum of £71. 6s., with interest, as the defender's proportion of the aggregate arrears alleged to have been paid by them to the prime superior; and, 2d, for payment to them, as mid superiors, of the feu-duties due by the defender since Martinmas 1830, the date of their entry under the conveyance from Grant's trustee.

The defender pleaded—

That the action was untenable, both as to the claim for arrears and for the feu-duties. In regard to the arrears he argued, that the pursuers had no right to insist for them, so far as his feu was concerned, because the pursuers were in no better situation than Grant was, who could have had no title to sue; for, as the defender never made up a title under Grant as superior, or any title at all, he merely stood on the personal right to the subjects, which flowed, not from Grant but from Nichol. Grant he never recognised in any way in the title, and he had no concern with, and was no party to, the defender's subfeu from Nichol. Accordingly, Grant had no right or title of any sort to insist in any demand whatever against him on account of any matter whatsoever connected with the subfeus by Nichol. But if Grant had no such right, neither had the pursuers, who plainly came into Grant's shoes, and had no other character but as his assignees. They transacted with his trustee; and the latter, in consideration of their paying off the arrears, and of the price of the mid-superiority, assigned them into Grant's rights and interests, and no further. The disposition to them showed this most conclusively; and that they were to relieve the subfeuars. Accordingly, on this ground, the pursuers had no title to insist in this action; and then, as Grant had received the feu-duties, he himself could not now make the present demand: so neither could the pursuers, who were assigned into his room. Again, the prime superior was claiming nothing. He was no party to the right in virtue of which the defender held the subjects, neither was he any party to the action: nor did he, nor could he, in any way make any claim against the defender for the arrears. Had the pursuers paid at once to Gavin, and obtained an assignation of the superior's rights, the matter would have been different. But that was not the case; and therefore, as neither the prime superior nor the pursuers had any title or interest to make any demand against the defender, the action was incompetent, in any view of the case. Besides, no evidence had been produced of Gavin having been paid the arrears. Then, again, as to the feu-duties contained in the second conclusion,—in the first place, the pursuers had not settled with the prime superior for them; and therefore, even supposing the defender was liable, he was not in tuto to pay. But the defender denied the pursuers' right to claim them at all, on the same ground as that urged in regard to the other claim, viz., that as the defender held under his personal right with Nichol, and no title was made up by him with Grant as superior, the purchase of the mid-superiority invested the pursuers with no right to claim the feu-duties from him, the defender. No doubt, so long as he possessed the subjects conveyed to him by Nichol, he was bound, as the condition of doing so, to pay the yearly stipulated feu-duty of £15, but that was all that could possibly be demanded from him under any personal engagement which he could be held to have undertaken. Nichol, with whom alone he contracted, might insist upon being relieved by the defender of his cumulo feu-duty of £37, to the extent of the £15 yearly; but in the circumstances of the case, it was perfectly clear that neither Grant, nor any person in his right, nor even Gavin, could make any direct personal claim against the defender for the feu-duties. Gavin or Grant, or those in his right, might attach the property for the payment of the feu-duty; and such was the great depreciation of property in Leith, that the defender did not object to their doing so. But he did not admit that he had incurred any personal liability for the payment of the feu-duty. No doubt, while he should keep possession of the property, he fell to pay the feu-duty; but if he relinquished the property, which he was willing to do, he would then be free from all further claim for the feu-duty. He had already paid the feu-duty up to Martinmas 1831, as appeared from the documents produced; and if the pursuers would take the property on account of the arrears which were due, and the feu-duty to become due, which was all the benefit they could derive by a forfeiture ob non solutum canonem, the defender stated his willingness to convey to them the subjects in question: Macvicar v. Cochrane, 14th July 1748, and Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Horsburgh, 16th May 1834.

The pursuers answered—

That all that was required of them was to have paid or satisfied the prime superior as to the arrears. They had done so by paying the arrears, or the greater part of them, to the prime superior, and had received, or, what was the same thing, the defenders had received, a letter from the prime superior stating that he was in safety to pay. Accordingly, the claim they made against the defender was a claim urged by them as correi debendi against the defender, as a correus, to pay up the quota of a larger sum due, singuli in solidum, by one and all, and which quota they had already paid for him, for the purpose of preventing a tinsel of their several feus, which all had a manifest interest to prevent. It was in no other way they insisted in the action, so far as the arrears were concerned; and as the defender knew of, and had never objected to the arrangement, which was for mutual behoof, there was no ground for his present argument. The transaction with Grant's trustee, to which the defender was no party, and on which, therefore, he had no title to found, was explained to be an arrangement solely to free the sequestrated estate, but by no means to relieve the subfeuars of Grant's arrears, which was never meant or contemplated. As to the feu-duties contained in the second conclusion, it was admitted they were not paid to Gavin. That, it was alleged, arose from the defender having himself refused to pay to them as mid-superiors. But they were willing that the defender should settle with the prime superior if he liked. At the same time, having purchased the mid-superiority, they maintained they were in titulo to demand it.

A separate argument was raised by the pursuers, to the effect, from the letters and other documentary evidence in process, that the defender was bound to pay according to the arrangement of the subfeuars. But as the same evidence was founded on by the defender as instructing the reverse, and that he always objected to pay any thing but his own feu-duty, it seems unnecessary to go into it. Different views appear also to have been taken of it by the Lord Ordinary and by the Court.

After considerable procedure, the Sheriff-substitute found,

"that in November 1830 the arrears of feu-duties due by Grant to Gavin, his immediate superior, amounted to £783, with £111. 12. 2. of interest, amounting in toto to the sum of £894. 17s. 4d., for which the lands subfeued by Grant, or possessed under titles originally derived from him, including those belonging to the pursuers and defender respectively, were liable to be evicted by Gavin as superior thereof: Finds that the defender, as one of the correi debendi along with the pursuers for that sum, is liable, in a question with the pursuers, for one-eighth part of the said arrears and interest, being the proportion corresponding to the amount of the feu-duty payable by him: And finds, that in that proportion, the defender is bound and liable to relieve and repeat to the pursuers one-eighth part of whatever sums were paid by them, or either of them, to account of the said sum of £894. 17. 4., before the summons in the action was executed, but under deduction of such sum as the defender may have paid to account of said sums and interest—Appoints the pursuer within ten days to lodge a state of the arrears and interest paid by him, framed according to these principles; reserving to the pursuer his right of action for such farther payments as he may have made since this action was raised, and to the defender his defences as accords: Farther, and in reference to the second conclusion of the action, Finds the defender liable to the pursuers in the sum of £90. 8. 9., being the amount of the feu-duties payable by him from Martinmas 1830, with interest till Whitsunday 1836, conform to state No. 3 of process, and finds the defender also liable in interest at the rate of five per cent., from Whitsunday 1836 till the date of this interlocutor, on the principal sum of feu-duties due at the former of these dates, and from the date of this interlocutor till payment, on the said sum of £98. 8. 9.: Repels the defences, and recalls the interlocutor of 6th July 1838, so far as inconsistent with these findings: Reserves in the meantime all questions of expenses, and decerns accordingly. (Signed) "JA. MACDONALD."

"Note.—It is unnecessary to repeat the circumstances of this somewhat involved case, which are correctly detailed in the last interlocutor on the merits, in the principles of which the Sheriff generally concurs, except in so far as it held that the pursuers had not libelled a sufficient title to insist in the first conclusion of the summons, in which the Sheriff cannot agree. He is of opinion that the defence principally urged against that conclusion is utterly unfounded. The pursuers' title to insist for payment of the arrears, is distinct and separate from their title to insist for payment of the defender's feu-duties, since the pursuers acquired right to the mid-superiority, and it seems perfectly clear that neither the rights and securities of Gavin, nor the liabilities and obligations of the sub-vassals, either to him or inter se, can or would be affected by that purchase, in the circumstances in which it was made. The obligation of the pursuers to relieve Grant's estate of Gavin's claim, was a condition of the sale, but the arrears of feu-duties formed no part of the price, and notwithstanding that obligation, all the possessors of the sub-feus were equally liable to the superior, and they as much entitled to their relief inter se as if that obligation had not been a condition of the sale of the mid-superiority. It was intended to relieve Grant's sequestrated estate of Gavin's claim, but without prejudice to the pursuers ranking on it for the amount of the arrears. It is difficult to imagine how this limited obligation can be construed into an obligation to relieve the sub-vassals of their legal obligation to the superior, or of their mutual claims of relief inter se. The Sheriff is also of opinion that the pursuers' argument respecting the defender's liability for interest on his feu-duties, is well-founded. It is proved by Nichol's sasine, from whom the defender acquired his property, that the liability for interest was a condition of his feudal right; and, according to the principles of the feudal law, when he disposed to the defender to hold of his superior (Grant), he was only entitled to make this substitution under the burdens and conditions of his own right. The Sheriff regrets he was unable to dispose of this case finally, without ordering a new state applicable to the principles stated in the interlocutor, but it appears unavoidable."

Thereafter,

"Edinburgh, 7th October 1840.—The Sheriff having resumed consideration of the cause, along with the state of arrears of feu-duty, No. 47 of process, and having heard parties' procurators thereon—Approves of the second method of stating the arrears and interest in said state, and in terms thereof, finds the defender liable to the pursuers in the sum of £57. 9. 4. Sterling, as the proportion of the arrears and feu-duties due by him under the first conclusion of the summons. And in reference to the second conclusion of the summons, of new finds the defender liable to the pursuers in the sum of £90. 8. 9., being the amount of the feu-duties payable by him from Martinmas 1830, with interest till Whitsunday 1836, conform to state No. 3 of process; and finds the defender also liable in interest at the rate of five per cent. from Whitsunday 1836 till the date of this interlocutor, on the principal sum of feu-duties due at the former of these dates, and from the date of this interlocutor till payment on the said sum of £90. 8. 9. And decerns against the defender for payment of said sums accordingly: Finds the defender liable in expenses; allows an account to be lodged for taxation, and decerns." (Signed) "GRAHAM SPEIRS."

On an advocacy, the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"14th December 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard counsel in this advocacy, and thereafter considered the record in the Inferior Court, and whole process—In respect, Imo, that it is clearly established by the letters and documents produced, that the advocator, Mr Beveridge, one of the subfeuars of the property libelled on, specially undertook and agreed, several years before the commencement of this action, to pay his proportion of the arrears due by the mid-superior at his bankruptcy to the prime superior, so as to save his property from forfeiture at the instance of the latter: 2do, That the pursuer, on the faith of that agreement, purchased the mid-superiority, and paid the whole arrears to the over-superior, whereby all proceedings at the instance of the latter against the subfeuars were superseded and stopped: 3tio, That it farther appears that the defender, in acknowledgment and fulfilment pro tanto of the agreement, actually made various payments to account of the said arrears, though he latterly refused to pay the balance due by him, and thereby rendered it necessary for the pursuer to raise the present action—approves of the Sheriff's interlocutors, in so far as he has decerned against the advocator for the sums specified in the interlocutors complained of, with expenses; and therefore repels the reasons of advocacy, and remits the cause to the Sheriff simpliciter, and decerns: Finds the respondent entitled to his expenses, as the same may be taxed by the auditor, and decerns.

"Note.—This is a case which appears at first to be complicated, and it has swelled to great bulk from voluminous proceedings and productions; but truly it is very simple in itself.

"The late Mr Gavin of Leith feued a property in the vicinity of the town to one Alexander Grant for a principal feu-duty of £120. Grant subfeued it to different persons for building—the subfeu-duty amounting to £120, the precise sum of the principal feu-duty.

"One of the subfeus was made to Mr Beveridge, who purchased a house from one Nichol (another subfeuar) for £550 in 1826. The portion of feu-duty laid on the advocator's lot was £15 Sterling per annum. Other subfeuars had still more valuable buildings on their portions of the ground.

"Grant became bankrupt in 1829, owing a large arrear of feu-duties (nearly £800) to the prime superior, Mr Gavin. It is obvious that all the subfeuars were interested in paying off the arrear, as their subfeus, and all the houses thereon, could have been attached by the prime superior for his payment. It seems, therefore, to have been arranged that the pursuers, Moffat and Brash, should buy Grant's mid-superiority, and pay up the arrears of the prime feu-duty to the over-superior, on the understanding that the same should be repaid by the subfeuars in proportion to the amount of their subfeu-duties, whereby their properties would be saved from forfeiture. This accordingly Moffat and Brash did in 1830. They then paid the arrears to the over-superior, and they now claim from the advocator his share of the arrears so paid up; which, after a long litigation, the Sheriff has decerned for, and the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that his judgment is well founded.

"He rests his opinion on this plain proposition, that when the prime superior's claim against the subfeuars and their properties emerged in 1829 on the bankruptcy of Grant, it was clearly their interest to save their properties from forfeiture. The prime superior could undoubtedly have instituted an action of irritancy, ob non solutum canonem, against all the subfeuars, without regard to their settlement with the mid-superior; and Moffat and Grant, as assignees of Gavin, could have taken a similar step. But the defender superseded such a process by specially agreeing to pay his proportion of the arrears. The fact of the advocator coming under such an arrangement is proved beyond all doubt by the most explicit letters under his hand.—See, in particular, the advocator Mr Beveridge's letters of 19th March 1832 and 2d May 1834. These letters appear to be decisive of the defender's liability. The chief pleas maintained by the advocator were these:—

"1st, He stated that the pursuers had, by the articles of roup under which they made the purchase of this mid-superiority, undertaken Grant's obligation, and became bound to pay all the arrears of feu-duty to the prime superior, in the same way that Grant himself would have been bound to relieve them, and therefore that the pursuers could not now claim any share of the arrears from the defender. But that was not the meaning of the obligation referred to in the articles of roup, as the Sheriff has very clearly demonstrated in the note annexed to his interlocutor of 24th July 1840. The obligation on the purchasers to pay arrears, contained in the articles of roup, did not form part of the price, but was made a condition of the sale in order to relieve the sequestrated estate, while the purchasers and subfeuars were to have all the remedies and rights of relief inter se for their several proportions, which the over-superior could have enforced; so that the pursuers acquired the mid-superiority for the common behoof of themselves and the other subfeuars; and it would have been utter folly in them to have purchased them with any other view. The defender's own letters in 1832 and 1834 afford the clearest evidence that he viewed the purchasers' acquisition of the mid-superiority, and their settlement with the over-superior in that light.

"2d, The defender alleged that the pursuers made the purchase on the most improper and disadvantageous terms for him, as they had renounced all right to rank on Grant's estate for the arrears which formed a debt due by that party on his failure. But this plea seems to be founded on a mistake of the fact. The right of the purchasers or subfeuars to rank for the arrears exacted from them on Grant's account, is expressly reserved in the conveyance by the trustee to the pursuers, in these words: 'without prejudice to the said William Moffat and Alexander Brash exercising any right of ranking which may be competent to them on the estate of the said Alexander Grant, but reserving all objections, if any, which may be competent against such claim.' See also receipt, No. 60 of process, subscribed by the defender, showing that he at one time applied for the composition on that very feu-duty. It does not very clearly appear from the states whether it was recovered or not.

"3d, The advocator alleged that he had offered, in his defences, to surrender his whole subfeued property to the pursuers; and as the prime superior himself could get no other remedy against any subfeuar, it was argued that this should have satisfied the pursuers' claim. It is to be observed, however, that these defences were not lodged till November 1836; and if the defender was bound by special agreement to pay his share of the arrears, by letters prior to 1836, he could not insist on the pursuers then taking houses in place of money for their debt. The defender's statement is, that property in Leith has been for some time gradually depreciating; and if this be the case, it affords just the stronger reason for holding that a party could not carry on a correspondence, and so act for the years between 1830 and 1836, by making payments and otherwise, as to lead a co-vassal to understand and believe that he was to pay his share of certain common burdens affecting his own and their properties, and then throw his property on their hands, when, perhaps, it had reached its lowest point of depreciation.

"At the same time, the defender's offer, when examined, seems to have been a proposition to give up his property to the pursuers, on condition that they should relieve him, not only from Grant's arrears, but from the whole of his own subfeuduties, past or future, which no vassal can refute or renounce so long as he is solvent, as laid down in the case of the Marquis of Abercorn v. Marnoch, Fac. Col., 26th June 1817. The pursuers, therefore, were not bound to accept of the defender's offer as made. At the debate, the defender evidently hesitated to surrender his feu, merely to be relieved of his share of Grant's arrears."

The sums contained in the second conclusion of the libel having been paid a long time previously, the only question in the advocacy was as to the arrears.

The defender reclaimed. At advising, the Court held, in opposition to the Lord Ordinary, that no concluded agreement of the nature alluded to by his Lordship appeared to have been entered into; that the actings of the parties themselves, as appearing from the evidence in process, were repugnant to that idea, and that, moreover, it was not libelled on in the summons. Their Lordships were of opinion that the defender was liable, as intronmitter with the fruits of the subject; and that as the pursuers, who, with the defender and the other subfeuars, were all liable singuli in solidum for the arrears, had paid the same, the defender was liable in relief to the extent claimed.

The Court accordingly recalled the findings of the Lord Ordinary as to the agreement referred to in the interlocutor reclaimed against, but adhered to that interlocutor, so far as it approved of the Sheriff's judgment decerning against the defender for the portion of the arrears efferring to his feu, and contained in the first conclusion of the summons.

Lord Ordinary, Cuninghame. — Act. Dean of Faculty

(Wood), J. S. More; Party Agent.—Alt. Solicitor-General (M'Neill), Buchanan; Wilson and Milne, Agents.—F. Clerk.—[G.D.F.]

10th June 1842.

No. 206.—MRS MARGARET ALLAN or HUTCHISON, Pursuer, v. JOHN HUTCHISON Senior, and OTHERS, Hutchison's Trustees, Defenders.

Husband and Wife—Antenuptial Contract—Jus Mariti—In an antenuptial contract in which the wife reserved right to the whole property coming to her from her father and mother, and the husband's jus mariti, &c., was excluded, as also the rights of his creditors—Held, on the terms of the deed, that the jus mariti was excluded as to the annual profits thereof; but question raised, whether the wife was bound to contribute, out of the profits accruing, stante matrimonio, to the current expenses of the family?

By antenuptial contract of marriage in March 1811, entered into between the pursuer and her husband, the deceased John Hutchison, and Richard Allan, her father, also deceased, the pursuer reserved to herself the right to dispoise, use, or alienate the whole property she might succeed to through the death of her father or mother, or otherwise, or through any deed executed by them, or either of them, or to which she might succeed during the subsistence of the marriage; and her husband thereby renounced all right thereto, or to any part thereof, and the same was declared to be unattachable by his debts or deeds, and not attachable by his creditors. The following is the clause in the marriage-contract:

"Declaring, however, that the said Miss Margaret Allan reserves to herself the right and liberty to dispoise, use, or alienate the whole property she may succeed to through the death of her father or mother, or otherwise, or through any deed executed by them, or either of them, or to which she may succeed during the subsistence of the said future marriage, and the said John Hutchison hereby renounces all right thereto, or to any part thereof, the same being hereby declared unattachable by his debts or deeds, nor attachable by his creditors,—the said succession being always subject to the destination and conditions contained in the deeds by which she may succeed to the said property, and which she shall have no power to alter."

During the subsistence of the marriage, the pursuer succeeded to certain property, both heritable and moveable, through the death of her father and mother, and also by the death of her sister Lydia. It was alleged that her husband, besides obtaining loans or advances from the pursuer's separate funds, also intronmitted with the property she had succeeded to, and the produce thereof, without her authority and against her wish, and applied the same to his own uses and purposes in various transactions and speculations in which he was engaged, and thereby increased his own estates.

Mr Hutchison died in 1837, and the pursuer brought this action (in 1839) against her husband's trustees, to obtain payment of his intronmissions with her funds, which, according to an account she produced, were alleged to amount to £1780. 12. 1. of principal, and £1364. 9. 5½. of interest.

Under the marriage-contract the pursuer was entitled to a jointure of £175 on the husband's death, and it appeared that he had granted certain letters to Mrs Hutchison, in which he acknowledged to have received from her sums amounting to £370, on which it was provided by the pursuer no interest was to be chargeable. The defenders tendered payment of that sum, but they denied that the truster was indebted in any further sum such as that now claimed. They admitted that Mr Hutchison had been in use to intromit with the revenue arising from his wife's separate estate; but they averred that the wife, on the other hand, had intromitted with, or received, funds from him, which they specified, and which fully compensated any claim for intromissions she had against her husband, and they averred, that whatever sums he had intromitted with had been applied, with her consent, to the current expenses of the family. It was also averred that she had received certain sums of money, stante matrimonio, amounting to £240, which she had concealed from her husband and applied to her own purposes; and besides, that she had given no account of various other sums on which they condescended.

Mrs Hutchison had lodged an account of the sums she claimed against her husband, as taken from her husband's books; but the trustees averred that the account was made up upon erroneous principles, and they stated, that upon a just accounting, the pursuer would be found indebted to her husband's estate, instead of the estate being due any thing to her.

The pursuer pleaded—That her husband having received advances from her out of, or having intromitted with, her separate property, and the same not having been gifted by the pursuer to her husband, or repaid or accounted for by him to her, his estate was liable for the sums so advanced or intromitted with; and the account thereof, libelled in the summons, being correctly stated both as to principal and interest, the pursuer was entitled to decree to the amount concluded for. At all events, she was entitled to decree for such sums as should, upon due inquiry, appear to be duly instructed to be justly resting-owing to her.

In defence it was pleaded—1. This action cannot be maintained; because, on a just accounting, it will be found that the pursuer, in place of having any claim against the defenders, stands indebted to the trust-estate of her deceased husband. 2. The claims of the pursuer, at least so far as not founded on written acknowledgments, are cut off by prescription. 3. According to the sound construction of the marriage-contract, and in consequence of the proceedings which followed under it, the late Mr Hutchison had a right to intromit with the interest or produce of his wife's separate estate; and, at all events, any intromissions which he may have had with her annual income, having been either accounted for by him, or appropriated to family purposes with her full knowledge and consent, cannot now be reared up as a debt against his estate. 4. As the pursuer succeeded to a separate estate during the subsistence of the marriage, she was bound to contribute a reasonable sum from her income to defray her own personal expenses, as well as those of the family. 5. In the present accounting, the pursuer is likewise bound to give credit for all sums acquired by her during the subsistence of the marriage, which fell under the jus mariti, and were retained by her, as well as for all her intromissions with the private funds of her husband, and all advances made by him on account of her separate estate.

The Lord Ordinary, of consent, remitted to an accountant to make up a state of accounts between the parties, and to report. The accountant reported ad interim, that from the state of information before him, he was unable to comply fully with the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, but he was of opinion that the pursuer had not as yet substantiated her claim. The following is the result of the views of the accountant:

"On the whole consideration of the circumstances, and evidence as yet adduced in this case, the accountant humbly reports to the Lord Ordinary,—

"1. That if the Lord Ordinary shall be of opinion that the contract of marriage, before quoted, only excludes the husband's jus mariti as regards principal sums to which the pursuer succeeded during the subsistence of the marriage, but that it does not exclude the interests of such sums after being uplifted, then there is nothing due to the pursuer.

"2. If the Lord Ordinary shall be of opinion that the jus mariti is excluded as to all interests, but that the wife was bound to contribute a fair sum towards the expenses of the establishment, say to the extent of £100 a-year, still there is nothing due to the pursuer.

"3. But should the Lord Ordinary be of opinion that the jus mariti is excluded, and that the wife is bound to contribute nothing towards the general expenditure of the establishment, but that he should be of opinion that the plea of prescription applies to bygone interests till within three years of the husband's death, even then, were a strict accounting gone into, and keeping in view that she consented to her husband retaining £370, chiefly without interest, till his death, little or nothing would be due.

"4. Should he hold that the plea of prescription does not apply, but that there is a good plea of bona fide percepti et consumpti, still then nothing is due.

"5. But should the Lord Ordinary be of opinion that none of these pleas will avail the defenders, then the accountant has humbly to report, that the pursuer has not produced as yet such a satisfactory account of her own concealed transactions, during the subsistence of the marriage, as to enable him to make up an account of a satisfactory nature betwixt the parties.

"6. Lastly, That it appears to the reporter that the pursuer has not proved that she succeeded, during the marriage, to sums exceeding "Not including the sums left in liferent by her father, and exclusive of gifts, £240.

"And that it is proved she was in possession, at her husband's death, of funds to the amount of	1010	0	0
"Leaving an excess in her hands of	£245	7	0
"Or holding that the gifts by her father and mother were excluded by the jus mariti , amounting to	240	0	0

"There would still leave an apparent surplus in her hands of

£5 7 0
 "And according to this view, she would have no claim even to the sums contained in her husband's written acknowledgments, in respect that she is shown to have been possessed of sums to an extent equal to, and beyond what she succeeded to, and which, of course, would extinguish these apparent loans."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"30th November 1841.—The Lord Ordinary having heard parties, and considered the process,—Finds, 1st, That the jus mariti of the pursuer's late husband was excluded, by their contract of marriage, as to any property to which she might succeed during the subsistence of the marriage, and that this exclusion extended to the annual profits of such property: 2^d, That in the circumstances, her husband had no right to require her to contribute, out of her separate estate, to the maintenance of the family, or of herself as a member of it, and that she is not liable to be debited with such contribution in this accounting: 3^d, That the jus mariti was not excluded quoad the £210, which the pursuer acquired during the subsistence of the marriage by donation;

quoad ultra, appoints the cause to be enrolled, in order that it may be settled how the remaining points are to be proceeded with; and reserves all questions of expenses.

Note.—As to the exclusion of the jus mariti, the Lord Ordinary proceeds entirely on the words and the apparent object of the deed. The wife 'reserves to herself the right and liberty to dispoise, use, and alienate the whole property she may succeed to,' &c.; and the husband 'renounces all right thereto, or to any part thereof,' &c. The Lord Ordinary thinks that these words entitle the wife not only to the exclusive right to the fee of the property, but to the exclusive use of its profits. If this construction be not applied, then, in so far as what she succeeded to was only a life rent, she could have no use of it whatever. The word 'use' gets no meaning according to the defenders' interpretation, for they make it synonymous with alienate. If any case could be produced which fixes, as a general rule, that the income of property, over which the jus mariti is excluded, belongs to the husband, effect would have been given to it here. But there is no such case. They are all special,—the speciality in each consisting of its own particular language and objects.

"2d, Whatever a wife may be compelled to do for the maintenance of herself or family, with her separate estate, where the husband be bankrupt, or destitute, the Lord Ordinary knows no principle or authority for saving a husband who is solvent from fulfilling his legal obligation to maintain his spouse, because she happens to be able to maintain herself. The deceased married under a contract of marriage, allowing the wife to keep her own, and yet he insists that she shall virtually give her own to him, in the form of keeping his wife.

"3d, The £240 was not got by succession, but by donation. The word succession may, in one sense, be said to be the same with acquisition, but not in the sense of this contract. 'The deeds' by which she may succeed' cannot apply to donations.

"The Lord Ordinary has decided nothing about the part of the second defence, which states that her funds were appropriated to family purposes 'with her full knowledge and consent,' because neither party has yet renounced farther probate as to this fact. This is one of the points, in reference to which he has directed the cause to be enrolled."

The trustees reclaimed, praying the Court

"to recal and alter the foresaid interlocutor, except in so far as it finds 'that the jus mariti was not excluded quoad the £240 which the pursuer acquired, during the subsistence of the marriage, by donation; to sustain the defences, and assoilzie the defenders from the whole conclusions of the action; or, at all events, to recal the first two findings in the interlocutor complained of, and remit to the accountant, with instructions to prepare a final report; or to do otherwise in the premises as to your Lordships shall seem just."

At advising, several of their Lordships appeared to consider that the finding of the Lord Ordinary, so far as it held that the profits of the wife's separate property should not be applied to family purposes, was premature, and that a presumption rather arose that these profits, arising stante matrimonio, where the husband was not taken bound to accumulate for the wife's separate estate, had been used, with the wife's consent, in the family; and that the onus, instead of being on the husband's representatives, lay on the wife to show that it was otherwise. Lord Moncreiff was understood to be of opinion that the interlocutor was right, and that the jus mariti was excluded, both as to principal sums and as to profits.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Adhere to the first finding in the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and to that extent refuse the prayer of the reclaiming note; recal the second finding, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to hear parties as to the rules and presumptions of law respecting those parts of the annual profits of the pursuer's separate estate, drawn by the husband during the subsistence of the marriage, and used and consumed in the maintenance of the family while the spouses lived together, and also to the relevancy and effect of any offer of proof which may be made by either party of their respective averments, with power to his Lordship to proceed farther in the determination of the cause as to his Lordship shall seem fit, reserving all questions of expenses."

SECOND DIVISION.—(G. D. F.)

* No. 207.—JOHN STIRLING and ARCHIBALD LORD DOUGLAS, Pursuers, v. ROBERT EWART, Defender.

Superior and Vassal—Casualties of Superiority—Entry of Heirs and Singular Successors—Relief—Composition—Succession—Entail—Construction—Charter of Resignation—A fee-simple proprietor entailed his estate on A, B, and C, neither of whom were heirs of line to the entailor, nor were they related by blood in any degree whatever to one another. A, the institute, made up titles, and received from the superior a charter of resignation, whereby the lands were conveyed to the same series of heirs, as specially set forth in the entail, and a clause was inserted in the charter, declaring that the granting thereof was not to exclude the superior and his successors from any claim they had at law to a full year's rent of the subjects, "whenever the heirs of entail to whom the succession shall open shall happen not to be the heir of line of the person who was last entered and infest." On his entry the institute paid a composition to the superior of a full year's rent as a singular successor. After his death, and also that of B, who had entered with the superior in the lands, the succession opened to C, who was not the heir of line of B, the vassal last infest—Held by a majority of the whole Court, that the superior was bound to enter C as an heir of the investiture, on payment of the ordinary casualty of relief exigible from an heir: The ground of decision apparently being, that the superior having received the composition of a full year's rent, on the change of investiture, from the first member of entail, he had thereby recognised the entail as the investiture, and was bound throughout to deal with, and give effect to the destination in it, as the rule of the investiture in regard to succession; and consequently to receive the whole series of substitute heirs, without distinction of one from another, as the line of succession opened to each in the express character, and as entitled to all the privileges and rights of heirs of the investiture.

The late Miss Grizel Ewart, who was a fee-simple proprietor, executed an entail of her lands of Allershaw on

"William Cosnar, my second cousin, residing at Middlegill, in the parish of Moffat, and the heirs-male lawfully to be procreated of his body, in fee; whom failing, to David Williamson, Esq., advocate" (afterwards Lord Balgray), "and the heirs-male lawfully to be procreated of his body; whom failing, to the heirs whomsoever to be lawfully procreated of his body; whom failing, to Robert Ewart, grandson of Dr Robert Ewart, physician in Jamaica, my brother, and the heirs-male lawfully to be procreated of the body of the said Robert Ewart, my grandnephew; whom failing, to any person or persons to be named and appointed in any nomination or other writing to be granted by me at any time of my life."

The tenendas and reddendo clauses were expressed as follows:

"To be holden, the lands and others above disposed, of me, my heirs and successors, immediate lawful superiors thereof, for the yearly payment of the sum of eighteen marks Scots money, at two terms in the year, Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions, in name of feu-farm, as a proportional part corresponding to the said lands of the sum of twenty merks, formerly in use to be paid for the said lands, and for the foresaid two-merk land of Whiteholm, and for the double of the said feu-farm duty the first year of the entry of each heir to the said lands, as use is of feu-farm, with this special provision, that the non-payment of the said feu-farm duty for the space of two, three, or more terms running into one, without payment being made, shall be no cause of reduction or nullity of the foresaid feu-farm grant allenary, but it shall be lawful for me, the said William Stirling, and my successors, to poind the readiest moveable goods upon the said lands for the said feu-farm duties, and failing these, to appreciate and adjudge the ground-right and property of the said lands to the amount of the said feu-farm duty and double thereof due for the time; and likewise the said William Ewart, and his foresaids, attending at all the courts to be held within the lordship or barony of Crawford-Douglas when required thereto, and these for all other burden, exaction, demand, or secular service whatever."

Cossar the institute, on the death of the entailor, made up a title to the lands by resigning on the procuratory, and he thereafter obtained a charter of resignation from the then superior, which conveyed the estate to Cossar and the series of heirs, as specially described in the procuratory and deed of entail. The precept of seisin, in the charter of resignation, contained the following clause:

"Saving always our own" (the superior's) "right, and the right of every other person as accords, and declaring that by granting these presents, we shall not exclude ourselves, or our heirs and successors, from any claim which we or they may have at law to a full year's rent of the lands herein contained, whenever the heirs of entail to whom the succession shall open shall happen not to be the heirs of line of the person who was last entered and infeft by us or our foresaids."

On his entry, Cossar, who was not heir of line to the entailor, paid a full year's rent of the estate, viz., £486, to the superior as a singular successor. The institute having died without leaving heirs-male, the estate fell to Lord Balgray, and his Lordship made up a title by infeftment on the open precept contained in the charter of resignation; and on his death, without issue, the succession opened to the defender, who was the eldest son of the Robert Ewart designed in the entail, and he was accordingly served heir of tailzie and provision to Lord Balgray, to whom, however, the defender was not related by blood in any degree whatsoever.

A question now arose as to the terms on which the defender was entitled to demand an entry with the superiors, the pursuers, who insisted in the present case for their respective interests of liferent and fee in the superiority. The latter maintained that the defender was bound to enter as a singular successor, and to pay a composition of a full year's rent; while the defender insisted that he was entitled to an entry as an heir, and was merely bound, in terms of the tenendas and reddendo in the charter, to pay a duplicand of the yearly feu-duty of 18 merks Scots. The present action of declarator of non-entry was therefore brought for the purpose of determining the question.

The pursuer argued—That at one time, according to practice in feu-holdings, no vassal could be forced upon a superior, if he was not the heir of the person in the investiture; and any other wishing to enter could only do so on the terms and conditions prescribed by the superior. Though this practice had been departed from, and modified by Statute to a certain extent, feu-holdings were still to be considered as of stricti juris interpretation, so that a feu could not be altered or affected by the act of the donee alone. By certain Statutes (1469, c. 36, 1669, c. 18, 1681, c. 17, 1690, c. 20,) it had come to be provided that superiors should receive creditors, and enter them as vassals; and the principle of feus had further been encroached on by the 20th Geo. II. c. 50, which provided, that any one holding a conveyance containing a procuratory of resignation, might force an entry by horning against a superior, but reserving to the superior right to payment of the relief due by heirs, and the payment of one year's full rent of the subjects, as composition by a stranger demanding an entry. The Statute 1685, c. 22, as to entails, did not directly limit the rights of superiors as to their casualties. The leading object of that Statute was to authorise clauses against alienation, without reference to the terms of entry with superiors; and as regarded them, it provided that nothing in that Act should prejudice superiors of the casualties arising out of the tailzied fee. Indirectly it limited the rights of superiors by compelling them to recognise a destination to perpetuity, which, as the old law stood, could not have been the case, without the united act of superior and vassal. Still, however, the superiors' rights of casualty were strictly reserved to them by the Statute. But a superior, though now bound to enter an heir of entail, was not told in what way it was to be done, for the Statute was silent as to the mode and terms of entry. The Statutes also, which compelled superiors to receive and enter creditors and other singular successors, were equally silent on this point; and accordingly, as neither the Act 1685, nor any previous Statute, interfered with rights of casualty, &c., competent to the superior, and existing at common law prior to such Statutes, they still remained; and these Acts were only passed for certain objects, which they attained without encroaching on the rights of superiors farther than was necessary to carry out their object, and in no way lessened the rights of casualty. According to strict principle, the sum payable by a singular successor, on obtaining an entry as an acknowledgment of vassalage, was held to be a casualty of superiority differing, as to its amount, from the sum payable by an heir as the relief for his entry. The one, as a stranger to the feu, paid a full year's rent of the subjects, while the heirs paid only a duplicand of the yearly feu-duty: Stair, II. 4. Bankton, II. 4. Ross's Lectures, 302. Ersk. II. 5. 1 Bell's Com. 24. Thus, an institute under an entail, who was not heir of line to the vassal last infeft, paid composition as a stranger to the feu, and it was impossible to maintain that a party in the situation of the defender, who was not heir of line to the last vassal, could be in any more favourable position: D. of Argyle v. Lord Dunmore, 19th November 1795; M. 15,068. Bell's Com. I. 25. In this case, however, there could be no doubt; for, besides what the pursuer now argued to be the correct principle, viz., that the defender, who was not heir of line to the vassal last infeft, should only be entitled to an entry on payment of a year's rent as a composition, the charter, which recognised the entail and destination, expressly provided that an heir in that situation should pay a full year's rent: Lockhart v. Denham, 10th July 1760; M. 15,047. M'Kenzie, 4th July 1777; M. 15,053, and 2 Hailes, 760. Hill v. Merchant Company, 17th January 1815, F. C. D. of Hamilton v. Baillie, 22d

November 1827. D. of Hamilton v. E. of Hopeton, 8th March 1839.

The defender argued—That it was of no consequence whether he was heir of line to the vassal last infeft or not; because, the superior having received payment of the composition of one year's rent from Cossar, the institute, and by granting the charter of resignation to the series of heirs in the entail, was bound to deal with the entail as the investiture, and the destination contained in it as the rule of the investiture throughout; and accordingly, that having received the heirs there mentioned as heirs, they were entitled to all the rights and privileges of heirs of investiture, whether related or not to one another; consequently, as the defender was one of those heirs of investiture, he was entitled to an entry on payment of the usual casualty of relief from an heir: Stair, II. 3, 12; II. 4, 6; and II. 4. 32. Ersk. II. 3. 18; II. 5. 47; II. 7. 5. The saving clause in the charter could not receive effect, for a clause of precisely a similar nature occurred in the case of Lockhart v. Denholm, M. 15,047, which the Court overruled; and the superior there, as in this case, had recognised the party as an heir by granting a charter recognising the entail. Neither was the party in that case heir of line to the vassal last infeft; and the ground of the judgment seemed also to be, that the claim of a year's rent was not exigible at common law by the superior; and accordingly, as that was not the case, and the entail itself, which was confirmed by the superior, did not warrant it, the superior had no right to insist for it after he had granted a charter of resignation according to its terms and conditions. Relief was the casualty proper to a renewal of the investiture already acknowledged by the superior. Composition was due where the entry was compulsory under the Statutes: Stair, II. 4, 32.

The Lord Ordinary appended the following note to his interlocutor making avizandum with the case to the Court:

"The Lord Ordinary reports this case as involving a question long agitated between superiors and heirs of entail, and which is now prepared for the consideration of the Court, on papers of great research and ingenuity.

"The pursuers are undoubtedly superiors of the estate of Allershaw. This estate belonged in property to Miss Ewart, who, in 1802, executed an entail, whereby she destined it under strict feters, first, to William Cossar and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to the late Lord Balgray and the heirs of his body; whom failing, to the defender, Robert Ewart, and his heirs-male.

"Miss Ewart died in 1811, and was first succeeded by Mr Cossar, who got a charter in 1813 from the superior; but as he was neither heir-male nor heir of law of Miss Ewart, Cossar paid a full year's rent for his entry. The charter was qualified with the reservation, inserted, it is believed, for upwards of half a century in the greater part of tailzied fees, that the superior, by the grant then made, should not be excluded from any claim 'which we or our forefathers may have at law to a full year's rent of the lands herein contained, whenever the heirs of entail to whom the succession shall open, shall happen not to be heirs of line of the person last entered and infeft by us and our forefathers.'

"Mr Cossar did not take infeftment on his charter, and having died in 1817, Lord Balgray was infeft on the precept still unexhausted in the first charter. On Lord Balgray's death, without issue, in 1837, the succession under the tailzie opened to the present defender. It is admitted that the defender is not an heir of line, nor in any way lawfully connected either with Lord Balgray, or even with the entailer Miss Ewart.

"In these circumstances, the tailzied fee having become vacant, and the succession having opened to a stranger heir and disponee, the question arises, whether the superiors are entitled to demand a casualty of a full year's rent from the defender? It is not a little remarkable that the present should be the first instance in which this question has been presented, free from any specialty, for the consideration of the Court, since the well-known case of Lockhart and Denham in 1760. Now that it has occurred, it is entitled, from its importance in practice, to the most deliberate consideration.

"On a deliberate consideration of the whole case, the Lord Ordinary must own that he finds it difficult to resist the argument of the defender, and the various authorities by which it is supported. That, indeed, appears to be founded chiefly on the view of the same question taken by Lord Corehouse, in a very learned note attached to his interlocutor in the case of the Duke of Hamilton against Baillie, reported in 1827 (6 Shaw, p. 94), though a specialty occurred in that case sufficient for the disposal of the superior's claim, his Lordship delivered his opinion on the abstract question as to the superior's claim in general, under a tailzied investiture, in terms which showed that he had very anxiously considered the point. The views briefly indicated in that valuable note, are elaborately enforced in the revised case for the defender, the fullness and length of which are amply atoned for by the able and satisfactory exposition of the argument and authorities that it contains. The Lord Ordinary shall now explain, as shortly as the nature of the question admits of, the grounds on which he has come to the conclusion that the defender's plea is well founded in law.

"It does not seem necessary in the present inquiry to enter into any disquisition on the original or early history of feus. Although the general tradition is probably correct, that feus were originally granted by military adventurers to their followers, at first for life only, and afterwards to their heirs-male, it is notorious that with us, feus have for many centuries been descendible to heirs whatsoever. Reg. Majest., B. II. sec. 25, &c. &c.

"When rights of property became thus fixed and inheritable, the superior was of course obliged to enter the heir of the investiture on payment of the ordinary relief duty. Hope, in his Minor Practicks (tit. 4, sec. 21), describes the course which was competent to the heirs of vassals to compel subject-superiors to give this entry. A retour was expedite, after which a precept issued from Chancery to compel the superior to enter the heir, and if he refused, the vassal was entitled to apply to the Crown for an entry.

"While these provisions, however, were early fallen upon for securing the descent of feus to the heirs of the vassal, the superiors had influence to preserve in force restraints on the alienation and transmission of land altogether prejudicial to the improvement and prosperity of the country. Although these limitations evidently arose from the original destination and purpose of feus, the reason for them ceased when these became hereditary in the families of vassals; but as their maintenance increased the casualties exigible by superiors, it is not extraordinary that they were continued in the earlier periods of our legislation, when the interests of commerce were of little importance and ill understood. But at length, in 1469, the Statute was passed allowing land to be comprised by creditors for debt, and obliging superiors to give an entry to the appraisers for payment of a year's rent. This (as explained in the Minor Practicks, tit. v. sec. 16,) indirectly enabled purchasers to change the old investiture and to complete their title, because they always had it in their power to comprise the lands for the price, and so to bring their case under the Statute. It is true that superiors had an option, by the Act 1469, to take back the feu on paying the whole debts of the vassal; but when the debts were large, or where the price was adequate, a superior had no object, and often was not able to exercise the option. In practice it does not appear ever to have formed any serious obstacle in the attachment and transmission of land, when appraisers were willing to account fairly to the superiors for the year's rent.

"When creditors or purchasers raised and obtained a comprising under this Statute, it is supposed that they could competently assign it to such persons, or their heirs and assignees, as they chose. No authority is to be found for holding that a new vassal appriser could not make the new investiture in favour of such persons as he chose. More especially, there appears to be no example of the superior being entitled to name the heir of an appriser, and no principle of law was in force in the fifteenth century, or after it, establishing that apprisers could be limited in the selection of their heirs, or forced to take a charter to heirs whatsoever instead of heirs-male, or to the latter instead of heirs of provision voluntarily selected by him. The contrary is strongly indicated by Stair, B. II. t. 3, sec. 43.

"It is true that the remedies and rights of creditors and purchasers apprising do not apply to the case of stranger heirs claiming under mortis causa settlements and tailzies of a deceased fiar. But it is probable that such settlements, without some arrangement and agreement with superiors, were not of very frequent occurrence for many years after 1469. It was only in 1540 that the practice of authenticating deeds by seal, without the subscription of the party, was abolished, which shows that skill in writing was not before very generally diffused; and though it certainly appears from Balfour's Practicks (finished about 1580), that tailzies or destinations of a certain description were known in his time, the inference deducible from what he says is, that superiors, in general and in practice, accepted of new heirs without any hard exaction—probably from the consideration that the casualties payable by a new set of heirs would be as lucrative to the superior as the casualties from the old series.

"But, as the country advanced, the Supreme Court assumed such powers as were necessary to give effect, as far as possible, to all rights of property. Hence the process of adjudication before this Court seems to have been introduced at an early period, by usage alone, without the authority of any Statute. Accordingly, the Statute 1621, cap. 7, refers to adjudications against heirs lying out for debt, as a proceeding then in common use in the Supreme Court; and it gives all co-creditors of the proprietor, as well as to the first adjudger, a right to redeem or require possession in the order of their adjudications. At the same time, this process before the Supreme Court was not limited, even at an early period, to adjudications for debt, but came to be sanctioned for the enforcement of irredeemable conveyances. The earliest example of such an adjudication seems to be the case of Johnston v. Carmichael in 1611, mentioned by Lord Stair, in treating of dispositions (B. III., t. 2, sec. 53), and various other cases occurred soon after, as appears from the Dictionary (p. 64, voce Adjudications), in which the Court gave decrees of adjudication in favour of parties holding absolute and irredeemable conveyances to lands. Accordingly, at the time that Sir George Mackenzie wrote his Institutions, he mentions adjudications as in general use before the Supreme Court, and especially refers to adjudication in implement for making dispositions effectual; and adds, that 'the Lords will adjudge the lands disposed to belong to the pursuer a remedium extraordinarium, there being no other remedy competent. This adjudication extends no farther than to the thing disposed, and hath no reversion.'—Institutions, B. II. t. 1, sec. 2.

"In that way, stranger disponees and heirs of provision had a compulsoir for obtaining infeftment from superiors, without being liable even for a year's rent, by giving them a charge to enter disponees on decrees of adjudication taken before this Court; and as the Act 1469 applied only to parties following the ancient course of apprising before the Sheriff, and not to adjudgers before this Court, the superiors for a long time had no authority for exacting a year's rent. This, however, was remedied by the Act 1669, c. 18, which declared, that superiors should be entitled to a year's rent for entry of all adjudgers as well as apprisers; and from that period, adjudication, both for debt and in implement, before the Court of Session, as well as creditors and purchasers apprising under the old form, were held liable for a year's rent and no more. This is clearly stated by Lord Stair as the rule, when his Institutions were first published in 1681. As he says (B. II. tit. 4, sec. 32),—'The Statute (1469) was by custom extended to adjudications, being the same in effect, but different in form from apprisings; for the design of the Statute being to satisfy creditors by judicial alienation of the debtor's lands ex paritate rationis, it was extended against the debtor's appearand heir, who being charged to enter heir, did not enter; and therefore lands were adjudged from him, to which he might have entered, either for his predecessor's debt or his own; whereupon the superior is decerned to receive the creditors-adjudgers, whether for sums of money, or for implement of dispositions and obligements to infeft.' 'But the custom allowed not a year's rent to superiors for receiving adjudgers, 21st July 1636, Grier, till the year's rent was also extended to adjudications by Act of Parliament, Dec. 3, 1669,'—See first edition of Stair, Vol. I. p. 305.

"Thus, in practice, all vassals were enabled, long before 1685, to change the old investiture of their estates, and to establish a new investiture under the superior, by paying him a year's rent. That high composition was the utmost extent of the superior's claim for changing the investiture, and there is no indication in any of our authorities, that superiors, after the rights of property and inheritance were well understood, had any control over vassals in the destinations they made, or in the number of substitutions under which they chose to settle their fees. The limitation necessarily imposed on vassals consisted in this, that substitutions (which truly are special assignments) fell all to be fixed before infeftment.—See Stair, B. II. t. 3, sec. 5.

"Indeed, the ancient custom and the right of vassals to alter subsisting destinations and tailzies, and to make new ones, is mentioned very clearly by Balfour in a chapter before referred to (pp. 173, 174.) It is well known, also, that the same doctrine has been confirmed by more recent cases of unquestionable authority, as in those of Captain Johnstone against the Marquis of Annandale in 1759 (Dict. p. 4356), and in that of the Magistrates of Aberdeen against Burnett in 1808 (App., voce Superior and Vassal, No. 5), both referred to in the papers in the present case. And therefore, when a fee was once settled, and an entry given for the usual composition under a new investiture, the substitutes became heirs of provision, and in fact members of the investiture, and the superior could demand no more for the entry of any succeeding substitute than the ordinary relief duty exigible from heirs of investiture.

"These views are not inconsistent with the doctrine of Craig and others, that tailzies could only be made with consent of the superior. In one sense this was correct. Heirs of tailzie not alioqui successuri, certainly could not demand an entry as ordinary heirs, without the consent of the superior. But some time elapsed in the early history of the law, before the operation and effect of the process of adjudication, whereby heirs of provision and disponees could compel an entry from the superior, under a new institution, on an absolute and irredeemable disposition, were well ascertained. Craig (whose treatise was published in 1602,) expressly states that that process was unknown to his predecessors; and Lord Stair observes (B. III. t. 2, sec. 45), that 'adjudications being but recent in his (Craig's) time, and few decisions thereupon, the nature and effect of it was but little known, but is now in course of time farther illustrated.' When it was afterwards found, therefore, that adjudgers had it in their power to obtain an entry by payment of a year's rent, it is not strictly correct to say that a tailzie could not, at least by due process at law, be made effectual without the consent of the superior. Indeed, the competency of an adjudication by heirs of tailzie is distinctly explained by Lord Stair (B. II. t. 3, sec. 43).

"The Act 1685, giving validity to entails, certainly did not extend the rights of superiors. The object of it was to secure and render permanent the tailzied destinations in previous use, by giving effect to prohibitory, irritant and resolute clauses; but while it declared that superiors should not be prejudged of their casualties, it did not enact that any new casualties should be leviable from heirs of tailzie, which could not have been demanded from heirs of investiture according to the former practice.

"It would appear, however, that superiors and their agents, very soon after 1685, took up the notion that they might set up a claim for a composition from every substitute of tailzie who was not heir-at-law of the preceding possessor of the estate. Accordingly, a clause to that effect was inserted in a charter granted soon after 1711, by Mr Lockhart of Carnwath to Sir Archibald Denham of Westshiel (the first substitute under the tailzie), though on every occasion the superior got a composition from the vassal as a singular successor. That charter was reduced on a ground immaterial in the present question; but the next substitute, Sir Robert Denham, got a new charter in the same terms—the superior being allowed to retain the old composition. Then, when a third renewal of the investiture was required in 1760, in favour of the substitute who then succeeded, he not being the heir alioqui successurus, the superior demanded a second composition, which the Court repelled, 'in respect the pursuer had acknowledged the entail by granting charter and infeftment thereon to the late Sir Robert Denham.'

"It rather appears to the Lord Ordinary, that the real meaning of the Court in the preceding decision has been sometimes misunderstood, perhaps because the ratio set forth in the interlocutor is not expressed with due accuracy and precision. It is not easy to understand how a superior could be said to have acknowledged an entail, merely by granting a charter containing the very express reservation, which appears on the face of both the charters in the Westshiel's case; but when it is attended to that the superior had, prior to granting the first charter, received the composition of a singular successor for the entry and acknowledgment of the first heir under the tailzie, he was thus properly barred from claiming a new composition from a succeeding heir of the investiture, which he had already acknowledged for the highest legal consideration that the law gave him a right to exact. In other words, he had acknowledged the entail for an onerous consideration; and no reservation could give him any farther claim, as it was on its face a reservation of a demand plainly illegal and unjust, and not effectual against heirs of entail, as they did not represent the party who had acquiesced in its insertion in the primary charter. In that view, the case of Denham is an authority decisively in favour of the defender in the present case.

"It is obvious, also, that the late cases are not opposed to the preceding decision. In the case of M'Kenzie in 1777, the heir of entail who demanded an entry, being the heir alioqui successurus of the party deceased, refused to pay the composition of a singular successor; and the Court held that he was entitled to an entry for the ordinary relief duty of an heir, 'reserving to the superior and his successors in the superiority, any right which they may have to a year's rent on the entry of any future heir of tailzie not an heir of investiture prior to the tailzie.' It is almost implied in this reservation, that the payment of a composition by any substitute of entail as a singular successor, would exhaust the claim of the superior, as the tailzied destination would then be acknowledged by him for the legal consideration exigible on a change of investiture. Accordingly, in the deliberations on the bench, in M'Kenzie's case, Lord Braxfield made this important observation, that 'the granting of the first charter is an enfranchisement of all the subsequent dispositions.'

"The case of the Duke of Argyle v. Lord Dunmore in 1798 (Dict. p. 15,068), was certainly different from the preceding; for there the institute of tailzie who demanded an entry was confessedly a singular successor; and having offered the year's rent, he was entitled, according to the view of the law now taken, to insist on an unqualified entry of the whole tailzied destination; but as Lord Dunmore, who then demanded an entry, had a family of his own to succeed him, he was probably advised that the superior's contingent claim might never arise, and therefore he declined to try the question, farther than to insist on the superior's future claim being reserved, in case it should ever emerge; and the Court found that the superior was not entitled to demand more at that time, in consequence of which the determination of the question which here occurs was of course superseded.

"The late case of the Duke of Hamilton against Lord Hope-toun (8th March 1839), is also referred to in the present question; and certainly there are some expressions in the opinion of the consulted Judges in that report, which at first sight might afford an inference in favour of the superior's argument here; but truly the plea now raised was altogether unnecessary in that instance. The superior had granted a charter in the ordinary terms to a purchaser, and his heirs and assignees. No special substitution was set forth in the charter; but the vassal having got the charter in the preceding general terms, assigned it, in his son's contract of marriage, to his heirs-male and other heirs of tailzie, excluding heirs of line. As the superior was not a party to the assignation, it was contended that he had given no consent to the new investiture, and was not bound to give a new investiture under it without a new composition. But it was held sufficient for the determination of the case to state, that in any view of a superior's rights, a purchaser was entitled to substitute all his own heirs in any order he chose, without the superior's consent. The question, whether he could not have insisted on a new investiture being granted to any series of heirs of provision he chose to substitute, at the very time the charter was taken out, was of course not decided by the Court, but was reserved for consideration when the case should occur.

"Now, however, that the question arises under circumstances which render its decision unavoidable, the Lord Ordinary, on the grounds already detailed (perhaps at too much length), is humbly of opinion, that the superior having already received a composition for the entry of the first disponent under the present tailzie, and having thereby acknowledged the entail for an onerous cause, is bound to enter the defender as an heir of the subsisting investiture, for the ordinary relief exigible from an heir.

"The Lord Ordinary has the less hesitation in coming to this conclusion, when it coincides so entirely with the opinion expressed by Lord Corehouse in the case of Baillie in 1827, before referred to. His Lordship remarked, most properly in that case, that if superiors were entitled to a casualty in every transmission of a tailzied fee to a stranger substitute, 'it would make a tailzie greatly more preferable to a superior than a fee-simple.' It may be added, that when a proprietor, by following out implicitly the directions of the Act 1685, may make the tailzied fee perpetual in his own family, or to his own kindred, by a destination to the vassal, and his heirs whatsoever, always secluding heirs-portioners, it is very difficult to see how the condition of the superior can be made worse by any special substitution of stranger heirs, any more than it would have been by the perpetual inheritance of the heirs at law.

"It deserves notice, also, that the Act of Geo. II. enabled vassals to change their old investitures, by executing procuratories of resignation in favour of such disponents as they thought proper, on which they were entitled to give a charge to the superior to enter them on payment of the customary casualties exigible from the heir or purchaser. If the charge was in favour of a singular successor, and a specified series of substitutes in fee-simple, it never was supposed that the superior could object or claim a new composition from any of the substitutes allowed to succeed under a simple destination unfenced with irritant and resolute clauses. There appears to be no pretence for such a claim under the ancient law of Scotland. Is the claim, then, the more maintainable that the institute under a tailzied investiture, purchased from the superior, has succeeded by the protection of irritant and resolute clauses? There appears to be no room for any distinction.

"This certainly raises the question suggested towards the close of Lord Corehouse's note in Baillie's case, whether the superior is not entitled to 'an equivalent for admitting a condition into the charter which destroys the chances of singular succession in future.' While his Lordship most naturally adds, 'that it is very difficult to put a value on that chance.' It humbly appears to the Lord Ordinary, that any claim of the superior on this ground is altogether inadmissible and contrary to principle. It is established by the writings of all the great lawyers of the seventeenth century (including Hope, M'Kenzie and Stair), that tailzies, at least with prohibitory clauses, and often with irritant and resolute clauses, were known long before 1685. These conditions laid the vassals under a certain obligation, in honesty and good faith, to respect the tailzie, and they were effectual against gratuitous alienation, though possibly not sufficient to exclude the claims of creditors; the superior was also bound to insert these prohibitions in his charter, —it being remarked by Lord Braxfield in M'Kenzie's case, that a superior 'was always obliged to grant a charter with prohibitory clauses.' This being the case, it would be alike anomalous ious and unusual to give superiors a compensation to any extent, merely because a law was passed making prohibitions long sanctioned, and held obligatory inter hæredes, more operative and secure,—it being quite clear that vassals were previously entitled to frame such prohibitions, and that superiors ab antiquo were bound to repeat them in their charters. Indeed, when an investiture of old was once established under a superior, the principle and hearing of the feudal system was, rather to retain the vassal and to maintain the rule de non aliendo, than to enable the superior to make a profit by its violation.

"This point was briefly adverted to in the opinion delivered by the Judges in the late case of the Duke of Hamilton against Lord Hopetoun, already referred to. The consulted Judges stated, that they were 'not aware of any ground on which a superior can be held bound to admit clauses irritant and resolute into the investiture on payment of a composition or casualty of one year's rent, or on which he can claim such a casualty on account of having admitted such clauses.' But it was added, that the claim of the superior on that ground was excluded by the form of that action, and if so, it is equally incompetent in the present case.

"In every view, therefore, if the Lord Ordinary had given his own decision in this case, he would have been disposed to sustain the pleas of the defender."

The case was in the roll for advising on 26th May 1840, but the Court,

"in respect of the general importance of the question raised in this cause, and of the opinions of the whole Judges consulted in the late case between the Duke of Hamilton and the Earl of Hopetoun, ordain the cases for the parties to be laid before the whole Judges of both Divisions and permanent Lords Ordinary, for their opinion thereon."

The following opinion (concurring in by Lord Cockburn and Lord Murray) was returned by Lord Ivory:

"We are of opinion that the pursuer is bound to enter the defender upon the terms offered by the latter, viz., on payment of a year's feu-duty in name of relief, as in the ordinary case of the entry of an heir; and that he is not entitled to demand a year's rent in name of composition, as in the case of the entry of a singular successor.

"We come to this conclusion upon the general ground, that where the superior, as in the present case, has already received, upon the change of investiture, the composition of a year's rent at the entry of the first member of entail not being heir of the previous investiture, he is bound throughout to deal with the entail as the existing investiture of the estate, and to carry out and give effect to the destination therein contained, as the rule of that investiture in regard to succession,—and consequently, to receive the whole series of substitute heirs (without distinction of one from another), as the line of succession thus fixed respectively opens to each in the express character, and as entitled to all the privileges and rights of heirs of the investiture.

"In other words, we adopt unqualifiedly the doctrine of Erskine (11. 7. 7), as a correct statement of the rule of law applicable to this question, that 'though singular successors, whether adjudgers or voluntary purchasers, are liable in payment of a year's rent to the superior for changing the former investiture; yet, where a proprietor entails his lands, the superior is not entitled to the composition of a year's rent from every successive heir of entail who is not heir of line to him who stood last infelt, on pretence that he is a singular successor. The heir of the last investiture cannot be called a singular successor, and he is founded in a right to demand an entry, upon payment to the superior of the sum due to him by law in name of relief, upon the entry of an heir.'

"Accordingly, had it not been for the clause of reservation, which the superior in the present case inserted in his charter of resignation, it is altogether indisputable that every successive heir of entail, whether heir of line to him who stood last infelt or not, must have been received and entered upon this footing. The pursuer himself concedes this. It was for the express purpose of avoiding such a result that the clause of reservation was resorted to. And it had been the same in all the former cases: For example, "In Lockhart v. Denham 10th July 1760, (Dict. 15,047), the Court, even in the face of an express clause, which, if the report be correctly stated, had been embodied in the charter, 'that every heir of entail shall be obliged to pay a year's rent for his entry, unless he be at the same time heir of line to the person who died last vest and seised:' 'Found, that in respect the pursuer had acknowledged the entail by granting charter and infestment thereon, he was obliged to enter the defender as heir of entail, and not as singular successor.'

"So, in M'Kenzie v. M'Kenzie, 4th July 1777, (Dict. v. Superior and Vassal, Appendix, No. II.), the Court doubting, it is true, whether the judgment in Lockhart's case might not perhaps have gone too far in refusing effect to the clause just quoted (which, in one sense, it might be contended, was made a positive condition of the new investiture, and as such, while it remained unreduced, ought to have received effect against all claiming right through that investiture), had still no hesitation as to the general doctrine,—That were the entail once to be embodied in any charter to be granted by the superior, without some express clause qualifying this recognition, and reserving the superior's rights, the whole series of substitute heirs—no matter how much strangers in blood to each other—must become from that moment heirs of the investiture, and qua such would be entitled to an entry, not as singular successors, but as heirs. In point of fact, in this case nothing was decided; and in order to solve the difficulty, the question was kept open for future discussion. But a reservation—saving the legal rights of both superior and vassal—was inserted in the judgment, just because the Court felt that otherwise an unqualified charter would, by force of the law itself, 'entitle a stranger to enter without paying a composition.' Indeed, nothing can be more instructive on this head than the words of Brazfield, as they are reported by Hailes. 'QUERY—May not the superior throw in a reservation? If he does not, he cannot afterwards claim; for the granting of the first charter is the enfranchisement of all the subsequent dispoonees.'

"The case of Duke of Argyle v. Earl of Dunmore, 19th November 1795, (Dict. 15,068), is to the same effect. The superior there insisted, that it should be made an absolute condition of the entail-investiture, 'that he should not be obliged to enter such of the substitutes as were not heirs-male or of line to the vassal last entered and infelt, without receiving a year's rent from them as singular successors also;' and he did this, 'because' as he argued, 'after acknowledging an entail, by granting a charter upon it, although it contained the reservation proposed by the defender' (one similar to that in M'Kenzie's case), 'he would be precluded from making his present claim.' But the Court refused what the superior thus demanded; and in respect the reservation proposed by the vassal leaves the question entire when it shall occur,—ordained the charter to be given upon that footing.

"At last the precise question occurred under a charter which had been granted, without any special clause either of reservation or obligation in the superior's favour; D. Hamilton v. Baillie, 22d November 1827, (6 S. and D., 94). The superior endeavoured to shake himself rid of the implied recognition, by pleading that the charter had been granted a non habente potestatem to that effect, and that he did not represent the granter; but this again was met by the answer, that the investiture had since stood unchallenged for more than forty years, and so was fortified by prescription;—and the Court had to dispose of the point immediately before it, as if the charter had been validly granted from the first. It was held that the entail having been simpliciter recognised, and embodied into the investiture, the superior—who had 'refused to receive as his vassal a party claiming entry as an heir of entail under the charter—except in the character of singular successor, and on payment of a year's rent,—was bound to enter him as heir.'

"Whether, therefore, the superior may at first refuse to grant a charter embodying a tailzied destination,—or whether, granting it, he may be entitled so to qualify the right, as to leave it open to him afterwards to insist on a departure from the direct lineal line, for all that he might competently have demanded, had he originally refused,—may or may not be made a question. But it is settled law as regards every charter wherein the tailzied destination shall once unqualifiedly have been embodied,— that under that destination, all are to be received as heirs, and that no distinction whatever can be taken among those heirs, as being, some heirs of line, and some strangers to the vassal last infeft—the investiture alone affording the rule of succession in the face—and all being alike heirs of the investiture.

“Without proceeding farther, then, we think this sufficient of itself to expose the whole fallacy of the pursuer’s reasoning, inasmuch as his argument appears to assume throughout, that whoever is not an heir of line, must of necessity, in the eye of law, as applied to the constitution and construction of feudal rights, be regarded and dealt with as if he were a singular successor. The truth is, that in feudal succession, the very question, who is heir of line? can never to any practical effect arise, unless where the feu-right itself is conceived in favour of heirs of that class. The essential question always is, who is heir of the investiture? Indeed, even where the investiture is in favour of heirs of line, it is only as being heirs of the investiture thus conceived, that the heirs of line themselves succeed.

“Nor is it out of place here to remark, that this view of the matter seems also to dispose of the pursuer’s argument, upon the supposed reservation of the superior’s rights as connected with the present question, contained in the Statute 1685, introducing and authorising strict entails. For, if it were indeed vi statuti that the superior’s rights were saved, it could require no special clause of reservation ex pacto privato to be engrossed in the tailzied investiture in order to work out that end. In such case, a clause of this kind would be mere supererogation. The entail itself, as it is constituted into a legal right only by force of the Statute, must of necessity have carried the statutory reservation along with it as parcel of the right, if not indeed an express condition of its existence. Since, therefore, the law holds that, notwithstanding the statutory reservation, there is nothing whatever saved to a superior who simply obeys the Statute by giving a charter unqualified in græmio, it follows that it is not by force of the Statute, but by force of some express clause embodied in the writ,—in other words, by the positive private stipulation of the parties inter se,—that the superior’s rights in this respect are to be saved, if, indeed, he have any legal rights belonging to him in the matter.

“This brings the whole question to the point,—Is or is not the superior entitled to refuse a charter, where the vassal demands an investiture entailing the feu?

“In the first place, there is nothing in the mere circumstance of the estate’s being settled under the fetters of a strict entail, which entitles him to refuse. The entail may be fenced in the most effectual manner with all the clauses authorised by the Act 1685, and provided the destination do not extend beyond the body of lineal heirs, the superior has no choice. This the pursuer concedes; and it is the necessary consequence, besides, of all those cases wherein the superior has been ordered to embody the tailzied destination, with no other reservation but one affecting the succession of substitutes, who appear to be strangers to the direct line. As laid down by Braxfield in M’Kenzie’s case, ‘strip the deed of substitution to strangers, and the superior might be obliged to grant a charter, even with prohibitive clauses, &c. The superior does not suffer by the line of succession being continued.’

“Nor is this the case only, where the direct lineal line of succession is preserved. The destination may even be broken in favour of strangers to this line,—and still, if the destination thus broken and interrupted in favour of strangers was also the destination of the prior investiture, it may be changed from a fee-simple to a strictly-fenced entail destination,—and (as was substantially decided in M’Kenzie, supra) the superior be obliged to grant a charter in terminis, and to receive even the stranger substitutes as the heirs of investiture, notwithstanding the change effected through the fees being now constituted into a proper tailzied fee.

“But, if it be thus true that the superior’s right of refusal in no respect depends upon the circumstance that the estate has been tied up from future alienation by the fetters of a strict entail, it must be upon some ground wholly apart from the operation of the Statute 1685, that that right, if such indeed there be, must rest. In other words, it must rest upon some ground applicable not less to an ordinary destination in favour of heirs of provision before the Statute, than to the most strictly-fenced and protected destination in favour of heirs of entail since.

“This would, indeed, give a very large and indefinite operation to the principle contended for by the pursuers. For it would just come to this, that wherever—no matter whether by strict entail, in fee-simple, or under clauses merely prohibitory, and therefore defeasible at pleasure—the legal order of succession should come to be in the slightest degree broken in upon, the superior might reject the destination as an encroachment on his feudal rights, and refuse a charter.

“It is difficult to conceive that so very broad and wide-spreading a principle as this should have been the law, and a question for the first time come to be stirred in regard to it, under the Statute 1685. Conjoint fees,—destinations to heirs of a marriage,—the succession of heirs of provision generally,—in short, every case where land came to open in favour not of the hæres natus, but the hæres factus, must equally have raised the question under this more general aspect. But we are not aware of a single instance, among all these classes of cases, where a mere departure in the destination from the direct lineal order of succession was ever set forward as a ground entitling the superior to refuse a charter.

“The principle, indeed, is excluded by that very case of Duke of Hamilton v. Earl of Hopetoun, 8th March 1839, with reference mainly to the bearing of which the present consultation has been thought necessary. It was there expressly laid down in the opinions, that, ‘a purchaser of land from the vassal of a subject-superior is entitled, on payment of a casualty, or composition of one year’s rent, to obtain from the superior a new charter, and a precept of sasine of the fee. This charter and precept, we think, he is for that composition entitled to demand, shall be granted in favour of himself and all his heirs of law, in any order of these heirs he pleases, provided only he shall not in this destination go beyond his heirs of law to strangers. He may equally name to the superior, heirs of law simply, or heirs-male, whom failing, heirs-female, or any other arrangement of the body of his heirs of law.’

“It is very true that the opinion thus delivered is qualified by the proviso that the vassal ‘shall not in this destination go beyond his heirs of law to strangers.’ But this, it is thought, must be held to have been introduced merely to save and keep open a case which was not at the moment before the Court. The particular destination there to be dealt with was one which did not go beyond the body of the heirs of law, and it was of course right to confine the judgment to the individual destination on which the question had arisen.

“The important consideration, as regards the judgment actually pronounced, is, that it completely negatives the pursuer’s main position in the present case, viz., that the superior is entitled to refuse a charter, wherever the destination calls the substituted heirs in other than the direct line of blood,—and this upon the general principle, that every one who would not take as an heir in the common order of law, must of necessity be dealt with as a singular successor.

“In this respect, indeed, we can recognise no distinction whatever, in point of principle, between a departure from the legal order of succession within ‘the body of heirs of law,’ and a corresponding departure by going out of that body. If the pursuer be right in his argument, that a substitute heir, who is not heir of line to the last entered vassal, must be held a singular successor, because the destination in such case substantially operates a conveyance from the last heir, and is not in the proper sense to be dealt with as at all a legal succession,—this applies in its full force, wherever the order of law is broken in upon in the least degree. If a father convey to a second or any younger son,—or one of several brothers to a sister,—the donee, in such case, must enter and pay composition as a singular successor, although ‘within the body of the grantor’s heirs of law.’ So, if a father or brother, in the two cases supposed, take a grant to himself in the first instance, whom failing, to the second or other younger son in the first case, or to the sister in the second,—the substitute in this destination could not, of course, though within the general body of heirs of law, take as heir of line to the last entered vassal; and the legal order of succession would just be as much defeated,—and the necessity (but for the destination in the investiture) of a fresh deed of conveyance to carry the estate over the proper heir of line would just be as palpable,—as if the destination in its second branch had been in favour of a total stranger to the blood. But had this departure from the line of blood been effected by conveyance, instead of being brought about by the operation of the investiture, as a destination once for all, the superior must have had his composition as from a singular successor; and so on to the end, wherever the direct line was at all or to any effect departed from. Now the judgment in Lord Hopetoun's case authoritatively excludes this, in every possible variety of case, but the single one of introducing a stranger. The superior's right, therefore, cannot turn upon the distinction of heir and singular successor in the sense that the pursuer contends for. Yet, putting aside that distinction, what legal principle is there which discriminates between a singular successor within the line of blood, and a singular successor out of that line?

"Accordingly, we have the authority of Lord Stair, where he treats of tailzied destinations, such as they were known before the Statute 1685, for holding, that the superior could not protect himself against them by refusing a charter. Indirectly, and by force of adjudication, any destination whatever could be forced upon him. If 'the debt and decret whereupon the same proceeded, be conceived in favour of heirs of tailzie, in that case the apprising or adjudication, and infestment thereon, must be conform' (Stair, II. 3, 43.) And again (§ 59), 'It is a general rule that quique est rei sue moderator et arbiter, every man may dispose of his own at his pleasure, either to take effect in his life, or after his death, and so may provide his lands to what heirs he pleaseth, and may change the succession as oft as he will, which will be completed by resigning from himself and his heirs in the fee, in favour of himself, and such other heirs as he pleaseth to name in the procuratory, whereupon resignation being accepted by a superior, and new infestment granted accordingly, the succession is effectually altered; yea, any obligation to take his lands so holden, will oblige the former heirs to enter, and to denude themselves for implement of that obligation, in favour of the heirs therein expressed; and if the superior refuse to accept the resignation, or to give confirmation, there will follow an adjudication for implement of the disposition, which is ordinary, and thereupon the superior must receive the adjudger; so that the first constituter of a tailzie, or any heir succeeding to him, may change it at their pleasure.' That this did not mean heirs of tailzie merely within the line of blood, is made clear by another passage a little farther on in the section last quoted, where his Lordship speaks of 'a tailzie of a sum of money, lent in these terms, 'to be paid to the creditor and the heirs of his body; whilks failing, to the father and heirs of his body; whilks failing, to a person named, and his heirs and assignees whatsoever.'

"We are therefore of opinion—1st, That independently of the Statute 1685, the superior was not entitled to refuse a charter, though demanded in favour of heirs of provision, or such tailzied destination generally as the law then recognised; 2d, That the introduction of strict entails by that Statute, made no difference in this respect, the superior not being entitled, where he would otherwise have been compelled to embody the destination in his charter, to refuse doing so merely because of the fetters of entail; and 3d, That from the moment the destination came thus to be embodied in the charter, and thereby became the rule of that investiture quoad the succession, every substitute within the destination became thenceforth an heir of the investiture, and as such, whether heir of line of the last entered vassal or not, was in all cases alike entitled to an entry, not upon payment of composition as a singular successor, but upon payment of relief merely, as in the case of a proper heir."

Lord Cuninghame:

"I concur in all the views expressed by Lord Ivory on this question; and beg to add, that it humbly appears to me that his Lordship has obviated satisfactorily the argument founded on the reservation of the superior's rights, inserted in the charter granted to the first vassal, who was entered under the present tailzie, after the form suggested by Lord Braxfield in the case of M'Kenzie, and allowed by the Court in the case of Argyle, and adopted in practice in other modern instances.

"It is clear, as observed by Lord Ivory, that such a clause cannot have any other or more extensive effect than to reserve the rights of the superior, as they stand reserved by the saving clause at the end of the Act 1685, which provided, that 'nothing in this Act shall prejudice his Majesty, or any other lawful superior, of the casualties of superiority which may arise to them out of the tailzied lands.'

"This reservation it is thought imported no more than a saving of such rights as superiors had prior to the Act. No new right was given to superiors. Their subsisting and ancient right, as it existed before the passing of the Statute, was recognised. But the whole authorities prior to 1685 concur in declaring, that old vassals could at that time, by adjudication, if not by the acceptance of the voluntary composition by the superior, establish the validity of any new investiture he chose to make of the fee, by paying a year's rent to the superior. Still, in order to preserve that casualty, the reservation at the close of the Act 1685 was proper. As tailzied investitures were then expressly sanctioned and declared to be effectual by Statute, a plea might possibly have been set up, that superiors were bound to acknowledge tailzied investitures even when the first entry under them was demanded, without payment of the casualty previously exigible. The reservation in the Act 1685, effectually excluded that plea. But when no new additional privilege or casualty was given to superiors by the Statute, it follows that they were not entitled to demand more subsequent to 1685, than they could have legally exacted by the previous law and practice, for the entry of heirs under tailzied substitutions and investitures."

Lord Mackenzie:

"I think that the pursuer is entitled to demand from the defender a year's rent, as for the entry of a singular successor. The clause of reservation prevents the defender from founding on the rule, that all destinies of investiture must be admitted to enter as heirs,—a rule which in itself I fully recognise, but which is excluded from governing this case, which depends on the general question, whether a superior in landed property is bound, on offer of one year's rent, to grant new infestment to a donee or singular successor of the vassal, with a destination of heirs of investiture, including not only all the heirs of law of the donee, but including as many strangers as the donee chooses to have made heirs of investiture in the fee by the act of the superior. Now that question, I think (though not without difficulty), must be answered in the negative.

"The general rule of feudal law in Scotland was, that a superior could not be forced to admit into a feu any persons but the heirs of the vassal to whom he had given infestment. By the Statute 1469, c. 36, an appriser got right to demand from the superior infestment in the feu on payment of one year's rent. And so purchasers of the estate were enabled to force an entry by becoming apprisers. Nothing is said in the Statute regarding the heirs of the appriser; but by fair interpretation, it was evident that the appriser or purchaser must obtain infestment to himself and heirs, not in liferent only, but in heritage. But there exists not in the Statute the least shadow of foundation for holding that the appriser or purchaser, on payment of one year's rent, had right to demand from the superior infestment in favour, not only of himself and all his heirs, but of other persons who were not his heirs at all, but wholly strangers to his blood. By other Statutes, adjudgers in implement, and other adjudgers and purchasers at judicial sales, were in like manner entitled to obtain from the superior infestment, on payment of one year's rent. And, lastly, by 20th Geo. II., the superior was bound to give infestment in the feu to any donee or singular successor having a procuratory of resignation in his favour. These Statutes, in like manner, as 1469, c. 36, say nothing of the heirs of the adjudger or singular successor; but on evident grounds of rational interpretation, these parties had right under the Statutes to infestment in favour of themselves and their heirs. And in reference to these Statutes, it is just equally clear, that they afford no grounds whatever for holding that the adjudger or donee had any right to demand from the superior infestment in favour, not only of himself and of his heirs, but farther in favour of other persons, who were not his heirs at all, but mere strangers. A superior might, if he chose, add such strangers to the destination of heirs granted to his new vassal, and if he did so, he made them heirs of investiture. But there exists not in the Statutes any ground whatever for saying, that the superior was bound, for payment of one year's rent, to admit strangers in this way.

"And the superior, besides the right, had a strong interest to object. For anciently the feu reverted to the superior himself on failure of the vassal and his heirs. And after the Crown's right as ultimus hæres prevailed, still the Crown's donatory paid one year's rent to the subject-superior for an entry. Vide Erskine, B. III. tit. 10, § 1 and 2; Jur. Syles, Vol. I. p. 348. This interest was indeed comparatively weak, until fetters against alienation, &c., were added to destinations of succession; because, if the vassal obtained a destination reaching to mere strangers nowise connected with his heirs by blood, without any fetters, it was highly probable that, by alienation or alteration of the succession, the tailzie would be put an end to before they succeeded; and therefore, when there were no fetters, the right of the superior might often not be rigidly insisted on. But when fetters were added, the interest of the superior became certain and important.

"There are, however, conditions on which it might reasonably be held that a superior ought to grant a destination in favour of strangers. These are, that the charter shall bear a provision that each stranger, who thus, being in truth no heir but a singular successor, should obtain infeftment for himself and his heirs as destines of investiture should, for that infeftment, pay one year's rent; or, what in truth is equivalent, in the view that the superior's claim is good in law, a provision that the superior's claim for a year's rent, as a composition for giving infeftment to each stranger, should be reserved. Under these conditions, accordingly, I believe it has been usual in practice to grant infeftment to singular successors, with destinations including strangers as well as their own heirs. But without such clauses I do not believe the practice has prevailed; and still less has the right of the singular successor been recognised, either in conveyancing or in judicial opinion. On the contrary, all the authorities our decisions afford lie the other way.

"In the case of Lockhart against Denholm, decided 10th July 1760, both Sir Archibald and Sir Robert Denholm, in the early part of the last century, took charters from the superior, with a clause 'that every heir of entail shall be obliged to pay a year's rent for his entry, unless he be at the same time heir of line to the person last vest and seised;' and Sir Archibald accordingly paid £200 to Mr Lockhart as a composition for a year's rent,—pretty good evidence of the understanding of conveyancers on the subject. True it is, that, notwithstanding this provision, the Court, on some reason that is not explained, found that 'the pursuer (i. e. Lockhart) had acknowledged the entail, by granting charter and infeftment thereupon to the late Sir Robert Denholm, he was obliged to enter the defender (a substitute, not heir of line) as heir of entail, and not as singular successor.' This decision has since been declared by the Court, and universally understood, not to be good authority on the point decided. But it is material to observe here, that it does not rest at all on any right the entailer originally had, to have obtained, on payment of one year's rent, new infeftment to himself and heirs of investiture, not being his heirs of law, though that was argued; but solely on this, that being actually admitted into the investiture by the superior, they must have entry as heirs, not as singular successors,—the clause of reservation being, on some ground not explained, held not to be effectual.

"The next case, M'Kenzie against M'Kenzie, 4th July 1777, is thus abridged in the Dictionary, (p. 15,053).—"The Lords found that a superior of entailed lands was obliged to enter the heir of entail, who in this case was likewise the heir of the former investiture, and lineal successor in the lands, on receiving a duplicando of the feu-duty, and was not entitled to demand from him a year's rent or other composition; reserving to the superior, and his successors in the superiority, any right which they may have to a year's rent or other composition on the entry of any future heir of tailzie, not an heir of investiture prior to the tailzie.' It is plain from this, that the Court were not satisfied that the superior, though bound to admit M'Kenzie and his heirs, was bound to admit strangers as heirs of investiture, without payment of a year's rent for that admission. From the fuller report of the case in the Appendix, it rather appears that the entailer had been himself vassal before the entail, and so was not under the necessity of paying one year's rent for new infeftment to himself and his heirs of law, and of the former investiture. But if it was so, that makes little difference, since there is no doubt in practice, nor was it denied, that a vassal resigning may, without payment of any casualty, demand new infeftment to himself and his own proper heirs of law and of the former investiture. The demand of the superior, therefore, in M'Kenzie's case, was rested, and the reservation admitted, solely in reference to the introduction of a stranger as heir of investiture. In this case, it is said 'the Court seemed very much inclined to get complete information concerning the practice; but the practice was discovered to be various.' That is exactly what was to be expected, on the understanding that the superior's right in law was good. Still there were many considerations which would, in many cases, induce the superior not to insist on that right.

"The next case is that of the Duke of Argyle against the Earl of Dunmore, 19th November 1795. In that case 'the defender' (who was the institute or disponent) 'was willing to pay a year's rent for his entry as singular successor; but the pursuer further insisted that the charter should contain a declaration, that he should not be obliged to enter such substitutes as were not heirs-male, or of line, to the vassal infeft, without receiving a year's rent from them as singular successors also.' The defender offered to take a charter, with a clause reserving the superior's claim to a full year's rent, on the entry of an heir of the tailzied investiture who was not heir of line to the last infeft; and he contended, that while he made this admission, 'it was an unnecessary hardship on the defender to oblige him to discuss a general point of law, the decision of which cannot affect the interest of himself or of his descendants.' And on that ground evidently, the Court, holding the case of Denholm to be wrong decided, and that the reservation was effectual, adhered to the finding of the Lord Ordinary in favour of the Earl of Dunmore. Their interlocutor was—'In respect the reservation proposed by the Earl of Dunmore leaves the question entire when it shall occur,' (unanimously) 'adhered.'

"Next is the case of the Duke of Hamilton against Baillie, 22d November 1827, S. and D., Vol. VI. p. 94, which is thus summed up:—'A superior possessing under an entail, having granted a charter of resignation in favour of a vassal, embracing an entail containing a series of heirs; and sasine having been taken, and possession enjoyed for forty years; and an heir of entail having succeeded to the superiority, and refused to receive as his vassal a party claiming entry as an heir of entail under the charter, except in the character of a singular successor, and on payment of a year's rent—Held that he was bound to enter him as an heir.'

"The opinions of the Court are brief and clear:

"Lord President.—In this case the superior, by granting the charter, has agreed to give the heirs of tailzie an entry as heirs; and this has been acted on for forty years. It may be another question, whether a superior is bound to admit of an entail by a vassal.'

"Lord Gillies.—This case will not decide the general question.'

"Lord Balgray.—There have been forty years' possession, which is sufficient.'

"I have not yet noticed the case of the Magistrates of Aberdeen against Burnett, 17th June 1808, Fac. Coll., because I do not consider it at all in point here. It is thus abridged:—'A singular successor of the vassal in a feu, on payment of one year's rent to the superior (a royal burgh) has a right to demand a charter to himself and heirs whatsoever, though the charter of his author was to heirs-male, burgesses of that burgh, with a clause in the reddendo, that they should perform burgh services, and that the fee should not devolve on the feminine sex.' Your Lordships know, that the words 'heir whatsoever' in a charter, have no meaning different from 'heirs,' or 'heirs at law.' The vassal disponent in that case made no demand of a tailzied feu at all, or any admission of destines beyond his own heirs of law.

"Lastly, I may notice, though not as a decision in point, the case of the Duke of Hamilton against the Earl of Hopetoun, 8th March 1839. In that case, too, the present question was not presented for decision. The expression, in the opinion of the Court touching it, is but accidental in giving a general exposition of law. Still I cannot say it was not their opinion. It was the opinion of myself, who wrote it, and I cannot doubt was so also of the other Judges who signed that opinion.

"I may only add, in reference to recent practice, that I have made some inquiries among conveyancers, and believe the practice to have continued to this day, of superiors refusing to grant a destination beyond heirs of law, unless upon condition of a clause of reservation in favour of the superior's right, to have effect in case the stranger destinies shall succeed, and so often as they shall succeed.

"In these circumstances, I am not able to think, that there is any thing like sufficient authority for rejecting the fair and reasonable interpretation of the Statutes, giving to the singular successor, for his one year's rent, right to obtain new infeftment to himself and his heirs of law, but not to other persons wholly strangers to his blood, as destinies of investiture. And if I be right in that opinion, then it is not, I think, denied, and at any rate is clear, that the superior must be successful in the present case.

"It only remains for me to notice a passage in Stair's Institutions, B. II. tit. 3, § 43, which appears of importance at first sight, but I think very little so on examination. For (1.) Stair does not speak expressly of infeftment to strangers in addition to the heirs of the appriser or adjudger. He speaks of 'a tailzie;' but that may, and properly does, mean a tailzied (or cut) destination of heirs of law, not extending at all to strangers. (2.) Stair ends by saying, 'or at least, if the appriser or adjudger craves the infeftment to himself and the heirs of tailzie, the superior ought not to refuse it; for the apprising or adjudication being assigned to a stranger, he behoved to be infeft; much more the alteration of heirs is allowable.' Stair is plainly considering only the alteration of heirs, not at all the extension of them, so as to include an indefinite number of distinct unconnected stirpes and their heirs. (3.) Stair does not say that the tailzie must be admitted on payment of one year's rent, or on what condition. Indeed, he seems still to have held the doctrine, that by adjudication in implement, a superior might be compelled to admit singular successors without any payment at all, by force of the judgment. He says (B. II. tit. 4, § 6), 'The cause of this confusion is, that superiors are not obliged to receive the singular successors of their vassals, even though they should offer a year's rent for their entry; which privilege of superiors, by law and practice, is now evacuated, because superiors may be compelled to receive strangers upon apprising or adjudication for a year's rent; yea, if the vassal dispoise the fee, and oblige himself to infeft upon the obligement, and adjudication is competent against the vassal, so as to oblige the superior to grant the infeftment, which, though frequently practised, yet there is no express law allowing the superior a year's rent. There was indeed a law made for a year's rent, upon adjudication, when apparent heirs did renounce to be heirs, as well as upon apprisings, which doth not bear adjudications for implement of dispositions.' Now, if Stair thought that by an adjudication in implement on a disposition, a stranger disponee might force an entry for himself and his heirs, without payment of casualty at all, he might well think that the superior need not make difficulty about the ulterior heirs of investiture. But in truth Stair does not appear to have at all contemplated the point now in question. And accordingly, this passage does not seem to have been cited in the case of Lockhart, or any of the other cases in which the point was argued, and certainly could not possibly have been the regulator of any practice of conveyancing down to the time when these cases commenced, and still less since that time."

Lord Jeffrey:

"I concur entirely in this opinion of Lord Mackenzie. Only I give much more weight than he appears to do, to the recent decision in the case of the Duke of Hamilton and Lord Hopetoun, of March 1839; which, though it does not find in express or direct terms, seems to me necessarily to imply, that while a vassal might require his superior to grant an investiture to the whole of his natural heirs, in whatever order he might choose to arrange them, his right, at all events, went no farther; and that it was an indispensable condition in any series of heirs so sought to be enfranchised, that they should all hold that character jure sanguinis, and not provisione hominis. If the judgment did not proceed upon this assumption, or rather fundamental principle, I really do not know upon what it proceeded; and cannot perceive any connection between the reasoning, so ably deduced in the unanimous opinion of the consulted Judges, and their conclusion. For myself at least, I can say that I conceived this limitation of the vassal's right to be as distinctly fixed by the decision, as its extension to the case more immediately in question; and that I could not now adopt the views of the defender without feeling that I was going directly against the authority of that most deliberate decision. In strictness of principle, indeed, and especially in reference to the genius and history of feudal holdings, what we now call an heir of provision (if he has no other or additional character), I conceive not to be an heir at all, but a disponee or singular successor merely; and it does not appear to me, that the mere circumstance of such a person, if once named in any investiture or substitution, being entitled to make up titles by service and retour, ought to have any effect whatever on the independent rights of a superior, who has not bound himself, directly or indirectly, to renounce these rights."

Lord Gillies:

"I concur in the opinions of Lord Mackenzie and Lord Jeffrey."

Lord President (Boyle):

"I concur in the opinion of Lord Mackenzie, with the addition made to it by Lord Jeffrey, though I was not present when the judgment in the case of the Duke of Hamilton against the Earl of Hopetoun was pronounced by the Second Division of the Court."

Lord Fullerton:

"I agree in opinion with Lord Jeffrey and Lord Mackenzie, that in this case the pursuer is entitled to demand from the defender the ordinary composition as for a singular successor. And I may be permitted to add in explanation, that I think the conclusion thus come to, stands quite clear of certain other points, on which the defender seems to consider it to be dependent, and which I should think it quite hopeless to maintain. Thus, in the first place, I think it clear, that when a superior has once admitted, without qualification or reservation, a certain line of descent into the investiture of the vassal, that series of persons, however unconnected by blood, must be dealt with by the superior as heirs. That is the consequence of the consent implied in the superior's own act. Though not heirs by blood of the original vassal, or of each other, he has made them heirs of the investiture. 2dly, I think that the imposition of fetters, and the consequently diminished probability of alienation, does not import such an encroachment on the superior's interest, as to warrant him to demand any higher terms of entry than if the investiture were free. That point was fixed in the case of M'Kenzie v. M'Kenzie, 4th July 1777, and evidently assumed as so fixed in the subsequent case of the Duke of Argyle against the Earl of Dunmore, 19th November 1795; and from the combined operation of these principles, I think it must follow, that if a superior has once granted, without qualification, an investiture to a series of substitutes, strangers in blood to the institute and to each other, he would not be entitled to refuse a renewal of that investiture, under the fetters of a strict entail.

"But these propositions do not touch the present question; because, here, the superior has never absolutely acknowledged the investiture. He has never, either expressly or by implication, agreed to hold the stranger substitutes as heirs. On the contrary, though granting the investiture in favour of a particular line of descent, as he was bound to do by the decision in the case of the Duke of Argyle against Lord Dunmore, he has done so only under the reservation, also sanctioned by that decision, as well as that of M'Kenzie v. M'Kenzie, that his right should be entire whenever the contingency happened to which the reservation applied. No doubt, if the case of Lockhart against Denham were understood to fix the law, there would be an end to the question, because there a reservation much stronger and more express was entirely disregarded. But the authority of that decision was superseded by the clearest of all implications in the cases of M'Kenzie and the Duke of Argyll; as it is impossible to suppose that the Court could either insert in their interlocutor, as they did in the first case, or appoint to be inserted in the charter, as they did in the second, a reservation in itself utterly nugatory.

"Here, then, the superior having reserved all his rights, in the event of the succession opening to an heir of investiture, not the heir by blood of his immediate predecessor, the question arises, what those rights are. If a vassal is in every case entitled, as a matter of absolute right, to demand, and a superior bound, as a matter of absolute obligation, to grant an entry, not only to the individual seeking an entry and his heirs, but to any number of stranger substitutes, then, of course, the reservation would lead to no consequence. It being clear that an heir of investiture must in the ordinary case be treated as an heir, it would follow, that if the superior has no option, but must admit into the investiture as many stranger substitutes as the vassal chooses, he can have no legal right to stipulate for a composition on the entry of any of those substitutes. But, on the other hand, if the superior lies under no such obligation,—if, in the general case, he is not absolutely bound to admit stranger substitutes into the investiture, or to do more than grant the entry to the individual craving it, and his heirs, then of course he is entitled to reserve, and to reserve with effect, his right to claim the ordinary composition when the succession opens to a stranger substitute. And in regard to the composition, the Act 1685, authorising entails, has just as little effect against the superior, as the imposition of fetters in terms of that Statute could have in creating a claim for a composition to which he was otherwise not entitled. If, in the case of an unfettered investiture, the superior was entitled to stipulate that each stranger substitute to whom the succession opened, should be dealt with by him as a singular successor, that legal right is sufficiently protected by the general reservation in the Statute, of all rights of superiority.

"The question, then, truly comes to be simply this, whether a superior is absolutely bound to renew an investiture in the case of a vassal in possession, or to grant a charter to a singular successor, on payment of a year's rent, not merely in favour of the heirs of the party applying, but in favour of any given number of substitutions which the party so applying chooses to insert, or whether the superior, though admitting these substitutions into the Investiture at the requisition of the vassal, and thus enabling them, in form, to take as heirs, is not fairly entitled to stipulate that, quoad him, they shall be dealt with, as they substantially are, as stranger dispoonees.

"But it does not appear to me that there is authority for the affirmative of the first proposition. It is undeniable that the obligations of superiors in this matter, are the creatures of Statute. The whole of the Statutes, from the Act 1469, c. 36, regarding the entry of appraisers, to the 20th Geo. II., relating to singular successors, are limited to the entry of the appraiser, or adjudger, or purchaser. They were passed for the sole purpose of compelling the superior to admit a stranger vassal, which, at common law, he was not bound to do. No doubt, as the subject of the right was heritable, the entry of such appraiser, adjudger, or purchaser, necessarily implied the descent of that right to his heirs, so that the obligations of the superior to enter the first acquirer, necessarily included the obligation to enter the heirs of such acquirer as the heirs of the new investiture. In strictness this was applicable only to the heirs-at-law of the vassal, but in practice, the particular class of the general body of heirs to whom the original right was to devolve, seems to have been left to the option of the vassal; and accordingly, in the case of the Duke of Hamilton against the Earl of Hopetoun, it is laid down in the opinion of the majority of the Court, that the vassal, in getting the entry, 'may name heirs of law simply, or heirs-male, whom failing, heirs-female, or any other arrangement of the body of his heirs-at-law.' But that is stated under the qualification immediately preceding,—'he shall not go beyond his heirs-at-law to strangers.'

"I cannot doubt that this was the deliberate opinion of the Judges who expressed it—and the distinction seems to be well founded. Strictly speaking, indeed, the only right of succession necessarily implied in the right of the original vassal, is that of his heirs-at-law. But every person who takes as heir, whether heir of line, heir-male, or heir-female—every person, in short, who takes under a character admitting of being established by general service, may be said to take in right of the original vassal. The character, at least, in which he takes, is the act of law, not of the original vassal. On the other hand, a substitute who is called in none of these characters, is truly nothing but a dispoonee. Not only his right, but the character in which he takes the right, is the pure act of the dispooner.

"It is true the superior may have in general very little interest to object to such an extension of the destination, particularly when it is unfettered: because, in such circumstances, the probability of alienation, with its attendant benefit of a composition, is rather increased than diminished by it. But in many cases easily supposable, a superior may have a very clear interest. For instance, in the case of a purchaser who has no family, and beyond the age admitting the probability that he ever shall have any, or an entered vassal in the same situation,—could the one demand an entry, or the other resign for new investment in favour of himself and the heirs of his body, whom failing, an entire stranger? Could a superior be bound to grant such an entry without a reservation of his rights? and would not that reservation entitle him to demand the composition on the estate devolving on the substitute, nominally called as heir, but quoad the superior, and in every fair view of the case, nothing but the dispoonee of the vassal? I think these questions would be answered in favour of the superior, and the contrary pretensions on the part of the vassal, in such circumstances, would neither be supported by the Statutes, nor, as I understand, by any usage which has followed on them. Indeed, the principle necessarily involved in the argument for the defender, carries the matter still farther. In these cases it is supposed that the entry may have been demanded, in form at least, in favour of the heirs of the vassal himself, whom failing, the substitute; but that argument would be equally good, although the heirs were left out, and the entry demanded in favour of the vassal, and failing him by death, whether leaving heirs or not, to a stranger. For the argument of the defender necessarily involves the proposition, not only that the heir of investiture shall take without paying composition, but that any individual or number of individuals, can be rendered heirs of investiture, entitled to that benefit, by the mere act of the vassal himself, or, which comes to the same thing, by an act of the vassal which the superior is compelled to give effect to.

"Now, it does appear to me that this view cannot be supported,—and that, on the contrary, the rights of these parties fairly extricated according to the other principle, namely, that although the vassal claiming the entry may have an interest, and has the right particularly under the Statute 1685, to create any number of substitutions, and thus to render the parties so called, in form, the heirs of investiture quoad the form of succession, still the superior has as clearly an interest and a right to stipulate, that in relation to him, the substitutes shall be treated in their character of dispoonees, taking by the pure act of the vassal himself, directly operating at each successive opening of a new substitution. For it appears to me, that in regard to the superior, each successive substitution can be considered in no other light than a dispositive act of the original vassal, postponed and contingent indeed, but still his dispositive act, operating as a conveyance to a stranger, on each occasion when the contingency is realised.

"While I conceive this to be the sound construction in principle of the conflicting rights of superior and vassal in this matter, I am not aware that it is contradicted by any practice or authority. The decided cases, with the exception of that of Lockhart, which must be considered as superseded, leave the question entirely open. In fact the reservations authorised in the cases of M'Kenzie and the Duke of Argyll, were intended for no other purpose than that of saving it. The Act 1685 is equally inconclusive. The sole purpose of that Statute was to enable parties to secure the descent of their lands to any extent of substitution, by clauses preventing alienation, adjudication, or alteration of the order of succession. It expressly reserved the rights of superiors; and the most conclusive inference against the supposition of any contemplated interference with the rights of superiors, is afforded by the consideration, that at the time of its being passed, superiors were under no direct obligation to alter existing investitures at all—it could only be done by the circuitous form of adjudication; in all which particulars the rights of superiors were left untouched until the Act 20 Geo. II.

“With regard to the passage in Stair (B. II. t. 3, § 43), it is so obscurely expressed, that I do not think that it affords any very conclusive authority, or even any clear indication of the author's own opinion upon the point now under discussion. And indeed, if it has any bearing upon the point at all, I think it affords an authority in favour of the pursuer. At the time when it was written, the superior could not be called upon to alter the existing investiture without his consent. The object was to be obtained only indirectly by means of an appraisement or adjudication. After stating this, the passage proceeds:—‘So neither in that case is he obliged to constitute a tailzie, but only to receive the appraiser or the adjudger and their heirs whatsoever; unless the debt and decree whereupon the same proceeded, be conceived in favour of heirs of tailzie, in which case the appraising or adjudication, and infeftment thereupon, must be conform, unless it be otherwise by the consent of parties.’ Here it certainly appears to be implied, that if the debt and decree be conceived in favour of heirs of tailzie, the infeftments must be conform, i. e., granted to the same series of heirs. But this opinion is qualified by what follows—‘at least, if the appraiser or adjudger crave the infeftment to himself and the heirs of tailzie, the superior ought not to refuse it; for, the appraising or adjudication being assigned to a stranger, he behoved to be infeft, much more the alteration of heirs is allowable.’ It rather appears to me that in this passage, the author was considering the question, whether the superior could be compelled on any terms to receive heirs of tailzie through the means of adjudication—whether, in short, the superior could effectually stand out against admitting, on any terms, any heirs excepting the heirs of the adjudger. This question, put in the last form, he decides in the negative, but without taking into view the other question which arises here, viz., the particular terms on which the demand could be enforced against the superior. The opinion, such as it is, is given with great hesitation, ‘at least, if the appraiser or adjudger crave the infeftment to himself and the heirs of tailzie, the superior ought not to refuse it.’ But it is important to look at the reason given for this opinion, ‘for the appraising or adjudication being assigned to a stranger, he behoved to be infeft, much more the alteration of heirs is allowable.’ Here the opinion, that the superior ‘ought not to refuse’ the admission of heirs of tailzie, is rested on the ground, that if the appraising or adjudication were assigned, it ‘behooved’ the superior to admit the assignee. And the reason is perhaps satisfactory, in so far as regards the matter of the admission of heirs of tailzie; but, on the other hand, it seems to me to imply that the superior, though obliged to admit the assignees of adjudgers, and by analogy, the heir of tailzie was only obliged to admit the latter, on the terms which he was entitled to from the former, viz., the ordinary composition. The passage, though certainly not very clearly expressed, seems to mean no more than this, that as the superior was obliged to admit assignees of the adjudication, so he could have no reasonable ground for refusing to admit heirs of tailzie, i. e., heirs different from the heir whatsoever; an inference or analogy which could only be true, on the supposition, that in regard to the interests of the superior, the heirs of tailzie and assignees were to be dealt with on the same terms. If this be the true construction of the passage, it is evidently an authority not in favour of, but against the argument of the defenders. When so construed, it coincides exactly with the view which appears to me the correct one, viz., that although the superior is obliged to admit substitutes, as he is obliged to admit singular successors, he is obliged so to admit them only, because he is entitled, if he pleases, to affix the same terms to their admission (Lib. VI. t. 6, § 7). According to this view, the superior—to use the very appropriate expression of Stair—‘ought not to refuse’ because in reality he has no legal interest to object. Being obliged to admit singular successors on payment of the composition, he cannot be permitted to refuse any number of substitutions, if each substitute, not an heir by blood of the predecessor, is to be held quoad him as a singular successor, taking by virtue of the dispositive act of the original vassal.

“As to the passage from Erskine, the opinion there given in such broad terms, rests entirely on the case of Lockhart there referred to, which, since the late decisions in the cases of M’Kenzie and the Duke of Argyle, can no longer be considered as an authority.”

At advising of this date,

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The great difference of opinion in the Court on this question of feudal law, and the importance of that question, involving great pecuniary consequences to such an extensive class of persons, rendering it, perhaps, a matter of as wide application as any question which was ever stirred, will account for the anxiety with which I approach the point awaiting judgment, although it is one in which my opinions have been long matured. It is very necessary to consider the question on strict feudal principles, else we might do great injustice to a class of rights just as much legal property of the highest kind as the rights of vassals. But in examining what the feudal principles are which should govern judgment, I cannot concur in a remark in one of the opinions before us, that the relation of superior and vassal has received no modification whatever, except from the direct and immediate operation of special Statute.

The defender has raised an objection to the summons as not the proper action to try the question. In the case of Lord Hopetoun, the objection was stated in reply to an argument that the general precept granted by the Duke of Hamilton had been unwarrantably and incompetently used by one not entitled to the benefit of it; and in that case the consulted Judges held the reply to be good, viz., that in an action of non-entry, calling the party who is the heir under the existing investiture, completed by a precept granted by the superior, and the infeftment following on it, the superior cannot say to the heir that the infeftment was inept under which he calls on him to enter. He ought to disregard the infeftment, or reduce it if he held it to be bad. But as it is not disputed by the superior in this case, that the investiture containing the destination in question was correctly made up, the declarator of non-entry is a competent, and, I think, the proper action to try the question, on what terms the entry is to be given.

I may also say, that I cannot enter into the argument founded on a misapprehension of the ground of decision in the case of Lockhart v. Denham, viz., that the reservation is not sufficient to preserve the claim of the superior, if he could have originally refused to sanction the destination which the vassal's procuratory contained. There is a somewhat metaphysical argument stated, to the effect that the reservation necessarily merges, and is absorbed in the sanction of the investiture, so that the defender can plead the very charter containing the new grant against the superior's reservation, which qualifies it as to this matter. But I am of opinion, that the reservation keeps the question completely open, if the claim is well founded, and that this argument rests on a misapprehension of the ground of judgment in Lockhart. Whether such a claim is consistent with the character of heir which the investiture bestows on the parties called by the substitution of heirs of provision, is another question. But I do concur with the defender in the complaint, that there is considerable vagueness and obscurity as to the precise plea which the pursuer means to maintain. His plea on the record seems to be intentionally as general and obscure as it could be stated. It is, ‘that, in the circumstances condescended on, the pursuers, as superiors, are not bound to give an entry to the defender as their vassal, except on the condition of his making payment of the usual composition of a year's rent of the lands; and as he has refused to pay that composition, they are entitled to decree against him in terms of the conclusions of the summons.’ Now, one of the ‘circumstances’ prominently stated in the condescendence is, that the vassal's deed contained the prohibitions and fencing clauses of a strict entail, prohibiting sale or alteration of the order of succession. But still I must take this plea to be that contained in the reservation of the charter, which granted warrant for infeftment on that deed:—‘Saving always our own right, and the right of every other person as accords, and declaring that, by granting these presents, we shall not exclude ourselves, or our heirs and successors, from any claim which we or they may have at law to a full year's rent of the lands herein contained, whenever the heirs of entail to whom the succession shall open, shall happen not to be the heir of line of the person who was last entered and infeft by us or our forefathers.' This plea is not rested on the ground that the destination is protected by the clauses of a strict entail. To enforce that plea, I understand the argument to be directed; and although there is manifestly an attempt in various passages to derive benefit somehow from the fact that this deed contains an entail, yet the claim truly is founded on the destination not being to the heirs of line of the last vassal entered by the superior. There is no other plea avowedly stated in the case. (See p. 29 and p. 31). The same is truly the ground taken in the opinions of Lords Mackenzie, Jeffrey and Fullerton, which necessarily extend the claim against every heir of provision not being an heir-at-law, without any reference to the fact that he is called in an entail. I hold it to be quite essential to settle clearly in the mind, that the question at issue in no respect whatever depends upon, or ought to be affected by, the fact, that the destination is protected by the clauses of a strict entail. In all the cases, except those of Lord Hopetoun's and Lockhart's, it is manifest that the views stated by the Court, or a portion of them, were much more affected by mixing up these two matters, wholly distinct, than they were themselves aware. A great portion of the pursuer's reasoning is founded on the alleged encroachment on, or injury to, the superior's rights, caused by the prohibitions of an entail, and by the loss, as it is said, of the benefit to the superior of alienation, of that very act which originally was considered a fault against the superior of the vassal.

I humbly conceive, that the prohibitions against alienation or alteration cannot in any logical or legal manner affect the question, and that the question is precisely the same as if it had occurred under an ordinary simple destination, or when such was first presented to the superior, a view of the case which, often as it occurs, has never yet been mooted by any superior. True, the motive of the superior may be stronger to try the question in the one case than the other, because the fee-simple destination, if not in favour of heirs of line, will infallibly be altered wherever the vassal has only heirs-female, and not heirs-male of his body. But, in principle, the question is, in my opinion, the same in both cases.

A great point, however, is made when this is distinctly brought out and kept in view, not merely in avoiding the risk of undue impression on the mind from matter not relevant to the inquiry, but still more from the legal view opened up as to the rights of superior and vassal, when the proper effect of the Act 1685 is considered. To the effect of that Statute on the present question, I must particularly invite the attention of your Lordships, for I own I have ever thought that its operation has not received in this question the consideration due to it. The pursuer's plea is, that, by the common law of Scotland, he can claim a composition from every party who is not the heir of line—of line, be it observed, under his clause—of the person last entered as vassal by the superior under the existing investiture. That, he says, is and always was the law—the law as to every heir of provision, not being the heir of line—long before entails were introduced, and continued, and preserved under the system of entails;—the law, therefore, equally as to a common destination, or tailzied destination. Then, observe, the Statute expressly gives the lieges power to substitute heirs in their lands by tailzies, and to enforce and perfect them. What is the meaning of the power so granted? It is to substitute heirs, granted without any limitation; and all those substitutes are called by the Statute heirs, and must be held to be heirs, as your Lordships were all satisfied in the case of Anstruther v. A. The substitution of other heirs than the heirs of line could not be overlooked. That it would be absurd to suppose. Entails originated in the preference of other heirs over heirs of line. The term tailzie is derived from the usual and common effect of all such entails, though, doubtless, the direct succession might also be often fenced. Hence, the Statute was necessarily framed with reference to the selection of parties by the lieges to be their heirs. It has been said by high authority, in the case of the Duke of Hamilton v. Baillie, that the Statute is throughout very ill framed. I venture to differ from that remark. I think the Statute is most skilfully drawn for all the objects in view, if attention is paid to its terms rather than to preconceived theories, which are attempted to be supported by it. But, at all events, so plain a matter as the frequent substitution of others than the heirs of line could not be overlooked in framing it.

Let us follow the power given to its consequences. Either superiors had, before that Statute, the right to refuse to enter any heirs other than heirs of line—to reject heirs-male for instance—or they had not. If such was the right of superiors before that Statute, did it remain after that Statute? The power given to substitute heirs is unqualified—co-extensive with the right to lands. Opposition by the superior is neither alluded to nor reserved. Accordingly, on this part of the Statute the superior founds no argument. Any plea he makes on the Statute is founded on the special clause of reservation of certain rights at the end of the Statute. What that reservation imports, we shall afterwards consider; but, at all events, the very plea founded on the reservation admits that the power to substitute heirs is given even against superiors (if they had any right inconsistent with it), though it is said that their interests are protected by the clause of reservation. But is not the Statute very important evidence as to the common law respecting the substitution of heirs? I believe the preservation of the rights of superiors in 1685 was just as great an object as any desire to legalize entails. Rights of superiority were regarded as the most valuable species of property. Feu-duties were thought the best income, as they could not fall in value. The various dues paid were sums of ready money when money was scarce, reckoned of great value; and, accordingly, we know that the great lawyers of that and the former generation were very fond of the acquisition of superiorities. Great political influence arose from the possession of such, and any encroachment on the rights of superiors, I believe, never was contemplated or intended by the Legislature. This remark requires, no doubt, full effect to be given to the clause of reservation, so far as its terms can go. I regard the Statute as important evidence of the common law of Scotland as then understood. If, however, the superior had the right contended for before that Act, then it made, ex concessio a most sweeping change, whatever is the practical benefit of the reservation.

What is the fair meaning of the leading provision of the Statute? That it shall be lawful to the lieges to 'tailzie their lands, and to substitute heirs in their tailzies.' It is admitted as the condition of the argument, as I before stated, that the superior cannot object to the prohibitions and fencing clauses of an entail, and that the Statute does not protect him as to that matter. Is that a loss to him? It is said to be so. That is stated in the close of the able note of the Lord Ordinary in Duke of Hamilton v. Baillie, and it is thought that it was only an oversight that the superior's right was not protected from the loss of benefit by alienations. I incline to differ, 1st, because I do not believe that the high aristocratic Parliament which passed the Act 1685, would have touched on so plain a point as the rights of superiors, which they all held as important parts of their own rights; and 2d, because I am satisfied that, on feudal principles, the superior never could have objected to his own grant to the vassal and the heirs called (who they could be is another question), being protected from alteration and alienation. On the contrary, I hold the prohibitions and fencing clauses of an entail to be exactly in conformity with the strictest principles as to the relation of superior and vassal, precisely because it secured the continuance of the grant to the vassal and the heirs called. The decision in the case of Hill, and the old case as to corporations, does not rest on the ground that the superior must receive compensation for losing the chance of alienation; but (see opinions in Hill) because a corporation cannot be a vassal in the proper sense of the term—there being no succession of heirs,—and hence the ordinary course of feudal tenure and the leading casualty of relief could not obtain. I regard, then, the right to tailzie lands as unqualified and absolute, so far as the superior is concerned, and that there either had not existed, or was not left, the right to object to the perpetuation of the estate in the heirs called. But if that was the law on this point, either under common law or under this Statute, observe the great importance of this fact, (viz., that the fetters of the entail cannot be objected to,) on the next part of the clause, viz., declaring that the lieges, in making tailzies of their lands, may substitute heirs in their tailzies. If the perpetuation of any one line of succession—if prohibitions against sale and alteration—cannot be objected to by superiors, then how very different the interest to object to the selection of one set of heirs rather than another. Whatever the order is, it may be completely fenced, and all benefit from change wholly excluded, so long as these heirs do not fail; and the case of the Duke of Hamilton and Lord Hoptoun has settled that the vassal may call his legal heirs in any order and way he chooses, protecting their succession by the clauses of an entail. But, again, what is there to lead one to suppose that this second and very important, nay, necessary part of the clause, is less general and unqualified than the former—"may substitute heirs in their tailzies?" This is put as co-exclusive with the right to tailzie lands. It is declared to be the right of all the subjects of the country. All these substitutes are made and declared to be heirs—heirs in every sense of the word—all equal heirs by force of the nomination in the tailzie; and no distinction is pointed at as to the separate character of legal relations or not. I see one opinion declares that all heirs of provision, if they have no other and additional character, viz., that of blood relationship, are dispoonees or singular successors on feudal principles.—(His Lordship referred to the opinion of Lord Jeffrey, supra.)—I hold just the reverse. I hold that the heir of provision is the character to which feudal law looks, and no other; that any other and additional character which the party possesses is of no moment, and never looked to, and is altogether irrelevant; that if the party is the heir of the grant or investiture, his right and character as such is exactly the same, whether he is a stranger in blood or the eldest son. Indeed it is entirely new to me to hear, that in a question with the superior, there is any other character looked to than that of the heir of the investiture, or that one heir of the investiture is, in respect of the quality of blood relationship, by which he is not called at all, the proper heir, and all others in that investiture singular successors. And under this Statute, and after the opinions in the case of Anstruther as to collation, I cannot understand how that proposition can be maintained; and accordingly, in the opinion by Lord Fullerton, he, in the very outset, most anxiously disclaims that view. But, then, his Lordship's opinion in two passages, the foot of p. 20 and top of p. 22, lays down the very same point, though differently expressed, where it is said that every substitute who has not in law a character of heir which he could have established by service, independent of the deed, is a dispoonee. But whatever might be held as to this point on general speculation, surely any such notion is utterly banished out of this case in the most complete manner by the Statute 1685, which enables the vassal to put all substitutes on the same footing as heirs, whatever claim may be reserved to superiors. Now, when it is said that parties may substitute heirs in their tailzies, is that, or is it not, a power to make them heirs—heirs of investiture—heirs in every sense of the term? That cannot be disputed, and is not disputed by the pursuer; for his plea is, that while that is the undoubted effect of the Act 1685, the reservation at the close of it reserves the claim of the superior exactly as if they were not made heirs. But before the object and effect of the reservation can be adequately considered, we must settle what is the legal import and operation of the provision that the lieges may substitute heirs in their tailzies, and, having settled that, must give full effect to it consistently and steadily—recollecting that the plea on the clause of reservation admits of necessity the force of this first provision. I am humbly of opinion, that by that provision the holders of all property obtained, if they had it not before, or now possess, a right to substitute any heirs they choose in their tailzies, and that all substitutes are legally heirs of investiture—heirs in every sense of the term—to the party making the tailzie. The more the object and meaning of this part of the Statute is considered, the more clearly does this appear to be the necessary result of this provision. That this is any change in the law, or that a vassal could previously have been refused an investiture to any set of persons whom he chose to name as his heirs, I am far from holding. But whether the law was so or not, it appears to me to be the undoubted operation of the Act 1685, that all persons substituted in any tailzie, or destination of an estate, are heirs, in every sense of the term, to the entailer—heirs also to the person last infeft—but without, by Statute, the consequence of representation, whatever benefit or right may be reserved to superiors by any after clause.

What, then, is the import of the reservation? It is as follows:
SCOTTISH JURIST.

lows: "It is farther declared, that nothing in this Act shall prejudice his Majesty as to confiscations or other fines, as the punishment of crimes—or his Majesty, or any other lawful superior, of the casualties of superiority which may arise to them out of the tailzied estate; but these fines and casualties shall import no contravention of the irritant clause." The words are very peculiar. It seems to me to be very clear, that the reservation is to secure the payment of all casualties out of the estate, if not paid by the individual, and that such shall not be held debts included in the prohibition and clauses authorised by the Act, for the purpose of protecting the estate against debts. To that object I think the clause is confined. It might have been contended that the casualties of superiors arising out of the estate, being also debts of the vassal, could no longer be enforced against the estate, which was protected against all debts; and hence, for that object, to preserve the superior's rights and the protecting clauses of the tailzie, I think the reservation was introduced. Of course, taking that view, I cannot concur in the explanation given of this clause by Lord Cunningham. The pursuer's argument on this clause is founded on three views—1st, That superiors had the right previously to refuse to receive as heirs any whom the vassal chose to name; and hence that the right to demand a composition, as from a singular successor, was to be reserved: 2d, That the composition for the entry of a singular successor is a casualty of superiority: 3d, That by the above clause, a distinction, undefined indeed but fundamental, was intended to be drawn by implication between one class of substitutes and another, viz., those who are also heirs-at-law, and those who are not—a distinction of which, certainly, there is no other trace or indication in the Statute, and which is only obtained by guess out of this reservation. These three views are all essential to the plea founded on this reservation. The pursuer's argument on this clause, I must repeat, admits that the Statute gave the subjects right to destine their lands in any way they choose, and to name or substitute heirs to themselves. That is admitted in the plea founded on the reservation; and hence it follows, that if the reservation has not the effect contended for, in drawing such a remarkable and singular distinction between the substitutes of an entail, the pursuer's claim wholly fails.

In the first place, I hold it to be quite clear that the composition demandable on the entry of a singular successor is not a casualty of superiority, and cannot, by any use of legal phraseology that is at all correct, be included within these casualties. The casualties of superiority are enumerated by the text-writers. They existed long before the Act 1469, c. 36. That Act introduced the year's rent as a compensation for the loss of the existing vassal, and the introduction of a new party into the fee. But such a compensation is not a casualty arising out of the estate—was never enumerated or accounted among the casualties of superiority, whatever looseness there may be in modern language on the subject; and in 1685, before the Act of Geo. II., could not have been used with reference to the obligation on superiors to receive singular successors on payment of a certain fee, for such obligation, generally speaking, did not then exist. There was no general right on the part of the singular successors, taking by procuratory, to demand entry on payment of a composition. Hence, if the heir of entail could not claim entry as heir under the first part of the Statute, he could not obtain an entry inuito domino at all. But the reservation of the casualties, if he is heir, cannot apply to him, for the composition has no reference to him. This is the meaning of President Dundas's remark as to existing casualties in Hailes's notes of the case of M'Kenzie. Accordingly, from the time that superiors first wished to raise the question under the Act 1685, as to their claim in the event of an heir of entail not being heir of line, the composition has never been acknowledged to be a casualty in any of the cases. This appears remarkably from the terms of the charter in the Westshiel case in 1720. See Session Papers reprinted in Lord Hoptoun (the casualties are first reserved, and then the claim for a year's rent). Accordingly, in the case of Lockhart, one ground firmly taken by that great lawyer, Sir Thomas Miller, is, that the composition on entering a singular successor was not a casualty of superiority, but a separate right not arising out of the relation of superior and vassal, but given by Statute as a compensation for an invasion of that right; while the superior's counsel tried to make out that the composition was the casualty of relief. The composition is not debitum fundi; the superior can neither enter into possession nor poid for it. It is only a personal claim. The clause of reservation, on the contrary, clearly is intended to save to the superior, as debts against which the estate was not to be protected by the entail, the proper casualties arising out of the tailzied estate. This is clearly the view taken of the matter by the annotator on Stair, and was the foundation of the judgment in the case of Lockhart.

At page 35 of the pursuer's case, it is broadly stated that Stair and all the authorities class composition among the casualties of superiority. This is a great mistake. I observed that, curiously enough, no particular passages are given in the reference either to Stair, Erskine or Bankton, but whole titles are referred to. And, accordingly, on examining these titles, all that can be said is, that composition is treated of by Stair and Bankton in the same long title, which also includes and treats of, but separately, the casualties of superiority. In Erskine it is not treated of at all in the title referred to. I was much astonished at the reference to Stair, knowing that title, the 4th of the 2d Book, most intimately. The examination of it leads necessarily to the very opposite result. Like every other part of that most methodical and systematic writer, the title must be considered attentively with reference to its plan. It commences, first, with the superior's own right of superiority, the proof thereof, and certain limitations thereof; then as to the relative position of the vassal, the effect of subinfeudation, and the duties of the vassal under the reddendo. Then it treats of the change of the vassal, and of the mode in which an entry may be forced upon the superior, at that time limited more than Lord Stair wished. And after having shown how a stranger may get an entry upon payment of the composition of a year's rent, the title then proceeds to take up the relative position of superior and vassal, after a vassal has been received, and in reference exclusively and solely to the entered vassal and his heirs. This distinct and separate portion of the title begins at section 18, and Lord Stair then treats of the proper casualties of superiority due by the entered vassal or his heirs. Then are all these specially treated of; and first, "of the most common casualty of superiority," non-entry, its remedies and its consequences; under which, in title 24, he explains the general declarator of non-entry for neglect, and the special declarator for contempt, and this is wholly applicable to the heirs of entered vassals, giving right to the retoured duties or to the full duties, according to circumstances. Then the relief is treated of, or, as he says, immediately subjoined to non-entry, being due to the superior by the vassal for entering him in the fee as the lawful successor of the vassal. Then, in section 32, he mentions what it is to be paid under the statutory composition, and points out how it differs from relief in several particulars. Then he resumes the casualties, and goes through them, and in no place does he ever confound the composition with the casualties. This might have been expected in so accurate and clear a writer,—the casualties being the rights arising by common law out of the relation of superior and vassal,—composition being, as its term imports, a bonus or compensation to the superior for being obliged to do something directly against the original rights of superior and vassal, by an infringement of the same introduced by Statute. In no one passage is the composition ever called a casualty or enumerated. The very same remarks may be made on the corresponding title, B. II. tit. 4, of Bankton, written on a more methodical plan than usual, and plainly on the model of Lord Stair's title. There is one passage in which the composition seems to be called a casualty in the sixth paragraph; but this is obviously loosely used, for he has a separate section in that title, beginning at article 13, with a distinct heading of the casualty of non-entry, another of relief; under which he certainly treats of composition, but in such a way as to show, that as it comes in place of relief, so it differs widely from the same; and he never terms it directly a casualty, though he specially calls the relief a casualty. He mentions the remarkable distinction, that the adjudger cannot be excluded from possession till he pay a composition and enter. The title of Erskine, B. II. tit. 5, is still more distinct. The casualties beginning at the 5th section are all separately treated of in reference to the original and proper relation of superior and vassal, including recognition; and he then resumes the enumeration of them, as modelled by our customs, in the 29th section, viz., non-entry, relief, disclamation, purpresture, and liferent escheat. I particularly refer to the very accurate and distinct sections on non-entry and relief, perhaps the very best of Mr Erskine's work. Take the definition of non-entry in the 29th section, as well as the full explanation of it, into the 46th, inclusive. Take the definition of relief in the 47th section, and the explanations of it on to the 50th, inclusive, and it will be found, that under neither of these is there a word which brings in, as a casualty, the composition. Nay, with such rigid accuracy and propriety does Mr Erskine limit himself to the casualties, when treating of these, that even under the section which mentions that the casualty of non-entry is excluded if sasine has been once given to a corporation, he does not allude to any arrangement as the condition of receiving them. Then he finishes the whole subject of casualties, and the composition is never mentioned at all. Accordingly, in the 6th title, Mr Erskine begins separately to consider of the right which the vassal acquires by getting the feu, and of the extent and import of the grant made to him; then of the protection to his tenants; after which, forgetting rather his object, he wanders into the relative rights of landlord and vassal, which are treated of plainly out of place in the remainder of this title. Then, in the 7th section, he resumes the subject of the rights which the vassal acquires by getting the feu, and treats of the transmission of the right; and it is under this separate subject, and in a totally different title, that he treats of the question of composition, and of the effect of the Act 1685. What the pursuer means, then, by the positive reference to the 5th title of the 7th Book of Erskine, I really cannot understand; for that title is wholly framed upon a plan which utterly excludes composition from the very notion of being a casualty—is limited exclusively to the old casualties,—and in that title composition is not mentioned; while, on the other hand, the manner in which it is introduced in a subsequent title draws the distinction even more distinctly than Lord Stair. I have stated my views on this point fully; for I have always held, that if the composition is not a casualty—was not so held in 1685—then the claim of the superior, excluded by the first part of the Statute, and not saved by the reservation, is clearly repugnant to the enactments of that Statute. In the second place, I apprehend that the clause is not such as would have been introduced if the object had been that for which the pursuer contends. I think that the clause would have expressly referred to the case of the heir of tailzie not being an heir-at-law, considering that the former part of the Statute bestowed the character of heir equally on all substitutes; and I do not think we are warranted to hold that so plain and important a limitation on the power given to substitute heirs was to be left to implication, and implication also out of a clause which, in its obvious purpose, has reference to the effects of the protection of the estate against debts, if the casualties of superiorities had not been specially mentioned. The object of the clause is, on that view, clearly satisfied and exhausted. In the view, then, which I take of this question, I think it is decided by the operation of the Act 1685.

In this view of the matter I am confirmed by a careful examination of the case of Lockhart, which, at all events, I regard as a decision on the point, and a decision of the highest authority, pronounced, as President Dundas says (Lord Advocate, and in the highest practice at its date,) with great unanimity in the notes by Hailes of the case of M'Kenzie. That decision was understood at the time to decide the question. Erskine, the professor of Scots law, says so expressly. Mr Erskine's authority is not confined to the passage noticed by Lord Fullerton, (though it certainly is not the less authoritative that it rests on a decision of the Court.) He gives his opinion distinctly in the 6th section of 7th title of book 2, on the general point as to the effect of the Act 1685, to the same purport; and then, in a separate passage, he mentions the case of Lockhart as a clear authority on the point, that a substitute has all the rights of the character of heir.

The decision, then, was held to be of great and direct atthority at the time. It is said in one of the opinions, that this decision has been declared by the Court since not to be good authority. I know not where it was so declared. The point was again mooted in M'Kenzie. But in that case the vassal expressly said, as he was not a stranger, "the superior (I quote the words of his paper) was welcome to a claim of reservation;" and, on Lord Braxfield's suggestion, that was adopted,—one Judge only, by Hailes's notes, not questioning the authority of the case of Lockhart, (for, in Covington's first opinion, he agrees with it), but saying that one decision, to be sure, will not make law, so as to bar reconsideration of the point. Again, in the case of the Duke of Argyle, the vassal offered expressly a clause of reservation, not being the party struck at by the claim. These two cases do not in any degree appear to me to invalidate Lockhart v. Denham. They only show what harm is done by attempts to avoid the decision of a point when once raised. But what is the pursuer's claim? It is, that every heir of tailzie must pay who is not heir of line. The case of Lord Hopetoun, as I understand, lays down expressly at least this, that the superior has no such right, and that an heir-male must be entered, though there are numerous heirs of line excluded altogether or postponed. Hence the plea fails to the extent stated, and to the extent of the reservation in the charter. But if there is any principle at all in the point, the claim ought not to be made applicable to the heir of line of the vassal last entered, but to a party not the heir of the investiture prior to the tailzie. This was the way the reservation was put in M'Kenzie v. M. by the express terms of the judgment,—(Mor. Dy. 15,053),—a very remarkable fact not sufficiently noticed. But this is a wholly different point altogether. Such a reservation raises the question, whether the superior can be obliged to receive a new set of heirs, even of the body, e. g. heirs-male, if heirs of line were heirs by the prior investiture, or goes on some notion of the loss of compositions by the prohibitions against sales? The reservation, again, in the case of the Duke of Argyle, was directed to the succession of a party who was not heir of line to the person last entered and infeft. These two reservations are accordingly different, and would depend on totally different views of the law. No two views can be more different. The cases were arranged in a way to save the discussion of the question. But if the Court is thought to have taken in each the view of the subject in which the terms of the several reservations point, then it is plain that the views were fundamentally different; yet these two cases are always mentioned as going on the same ground. I hold that the Court gave no opinion in either. The pursuer has chosen the latter form of reservation. Then he must maintain, contrary to my view of the Statute 1685, that he can deny to certain classes of substitutes named by the entail, and in the investiture, the character of heir. That is the true meaning of the ratio of the Court in the case of Lockhart; for no heir of provision can be a singular successor. And here I must observe, that great weight is due to an argument in the able paper for the vassal (Sir J. Denham v. Lockhart), by Sir Thomas Miller, to this effect. This question does not occur in an original grant of feu. If a superior, when he first separates out his estate by feuing, shall stipulate that every heir of entail, to be afterwards appointed, shall enter as a singular successor, that, as a part of the superior's property reserved by the original contract first feuing out the land, might be effectual as much as a clause tripling the feu-duty, or stipulating for two years' rent on the entry of every singular successor and the like, on the ground of being an express compact, by which alone the feu was ever separated from the dominium directum. But when a feu is once granted without any such matter of special contract and condition, not so restrained by any condition when the feu is created, and a vassal exercises his power to substitute heirs in his tailzie, is a substitute in a deed of provision so executed by a vassal, not an heir, as much as if the grant had been first to A, without mention of heirs, and an entry had been claimed by the heir of line? I own, in that distinction taken by Sir T. Miller, I think there is great weight.

Holding that the question in no degree depends on the claim for entry being by a substitute under a strict entail, in respect of the operation of the fetters, the next point is, what, then, is really the pursuer's plea? I apprehend it comes to this, that every heir of provision (no matter under what deed) who is not heir of line, is a singular successor. No doubt, the question has been raised in cases of entail, because the motive and interest of the superior is greater in bringing forward the claim in cases of entail; and some advantage is supposed to be derived to the superior from the alleged hardship to him of the entail. But the claim is equally applicable to every heir of provision. On that view of the case, it is now admitted that an heir-male is not a singular successor, according to the unanimous decision in Hopetoun. It is said that, in the opinion of the consulted Judges in that case, the Court held as a ground of judgment that the vassal's power of nomination and selection extended only to heirs-at-law. Two of the Judges who signed that opinion entirely disclaim any such view, and so, I understand, does one of your Lordships. Again, if that expression in the opinion was deliberately considered by all as an opinion on the limitation of the vassal's power of nomination, I have three remarks to make,—1st, It was entirely obiter, for it was in no degree necessary for the case of Lord Hopetoun, who was only an heir-male of the body either of the first vassal, or of the assignee before infeftment; 2d, The parties did not understand the opinions to imply, of necessity, that every substitute who was not heir-at-law must pay a composition; for all that the Duke of Hamilton (after the decision) asked in the Outer-House, was a clause of reservation, which was also to reserve all objection to the claim, if ever made against a stranger; and 3d, The passages in the opinion in Lord Hopetoun are, with deference, very unfortunately expressed, if intended to be a definition, as it is now said, of the law; for it is not stated whether the limitation of the vassal's power of nomination is confined to selection among the heirs of the body, or among all heirs-at-law, however remote. The opinion speaks of his heirs-at-law generally, or natural heirs. That would seem to apply to all relatives by affinity. Well, then, how far does it go? May a man call his brother before his sons or his daughters, or a hundredth cousin living, say the chief of a clan, before his daughters or his sons? or (to take the Seaforth entail) "call the descendant of Colin Fitzgerald, my progenitor, who lived in the reign of Alexander the Third," before his sons and daughters. The opinion, which is now said to be a definition ex proposito of the law, really leaves the matter as to heirs-at-law wholly loose; or, if it is intended to mean all his heirs-at-law, and any order among them he chooses, then it must go to the length that a twentieth cousin or hundredth, may be called in before a man's own sons and daughters. I own I do not know what was intended to be in view by that alleged definition; neither do any of the three Judges, who allude to this point, explain this, unless it be Lord Fullerton, p. 20, who seems to go the length I have now stated. But on what ground can it be truly held that the superior cannot object (laying aside the Act 1685) to the entry, say of a fiftieth cousin, in preference to a son or daughter? Is that party not in substance a complete stranger, though in name a cousin? The contrary is carrying the notion of Scotch cousins rather far. I can see no other reason, except that the superior has no delectus at all in those whom the vassal is to name as to his heirs. When feus reverted to the superior on the failure of heirs, the superior had a clear right to limit the heirs to be included in the grant, and he had a delectus as to those by whom service was to be rendered, and his lands held in return for fidelity to the liege lord. But even then it was not blood relationship which constituted a party heir. It was then, as now, the choice and designation of the party as heir of provision in the deed settled between superior and vassal. The very principle of delectus originally imports that. But a feu of land is now a sale, with certain reserved right. When, therefore, a person has granted a feu, and the vassal sells, the purchaser must pay, as a singular successor, for an entry; but I am of opinion that the entry must be given in favour of any successors he names as heirs, and who are to take by succession from him under his deed. So far from concurring in the doctrine that blood relationship is the legal quality descriptive of heirs, I am of opinion that it is the nomination and substitution of parties in the deed of the person whose succession is to be regulated, and who has right to the feu, and that whoever appears before the superior nominated and substituted by a proper deed to the succession, is an heir in every sense of the term. In short, the right of succession under the deed, and not blood relationship at all, is the only quality that was ever looked to in the law, at any period.

Either the vassal has the right to regulate his own succession, or he has not. If he has not, then every heir-male not also of line ought to pay as a singular successor. The contrary is found, and found, I understand, to the extent of the most sweeping preference of collateral to heirs of the body. If the vassal has not full right to regulate his succession, how happens it that in no instance whatever, of a stranger succeeding under a simple destination, was a claim for a composition ever dreamt of or preferred? The point never even was mooted except as to a tailzied destination, and palpably from the influence of some notion that the settlers of the entail aided the claim. But if the vassal generally has the power to regulate the succession to the feu, it seems to me to be only stating the same proposition in other words (for they seem to be convertible), when I say that he has right to name those who are to succeed. Observe, all take as heirs under a deed of succession. Where a party was named by the superior's consent, the only character which the law ever looked to at any time, was the nomination in the investiture, that made him heir equally whether he had the additional character of blood relationship or not;—that an heir of provision is a dispositive or singular successor merely, I consider to be a contradiction in terms, or a legal impossibility. Now, when a vassal came to have the full right of feu, without reversion to the superior, and the right, generally speaking, to regulate the succession in that feu, I am of opinion that substitution in his deed gives the character of heir, which the superior cannot refuse.

Farther, the reservation in this case is a very singular one, for it seems to me to be founded on no clear principle whatever. It is to claim from any party not heir of line of the person last infeft under that grant. But all the heirs under a branch of substitution to A B, a stranger in blood to the original granter, are equally strangers in blood to the granter with A B himself.

Then, on what ground is a distinction taken between A B, the present Mr Ewart, and his heirs of line—all being equally strangers to the granter or to Lord Balgray? It seems to be thought that each substitute who begins a new branch of the substitution, is to appear like a purchaser, and to get a new grant for himself and his heirs. That view is manifestly repugnant to the Statute 1685, as to the power to substitute heirs. But how is he a purchaser? He can enter only by service. The last vassal got no benefit by his succession, and he has no character of a singular successor whatever. Nay, he is heir of the granter in every sense of the term—fully as much as Lord Balgray—and incurs representation ad valorem to him. But, farther, the heir of tailzie who is so to pay, has no power to get an entry including all his heirs. Nay, his heirs of line may be wholly excluded, and all his collaterals, if the tailzie is limited to the heirs-male of his body. So he would have to pay without the benefit of a general grant, and would be worse off than a common purchaser; and the result will be, that the rights of superiors are infinitely improved by entails, for they will get a composition on every new substitution, and for a far more limited class of heirs than at common law. This certainly would be a whimsical issue of the effect of entails on the situation of superiors. But it is said it is only his heirs of line who can be admitted. Then the reservation is clearly against law, and fails beyond all question, according to the case of Hopetoun.

It seems to be a point not undeserving of grave consideration, whether, when the reserved claim fails, as it confessedly does in the opinion of the whole Court, and is bad according to the terms and object of the reservation, the superior is entitled to maintain that he can form and mould that clause into a different reservation, applicable to a totally different case. He has no claim, because the succession has opened to one who is not the heir of line of the vassal last entered. On that ground he has no claim. Every heir-male, if the destination was broad enough, in whatever order, however capricious, could enter. Now, if the ground of exclusion is bad in law, it is matter of grave doubt whether the clause can be carved into a different and special reservation, not founded on the principles stated in the clause, but on another and separate point. I am unwilling, however, at this stage of the case, to press a point not started by the defender.

I am more anxious earnestly to request the attention of your Lordships to the distinction which seems to be taken between the first party in a new substitution, and the heirs under that clause of substitution. For instance, turn to record, p. 20, "whom failing, to Robert Ewart, grandson of Dr Robert Ewart, physician in Jamaica, my brother, and the heirs-male lawfully to be procreated of the body of the said Robert Ewart, my grandnephew." Take the substitution to the defender. This might have included those who were not heirs to Robert Ewart. But, even with Robert Ewart and his heirs-male, what difference is there between the character in which Robert Ewart presents himself and his heirs-male? I can see none. There may be no blood relationship to the original granter. Each takes equally by service. Each takes by force of the nomination in the deed. Each takes independent of the other. Each takes as heir of provision, and as heir of provision only. Accordingly, in the only opinion which humbly appears to me to approach this very difficult point in the argument of the pursuer, this is admitted in one passage, and the person first named in a new branch of substitution is put precisely on the same footing with all those called in that substitution. For, after disclaiming very anxiously the doctrine of Lord Jeffrey as to blood relationship, Lord Fullerton, p. 20, not only reverts to it, but follows it out to the extent of putting every substitution called upon the same footing, whether he is the first of a new branch or not. (Read p. 20). Now, upon that principle, it is quite plain each substitute in a new branch must be viewed as a dispositive or singular successor, if he has not in him the separate quality of blood relationship as much as the first member, called nominatim of that new branch. Lord Fullerton here holds that you must only look to relationship to the original granter. But the pursuer's claim is rested upon the different ground, that the defender is not the heir of Lord Balgray. But, with great deference, the principle stated, if I understand another passage, is not adhered to, and it seems to be thought that the claim opens only when the succession devolves upon a new branch of substitution, giving a right to a composition only from the first substitute in that new branch,—a view which draws a second distinction between substitutes, not consistent, as I conceive, with the Act 1685. (Read passage, foot of p. 21). If this means that each new substitute is to pay upon the ground of being a dispositive, taking by the act of the original vassal, then it is quite consistent; and on the same principle on which Robert Ewart pays, so will each of his heirs-male. Is that the principle which is to be laid down? In that case, again, superiors will have got a great benefit by entails, for every substitute who is not the heir of line of the original vassal must pay as a dispositive, though he succeeds his own father, and most consistently and necessarily, upon any view I have been able to take of the general argument of the superiors. For what difference is there between the case of A B, in a new substitution in an entail, if he is to be viewed as a dispositive, because he takes by the act of the original vassal, and the case of A B's sons. They are dispositive as much, beyond all doubt, as A B, on the principle stated by Lord Fullerton; and if the principle is to be adopted, it must be carried to that length. I have ventured to notice this point in the opinions of my brethren, for I candidly own, that if these opinions had ruled, I could not as yet have been able to propose any interlocutor to your Lordships, not knowing whether only the first substitute of a new branch of the substitution, or each heir in each branch must pay, if not heir of line. But how does the general view as to the substitute being a stranger, if he could not take otherwise by service to the entailor, support the claim of the present pursuer? He rejects the principle of relationship to the original vassal, and he claims because the defender is not the heir of line of Lord Balgray. Now, on what ground is that claim founded? Lord Balgray was not the maker of the entail. His act did not call Mr Ewart. He got no benefit, surely, by the destination in favour of Mr Ewart; and I cannot see how the reasoning here applies at all. Farther, Mr Ewart is asking for no new grant. He does not ask for the admission of any heirs of his own—he cannot exclude them,—he cannot benefit them. His entry gives them no right; on the contrary, it only postpones their succession. Then, if he is to pay because not a relation of Lord Balgray, on what ground are the heirs-male of his body not equally to pay? They do not succeed by his act or as his heir; they succeed because they are so called descriptive, to be sure; but as Lord Fullerton says, by the act of the maker of the entail; and any claim competent against Robert Ewart ought to apply equally to the heirs-male of his body. According to one view of the opinions they would pay, and I see no intelligible principle on which they could be exempted; for Mr Ewart asks nothing from them, and can give them nothing by his entry.
